To the Right Honourable

SAMUEL TURNER, Eſq;

LORD-MAYOR

OF THE

CITY OF LONDON.

MY LORD,

IN the Name of the Authors, Compilers and Proprietors of this Volume, I have the Honor to inſcribe to your Lordſhip, a Work calculated to illuſtrate the Hiſtory, aſſert the Dignity, and extend the Fame of that City, over which your Lordſhip ſo worthily preſides.

Where ſuperior Merit is Conſpicuous to all the World, it would be as ſuperfluous as ridiculous to attempt a diſplay of it.

This City, in former Times, has boaſted many chief Magiſtrates, who have been an Honor to the Stations they have held, and to human Nature; and the Names of a BARNARD, a JANSSEN and a BECKFORD, will be honoured by the Inhabitants of this City, for Ages yet to come.

I cannot be ſuſpected of Flattery, while I rank with theſe illuſtrious Names, that of the preſent LORD MAYOR of LONDON: and I muſt be allowed to wiſh, for the Honor of this City, that future Magiſtrates may copy ſuch excellent Examples.

Unwilling, however, to detain your Lordſhip a Moment longer from the Diſcharge of the Duties incumbent on that High Office to which you have been called by the united Suffrages of your Fellow-Citizens, I beg leave to ſubſcribe myſelf,

My Lord,

Your Lordſhip's moſt obedient,

moſt devoted Servant,

Hatton-Garden,
Jan. 16, 1769.

HENRY CHAMBERLAIN.

GEORGE R.

GEORGE the THIRD, by the Grace of God, King of Great Britain, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. To all to whom theſe Preſents ſhall come, Greeting. Whereas Our Truſty and Well-beloved John Cooke, of Our City of London, Bookſeller, hath, by his Petition, humbly repreſented unto Us, that he hath, for a long Time paſt, been at great Labour and Expence in collecting Books and ancient Manuſcripts, and in employing divers learned and ingenious Men, to write and compile a valuable Work, entitled, "A NEW and COMPLEAT HISTORY "AND SURVEY OF OUR CITIES OF LONDON AND WESTMINSTER, THE BOROUGH OF "SOUTHWARK, and Parts adjacent; from the earlieſt Accounts to the Beginning of the Year "1770: Containing an Account of the original Foundation, ancient and modern State of thoſe "Places, their Laws, Charters, Cuſtoms, Privileges, Immunities, Government, Trade and Na"vigation. A Deſcription of the ſeveral Wards, Pariſhes, Liberties, Precincts, Churches, Palaces, "Noblemens Houſes, Hoſpitals, and other public Buildings. An Account of the Curioſities of "the Tower of London, the Royal Exchange, St. Paul's Cathedral, the Britiſh Muſeum, Weſtminſter "Abbey, &c. with a general Hiſtory of the memorable Actions of Our Citizens, and the Revo"lutions that have happened, from the Invaſion of Julius Cæſar to the preſent Time:" Which Work he moſt humbly apprehends will be of the utmoſt Uſe and Advantage to Our Subjects in general, and to the Inhabitants of London, Weſtminſter and Southwark in particular, as it treats of Matters in which they are peculiarly intereſted. And he humbly conceives that a Work in which the Riſe, Progreſs, Increaſe and preſent State of the largeſt City in the Univerſe are faithfully delineated; in which the many noble Actions of her Citizens are fairly recorded, and in which her ſuperior Riches and Dignity, her amazing Commerce, and the Weight and Influence of her Power throughout every Part of the Globe are aſſerted and maintained, cannot fail of impreſſing the Minds of Our faithful Subjects the Citizens of London, Weſtminſter, &c. with a true Senſe of their own Importance, and of inſpiring the riſing Generation with a generous Ardor to imitate the Actions of their renowned Forefathers! Wherefore the Petitioner, deſirous of reaping ſome Advantage from his great Toil, Labour and Expence, moſt humbly ſollicits our Royal Licence and Protection to himſelf, his Heirs, Executors and Aſſigns, for the ſole Printing, Publiſhing and Vending the ſaid Work for the Term of Fourteen Years, ſo far as may be agreeable to the Statute in that Caſe made and provided. We being willing to give all due Encouragement to this Undertaking, are graciouſly pleaſed to condeſcend to his Requeſt; and We do therefore by theſe Preſents, as far as may be agreeable to the Statute in that Caſe made and provided, grant unto him the ſaid John Cooke, his Executors, Adminiſtrators and Aſſigns, Our Licence for the ſole Printing and Publiſhing of the ſaid Work for the Term of Fourteen Years, to be computed from the Date hereof; ſtrictly forbidding all Our Subjects within Our Kingdoms, or Dominions, to reprint or abridge the ſame, either in the like, or in any Size or Manner whatſoever, or to import, buy, vend, utter or diſtribute any Copies thereof reprinted beyond the Seas, during the aforeſaid Term of Fourteen Years, without the Conſent or Approbation of the ſaid John Cooke, his Executors, Adminiſtrators and Aſſigns, under their Hands and Seals firſt had and obtained, as they will anſwer the contrary at their Peril; Whereof the Commiſſioners and other Officers of Our Cuſtoms, the Maſter, Warden and Company of Stationers, are to take Notice that due Obedience may be rendered to Our Pleaſure herein declared.

Given at our Court at St. James's, the Nineteenth Day of December, 1768, in the Ninth Year of Our Reign.

By his Majeſty's Command,

ROCHFORD.

The Publiſher of the Work hopes that no Subſcriber will take it amiſs, if he finds his Name omitted in this Liſt, ſince he has not been able to procure near one half of them, notwithſtanding he delayed the Publication ſeveral Weeks entirely on that Account. It is alſo hoped that no Gentleman will be angry if he finds his Name ſpelt wrong, as they are all printed exactly as they were delivered by the Hawkers and others.

The Genius of London sitting on the bank of the Thames, receiving the homage of Europe Asia Africa and America, represented by their respective Emblems.

HISTORY AND SURVEY

But allowing that the modern books of this kind had every advantage arising from the happiest flow of language, and the most graceful turn of period, there would yet be sufficient reason for the publication of this Work, at this particular time, when the numerous improvements in all parts of the Metropolis, give ample proofs of the wisdom, policy, and public spirit of her inhabitants.

We shall therefore, without farther apology, submit this work to the opinion of the public, at whose tribunal we are proud to be judged, conscious of deserving its ACQUITTAL, and not without hope of engaging its APPLAUSE.

CHAPTER I.

Conjectures of several writers respecting the name of London: Account of its Situation, Form, Extent, &c.

IT may not be an unpleasing task to give the opinion of various writers respecting the derivation and meaning of the name of London.

With regard to its etymology, Geffrey of Monmouth derives it from Caer-Lud, or Lud's town; Erasmus from Lindum, a city of Rhodes; Vitus is of opinion that it is derived from Lugdus, a Celtick prince; while Selden imagines that he traces its etymology in the words Llan-Dyn, the Temple of Diana.*

The learned Somner derives the name of London from Llawn, full, and Dyn, a Man, that is a populous place: but Camden is of opinion that this city owes its name to the British words, [illegible] if this derivation is liable to great exceptions, for it is difficult to conceive how Lewis should come by an authentic account of the transactions of the year 130, when his countryman Gildas, who wrote near a thousand years before him, acknowledges that he took the materials of his history from foreign authors, the Britons, in his time, having no records of their transactions.

Tacitus calls this city by the name of Londinium; which afterwards yielding to the more honourable denomination of Augusta, some of our historians are for deriving this name from that of Helena Augusta, mother to Constantine the Great; while others, with greater appearance of reason, affirm, that the appellation of Augusta was conferred on [illegible] on the Northern bank of the River Thames, at a place where it forms a creſcent or half moon, ſo that each part of the city may enjoy the benefit of that noble river, without lying at an inconvenient diſtance from any other.

The cities of London and Weſtminſter communicate with the Borough of Southwark, and the counties of Surry, Kent, &c. by means of three grand ſtone bridges, of which proper deſcriptions will be given in the courſe of this work.

London is ſituated at about ſixty miles diſtance from the ſea, and is therefore in no danger of being ſurprized by the fleets of foreign enemies; yet, by the help of the tide, which flows every twelve hours, ſhips of very great burden are brought into its very boſom.

The riſing grounds about Iſlington, and the hills of Hampſtead and Highgate, are finely placed by nature to defend the metropolis from the bleak winds of the north, while it lies delightfully open to the more genial breezes of the weſt.

A certain writer has compared the figure or ſhape of London, Weſtminſter and Southwark, to that of a whale; which deſcription we ſhall inſert as a mere matter of curioſity.

" It much reſembles (ſays our author) the ſhape " of a great whale; Weſtminſter being the un- " der jaw; St. James's Park the mouth; Pall- " mall, &c. northward the upper jaw; Cock and " Pye fields, or the meeting of the ſeven ſtreets, " the eye; the reſt of the city and Southwark, " to Eaſt-Smithfield, the body; and thence eaſt- " ward to Limehouſe, the tail; and 'tis probably " in as great a proportion the largeſt of towns, " as that is of fiſhes."

The whole extent of London, from eaſt to weſt, that is, from Limehouſe to the end of Tothill-Street, Weſtminſter, is nearly ſeven miles and a half; but its breadth, from north to ſouth, is but about two miles and a half, even where it is broadeſt, that is from the extremity of Shoreditch, to the fartheſt end of Blackman-Street in the Borough.

It has been calculated that London, upon a medium, is ſeven miles long, and one mile and a quarter in breadth; which make an area of near nine ſquare miles.

The circumference of the contiguous buildings of London, Weſtminſter and Southwark, as one city, including the great additions lately made in and about the pariſh of St. Mary Le Bone, is rather more (by the way of the ſeveral new made roads) than twenty three miles.

The circumference of the walls* of London is as follows: from the Thames the wall runs northward on the eaſt ſide of Fleet-ditch 270 yards, to within 30 yards of the ſouth-weſt angle of Ludgate-ſtreet: thence it runs near 140 yards eaſt, till it reaches within 20 yards of Ludgate: thence the wall continues northward, (a little to the eaſt of the Old Bailey) 330 yards, to 40 yards to the north of Newgate; then eaſtward 390 yards, to 55 yards eaſtward of Alderſgate; from whence it runs northward 240 yards, to within 30 yards of the ſouth-weſt angle of the church of St. Giles, Cripplegate; from thence to Cripplegate, and ſo continuing eaſtwardly 1000 yards to Biſhopſgate, and thence ſouth-eaſtwardly 480 yards to Aldgate; from whence it runs ſtill ſouth-eaſtwardly, 465 yards, to within 20 yards of the middle of the north part of Tower-ditch in the whole 3315 yards; to which adding the diſtance from the Tower to Fleet ditch, which is 2170 yards, the whole circumference of the city within the walls appears to be 5485 yards, or three miles, and 205 yards. §

The whole ground within the walls of the city of London, amounts to 373 acres, and four fifths of an acre.

Without the walls, but within the liberty or freedom, there are 263 acres, and four fifths of an acre; and all the parts built on without the freedom, exceeds 2500 acres; to which if we add Weſtminſter and Southwark, the whole will be found conſiderably more than 3000 acres; an aſtoniſhing track of ground to be covered with buildings cloſely compacted together, and inhabited, as they are in many thouſand inſtances, by three or more families in one houſe! ‡

In giving this [illegible] account of the preſent extent of this city and its environs, we have deviated from the practice of every former writer on this ſubject; but this we have purpoſely done, in order to enable the reader to form a juſt idea of the immenſe increaſe of this capital of the univerſe, which, in the remoter ages of antiquity was nothing but a few mean and ſtraggling huts erected in the midſt of a wood; but is at preſent by the co-operation of many concurring circumſtances, the ſoul and center of COMMERCE, the ſeat of EMPIRE, the happy ſpot, ſacred to CIVIL and RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

*The alterations which have taken place in this city within a very few years paſt, have made ſome breaches in various parts of the wall, and other parts are obſcured from ſight by the interpoſition of houſes; but there are ſtill remains ſufficient to aſſiſt the reſearches of the curious.

§ The late improvements made in the city of London, have occaſioned the taking away of all the gates except Newgate, (for Temple Bar is not a City Gate) which will be alſo removed when the plan for building a more commodious priſon for felons ſhall be carried into execution: But we have uſed the terms, Ludgate, Alderſgate, &c. as the late ſituation of thoſe buildings is within the memory of almoſt every reader.

‡ A modern author, ſpeaking of London, ſays, " This " Ancient City has ingulphed one City, one Borough, and " forty-two villages, viz. the city of Weſtminſter, the bo- " rough of Southwark, and the villages of Mora, Finſbury, " Wenlaxbarn, Clerkenwell, Iſlington, Hoxton, Shoreditch, " Norton-falgate, the Spital, Whitechapel, Mile-End New- " town, Mile-End Old-town, Stepney, Poplar, Limehouſe, " Ratcliff, Shadwell, Wapping, Eaſt-Smithfield, the Her- " mitage, St. Catharine's, the Minories, St. Clement's " Danes, the Strand, Charing-croſs, St. James's, Knightſ- " bridge, Soho, St. Giles's in the fields, Bloomſbury, Fort- " pool, Saffron-hill, Holborn, Vauxhall, Lambeth, Lam- " beth-Marſh, Kennington, Newington-Butts, Berm[illegible]ſey, " the Grange, Horſleydown and Rotherhithe:"—to which number we may now fairly add Paddington, and Marybone; nor is it at all unlikely, if the modern rage of building continues, that London will become one immenſe line of houſes from Epping Foreſt to Hounſlow Heath; ſince, even at preſent, little more is neceſſary to make it ſo, than ſome houſes of communication between Hounſlow and Brentford, and the ſame between Stratford and the edge of the Foreſt. But allowing that the modern books of this kind had every advantage arising from the happiest flow of language, and the most graceful turn of period, there would yet be sufficient reason for the publication of this Work, at this particular time, when the numerous improvements in all parts of the Metropolis, give ample proofs of the wisdom, policy, and public spirit of her inhabitants.

We shall therefore, without farther apology, submit this work to the opinion of the public, at whose tribunal we are proud to be judged, conscious of deserving its ACQUITTAL, and not without hope of engaging its APPLAUSE.

CHAPTER II.

Account of the foundation of the city of London by the Romans, and of various circumſtances relative thereto, till the year of Chriſt 368. A full and curious account of the wall of London, of the Liberties of the city without the wall, and of the ſeveral Gates.

THE antiquity of the city of London is ſo great, that it is impoſſible to give any certain account of its origin.

It is not wholly improbable, that it exiſted in the time of the ancient Britons, before the art of writing was known in England, and when any degree of knowledge reſpecting ancient facts, could only be gathered from the ſongs of the bards, and were preſerved only by memory.

We ſhall therefore reject the fabulous tales of Geffrey of Monmouth, who pretends that this city was founded by Brutus, nephew of Æneas, and called Trinovantum, or New Troy; and that, in proceſs of time, it was ſurrounded with walls by king Lud, who gave it the name of Caer-Lud, or Lud's Town.

We ſhall likewiſe reject the opinions of Dr. Gale and Mr. Salmon, who have conjectured that London was anciently a Roman ſtation erected in St. George's Fields and Lambeth Marſh, to ſecure their conqueſts on that ſide of the river; becauſe thoſe fields were then, and for ſeveral ages afterwards, laid under water by the flowing of the tides, before the embanking of the river Thames.

Setting aſide, therefore, vague conjectures and idle ſurmiſes, we have nothing like what may be called a hiſtory of London during the times preceding the invaſion of this kingdom by Julius Cæſar, ſoon after which the conquerors began to build towns, of which we may conclude that London was one of the firſt that was erected.

As the vaſt quantity of water that overflowed the Thames may be reaſonably ſuppoſed to have greatly reduced the depth of that river, it is not unreaſonable to ſuppoſe but that the Romans might have a ford ſomewhere near the preſent ſituation of London, and that they might build that town to ſecure and command the ford.*

This was probably done by Oſtorius Scapula, who, about the 49th year of the Chriſtian Æra, is ſaid to have ſettled ſeveral colonies for the ſecurity of the Roman allies, who, till this period, had been too much expoſed to the invaſions of the Britons.

But we are not to imagine that this city, in its early ſtate, bore any great reſemblance to what it is at preſent; but even then, or as ſoon after that period as the year 64, (according to Tacitus) it was famous for the number of its merchants and the greatneſs of its trade.

About this period, § Suetonius Paulinus, the Roman general, being employed in the conqueſt of the Iſle of Angleſea, in North Wales, receiving intelligence of the revolt of the Britons, (who had flocked in great numbers from all parts, to join Boadicea, queen of the Iceni,) he marched to the aſſiſtance of the veterans and colonies, and arrived in London.

Suetonius finding that this city was too large to be defended by his army, abandoned it to the rage of Boadicea, who, without diſtinction of age or ſex, put all the inhabitants to the ſword, and then burnt the city.†

This being done, ſhe marched in ſearch of Suetonius, whom ſhe overtook and defeated, killing about 70,000 Romans and their allies; one half of which, conſidering the extenſive commerce of London at that time, we may reaſonably conclude were inhabitants of that city.

It was not long, however, before London recovered from this dreadful cataſtrophe, and, in the ſpace of a few years, increaſed ſo much in its trade, its buildings, and the number of its inhabitants, that Herodian, in his life of the emperor Severus, calls it a great and wealthy city; and about this time it obtained the name of Auguſta, and was made a prefecture by the Romans, who ſent annually a PREFECT from Rome, whoſe buſineſs it was to impoſe taxes, and otherwiſe act in a public judicial capacity.

It is very uncertain at what period of time the wall of London was firſt erected, ſome writers aſcribing the honour of this work to Conſtantine the great, and others to his mother Helena; but a late hiſtorian‡ urges ſeveral arguments to prove that it was built by Valentinian the firſt, about the year 368; for at that time Britain was reduced to a very great degree of miſery, by the joint attacks of the Scots, Picts, Attacots, Franks and Saxons, who defeated the Romans in ſeveral engagements, until the arrival of Theodoſius the elder, who landing in Britain, divided his army into ſeveral bodies, and marching towards London, attacked and routed ſeveral parties of the enemy, and entered the city in triumph.

* Mr. Maitland, in his hiſtory of London, ſays, he diſcovered that the greateſt marſhes on the ſouth ſide of the river Thames, reached from Wandſworth in the weſt to Woolwich in the eaſt. "Then (ſays he) ſounding the ſaid river, "at ſeveral neap tides, from the firſt of theſe places to "London-bridge, I diſcovered a ford, about ninety feet "weſt of the ſouth-weſt angle of Chelſea College garden; "whoſe channel, in a right line from north-eaſt to ſouth-"weſt, was no more than four feet and ſeven inches deep; "where the day before, it blowing hard from the weſt, my "waterman aſſured me, that the water then, was above a "foot lower; and it is probable, that at ſuch tides, before "the courſe of the river was obſtructed either by banks or "bridge, it muſt have been conſiderably ſhallower."

† It is to be obſerved that, at this time, the Londoners were chiefly Romans, and other foreigners, ſettled in this new mercantile town.

It cannot be abſolutely aſcertained whether the wall of London originally extended along the ſide of the river, though it is certain it did ſo in the times of the Saxons: nor need we doubt the exiſtence of this wall, becauſe we cannot, at this diſtant period of time, trace its ruins; ſince the tide, the weather, and other concurring circumſtances, might have deſtroyed many ſuch walls, in the courſe of ſo many ages.

We are told by an ancient-writer * that there was a tower palatine on the eaſt of the city, and two caſtles on the weſt; the former of which (he ſays) was the ſquare white tower of London, built at the ſouth-eaſt angle of the city wall; and the latter were the caſtles of Baynard and Mountfitchet, which laſt was ſituated in Black-friars, on the ſpot of ground which is now covered by the king's printing-houſe, and the contiguous buildings.

The city wall was originally ſtrengthened with many lofty towers, thoſe on the land ſide being fifteen in number.

In the year 1707, Dr. Woodward, the learned antiquary, had an opportunity of obſerving the fabrick and compoſition of this wall, by the pulling down of a part of it, near Biſhopſgate, to make way for new buildings. This gentleman's account is curious, and well deſerves to be tranſcribed: "From the foundation (ſays he) which "lay eight feet below the preſent ſurface, quite "up to the top of the oldeſt part, which was in "all near ten feet, it was compiled alternately of "layers of broad flat bricks, and rag-ſtones. "The bricks lay in double ranges, and each "brick being but one inch and three tenths in "thickneſs, the whole layer, with the mortar, "exceeded not three inches. The layers of ſtone "were not two feet thick of our meaſure. It is "probable they were intended for two of the "Roman, their rule being ſomewhat ſhorter than "ours.

"To this height the workmanſhip was after "the Roman manner, and theſe were the re"mains of the ancient wall. In this it was very "obſervable, that the mortar was ſo very firm "and hard, that the ſtone itſelf as eaſily broke. "It was thus far, from the foundation upwards, "nine feet in thickneſs. The above broad thin "bricks were all of Roman make, and of the very "ſort we learn from Pliny, that were in com"mon uſe among the Romans. Meaſuring ſome "of theſe (ſays our author) I found them ſeven"teen inches and ſix tenths in breadth.

"The old wall, on its being repaired, was "carried up of the ſame thickneſs to eight or "nine feet in height; or if higher, there was no "more of that work now ſtanding. All this was "apparently additional, and of a make later than "the other part underneath it, which was le"velled and brought to a plane for the raiſing "of this new work upon it. The outſide, or "that towards the ſuburbs, was faced with a "coarſe ſort of ſtone, not compiled with any "great care or ſkill, nor diſpoſed into a regu"lar method; but on the inſide there appeared "more marks of workmanſhip and art.

"At the bottom were five layers compoſed of "flint and free ſtone; though they were not ſo "in all parts, yet in ſome the ſquares were near "equal, about five inches diameter, and ranged "in a quincunx order.

"Over theſe were a layer of brick, then of "hewn free-ſtone, and ſo alternately brick and "ſtone to the top. Theſe bricks, of which "there were four courſes, were of the ſhape of "thoſe now in uſe, but much larger, being near "eleven inches in breadth, and ſomewhat above "two and a half in thickneſs.

"There was not one of the Roman bricks "above mentioned in all this part, nor was the "mortar here near ſo hard as in that below; "but from the deſcription may be eaſily collect"ed, that this part when firſt made, with ſo va"rious and orderly a diſpoſition of the materials, "flint, ſtone and brick, could not but carry a "very handſome aſpect.

"Whether this was done at the expence of "the barons in the reign of king John; or of "the citizens in the reign of king Henry III. or "of king Richard II. or at what other time, I "cannot take upon me to aſcertain, from ac"counts ſo defective and obſcure as are thoſe "which at this day remain of this affair.

"Upon the additional work now deſcribed, "was raiſed a wall wholly of brick, only that it "terminating in battlements, theſe were topped "with copings of ſtone. It was two feet four "inches in thickneſs, and ſomewhat above eight "feet in height. The bricks of theſe were of "the ſame module and ſize with thoſe of the "part underneath. How long they have been "in uſe is uncertain."

There is ſtill remaining a tower of the ſame conſtruction, twenty-ſix feet high, ſituated almoſt oppoſite the end of Gravel-Lane, on the weſt ſide of Houndſditch; but it is much decayed. Within the wall of this tower there is a door, in Shoemaker-row, fronting the paſſage into Duke's place. †

Mr. Maitland ſays, that in ſearching for this tower, about eighty paces ſouth-eaſt, towards Aldgate, he diſcovered another of the ſame conſtruction, twenty-one feet high, perfectly ſound, and much more beautiful than the former; the bricks being as ſound as if but newly laid, while the ſtones in moſt parts have fallen a ſacrifice to time. ‡

The ancient citizens of London thought the walls of ſo much conſequence to the city, that, in order to preſerve them from all incumbrances, they made an act that no houſe ſhould be built nearer to them than ſixteen feet.

Excluſive of the city of London within the wall, there is a large ſpace of ground without the wall, yet within the liberty or freedom of the city; and this is encompaſſed by an irregular line,* by which the city is ſeparated from the county of Middleſex.

This line begins at Temple-bar, where it abutts weſtward, upon the liberty of the dutchy of Lancaſter, which is without Temple-bar. It extends itſelf, by many turnings and windings, through part of Shire-lane, Bell-yard, Chancery-lane, by the liberty of the Rolls, &c. into Holborn, almoſt oppoſite Grays-Inn-lane, where there is a bar,† that is, two poſts with rails, and a chain to fix acroſs on any emergency.

From Holborn-Bars, the line continues, with various windings, by Brook-ſtreet, Furnivals-Inn, Leather-lane, Hatton-garden, Ely-houſe, Field-lane, and Chick-lane, to the common ſewer, where it returns weſtward to Cow-croſs, and ſo to Smithfield-bars.

From thence it runs, by ſeveral windings, between Long-lane and Charter-houſe-lane, to Goſwell-ſtreet, and up that ſtreet northward to the bars.

From the bars in Goſwell-ſtreet, (where the manor of Finſbury begins) it extendeth itſelf, by windings, acroſs Golden-lane, at the poſts and chain there erected, to the poſts and chain in White-croſs-ſtreet, and from thence to the poſts and chain in Grub-ſtreet.

From Grub-ſtreet it is continued through Rope-maker's-alley, to the poſts and chain in the [illegible]

From Norton-falgate it runs ſouthward, by Spital-fields, and then ſouth-eaſt by Wentworth-ſtreet, to the bars in Whitechapel.

From Whitechapel-bars it winds ſoutherly, by the Little-Minories and Goodman's-Fields; from whence it returns weſtward to the poſts and chain in the Minories; and thence, inclining more to the weſt, till it comes to London-wall, where it abutts upon the tower liberty, and there it ends.

Notwithſtanding the great length of this line, yet the ground that is encloſed between it and the wall, is but narrow; ſo that the quantity of ground thus encloſed is by no means ſo great as it appears to be.

The whole length of the LINE OF SEPARATION is 21,370 feet, and yet the ground comprehended between the line of the city wall, and this line of ſeparation, is only about three hundred acres.

Having given a deſcription of the extent of the city of London, both within and without the wall, it may now be proper to deſcribe the ſeveral gates thereof, which have been erected at various periods of time, for the ſecurity and embelliſhment of the city: and as it is probable that the time is advancing when not even one of theſe will be permitted to remain, we have given an accurate view of them all, elegantly engraved on copper, that poſterity may ſee with what kind of buildings our anceſtors defended their metropolis.

In ancient times, the gates of this city were only four in number: that is ALDGATE on the eaſt, ALDERSGATE, on the north, LUDGATE on the weſt, and the BRIDGE-GATE over the river Thames on the ſouth: but in proceſs of time ſeveral other gates and poſterns were erected, for the convenience of bringing goods and proviſions into the city, and the accommodation of the citizens in paſſing to their fields and gardens.

In this deſcription of the gates, we ſhall begin at the ſouth-eaſt angle of the ancient city wall, where the old Tower of London, commonly called the White Tower is ſituated.

The POSTERN-GATE.

This gate was ſituated at the eaſt end of Poſtern-row on Tower-hill; and, by a part of it which was remaining when Stow wrote his ſurvey of London, appeared to have been a ſtrong, handſome, arched gate; and was erected ſoon after the conqueſt, partly with Kentiſh ſtones, and partly with ſtones brought from Caen in Normandy.

The deſtruction of this gate commenced in the year 1190, when William Longchamp, biſhop of Ely, and chancellor of England, (the favourite [illegible] Richard I.) cauſed a part of the city wall to [illegible]ken down, to enlarge the Tower of Lon-[illegible] then encompaſſed with a wide [illegible]mbattled wall, which is the outer [illegible]at this time.

it was a great thoroughfare, and this accident happened in the middle of the day, no perſon was hurt.

On the top over the gateway, was a carving of the city arms, ſupported by dragons, and on each ſide of the gate was a poſtern for the convenience of foot paſſengers.

The rooms in the ancient gate were appropriated to the uſe of one of the Lord-Mayor's carvers; but in the ſtead thereof he has been of late years paid twenty pounds per annum by the city.

MOORGATE.

In the year 1415, during the mayoralty of Thomas Falconer, the wall of the city was broken near Coleman-ſtreet, and a poſtern built which was ſince called Moorgate, from its vicinity to Moorfields.

In the year 1511 this poſtern was re-edified, dikes and bridges were made, and the ground levelled and made more commodious for the citizens to paſs to their adjacent fields and gardens.

The late edifice, which was one of the moſt magnificent gates of the city, was erected in the year 1674, and conſiſted of a lofty arch, and two poſterns for foot paſſengers.

The arch (according to a late hiſtorian *) was built higher than the common rules of proportion, for the ſake of the city trained-bands marching through it with their pikes erected; a weapon which is now out of uſe.

Other writers, however, are of opinion that its height was intended for the better convenience of carts and waggons loaded with hay coming into the city, a deſign having been formed of making a hay market in Little Moorfields; but this deſign was never carried into execution.

The upper part of the gate was adorned with corinthian pilaſters, ſupporting their proper entablature, and with a [illegible] ſo named from a number of cripples, who formerly begged there.

The great antiquity of this gate cannot be doubted; for in the hiſtory of Edmund, king of the Eaſt Angles, written by Albas Floriacenſis, and ſince that, by John Lidgate, monk of Bury, it is aſſerted that in the year 1010, the Danes ravaging the kingdom of the Eaſt Angles, Alwin, biſhop of Helmeham, cauſed the body of king Edmund the martyr to be conveyed from Bury St. Edmunds, ‡ through the kingdom of the Eaſt-Saxons, and into London by the way of Cripplegate, where it is pretended that the body wrought miracles, making ſome of the lame walk upright, praiſing God.

Its antiquity likewiſe appears from the Charter of William the Conqueror, confirming the foundation of the College in London, called St, Martin the Great, in which are theſe words: "I do "give and grant unto the ſame church, and ca-"nons ſerving God therein, all the lands, and "the Moor without the poſtern, which is called "Cripplegate, on either part of the poſtern." This gate was formerly uſed as a priſon, to which debtors, and perſons charged with treſpaſſes, were committed, as they now are to the compters of Woodſtreet and the Poultry. This appears by a writ of king Edward I. in the following words: —Rex Vic. London Salutem. Ex gravi querela B. capt. et detent. in priſona noſtra de Crippleſgate pro X. l. quas coram Radulpho de Sandwico, tunc Cuſtod, Civitatis noſtræ London, et I. de Blackwell Civis recognit. debit &c.

In the year 1244 this gate was rebuilt by the company of Brewers of London; and in the year 1483, Edmund Shaw, mayor of the city, bequeathed by his will 400 marks, which, with the remains of the old gate, was to build a new one; and which was accordingly performed in the year 1491.

The laſt account we have of any reparation of this gate is in [illegible] following the year 1440, and was never rebuilt; but in the place of it was erected a mean building of timber, lath and loam; which is likewiſe decayed, and all remains of it totally removed.

In the place where this gate ſtood, there are now ſeveral poſts ſet up, to prevent the paſſage of carts and coaches, room being left between the poſts for foot paſſengers.

Adjoining hereto is a deſcent by ſeveral ſteps to an excellent ſpring of water, called the Poſtern ſpring; near to which is an iron bowl faſtened by a chain, for the uſe of any perſon who chuſes to drink the water, which is greatly eſteemed.

ALDGATE.

This was one of the four original gates of the city, and that through which the Roman vicinal way led to the Trajectus or ferry at Old-ford. STOW ſays that its name was derived from its antiquity; but this Mr. MAITLAND obſerves is very improbable, though he acknowledges that the Saxons might give it the epithet of Eald or Ald, from the ruinous condition in which they found it when they firſt poſſeſſed themſelves of the city. The earlieſt mention we can find of it, is in a charter granted by king Edgar, about the year 967.

This gate being in a very ruinous condition, was pulled down in the year 1606, and the firſt ſtone of the late building was laid in the following year; but it was not compleated till 1609.

It is worthy of remark, that in digging the foundation, ſeveral Roman coins were diſcovered, reſemblances of two of which Mr. Bond, one of the ſurveyors of the work, cauſed to be cut in ſtone, and placed one on each ſide of the eaſt front, where they remained till the late demolition of the gates.

In a large ſquare on the ſame ſide of the gate, [illegible] in gilt aras the year 1734. There were likewiſe apartments over the gate, which were appropriated to the uſe of one of the Lord-Mayor's carvers; but had, of late years, been uſed as a Charity-ſchool.

BISHOPSGATE.

This gate, which was ſituated 1440 feet north-weſt from the former, a modern writer * conjectures to have been erected by Erkenwald, biſhop of London about the year 675; which he has no other authority for than the effigies of two biſhops with which this gate was formerly adorned, and from which it might poſſibly take its name: but it is very improbable that it was erected ſo early, ſince Stow himſelf could find no mention made of it earlier than the year 1210, when William Blund, one of the ſheriffs of London, ſold to Serle Mercer and William Almaine, procurators, or wardens of London-Bridge, his land and gardens without Biſhopſgate.

In the reign of king Henry III. the Anſeatick company of merchants reſiding in this city, in conſideration of ſeveral privileges granted to them, obliged themſelves and their ſucceſſors not only to keep this gate in repair, but to defend it whenever it ſhould be attacked by an enemy.

But the ſaid company not fulfilling their contract, they were preſented to the judges itenerant, ſitting at the tower of London, for their neglect in not keeping the ſaid gate in repair, altho' they were made free of the city on that conſideration.

Upon this preſentment, Gerard Marbod, alderman of the Haunſe, and the directors of the ſaid company, agreed to pay to the mayor and citizens the ſum of two hundred and ten marks, for the immediate reparation of the gate, and entered into a new covenant, by which they bound themſelves and their ſucceſſors to keep it in repair and defend it for the future; and by this [illegible] in a beautiful manner in the Ermine ſtreet, and led from London to Hornſey.

It is not impoſſible that the cuſtom of making proclamation at the end of Woodſtreet, in Cheapſide, may have ariſen from the circumſtance of its having been one of the old Roman military ways.

ALDERSGATE.

This gate, which was ſituated 1265 feet ſouthweſt of Cripplegate, was, according to the opinion of Stow, one of the original gates of the city: but Maitland obſerves that its antiquity is by no means implied in the meaning of the word Alder, which ſome derive from Aldrich, a Saxon; others from the ſeniors or old men by whom the gate was built; and others from the great number of Alder trees which formerly grew in that neighbourhood: and he thinks that either of theſe derivations is more probable, than that this name was conferred upon it on account of its age, particularly as he could find no mention of it before the conqueſt; whence he concludes that it was not erected before that period.

In ancient times this gate was at ſeveral times enlarged with buildings; and John Day, an eminent printer, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, who lived in this gate, built conſiderably on the wall of the city, towards the pariſh church of St. Anne.

There is a book printed by this famous typographer, with a print in the title, repreſenting Day with a whip in his hand, in a room at the top of this gate, where his boys being in bed, and the ſun ſhining on them, he awakens them with theſe words; Ariſe, for it is Day.

This gate being in ſo ruinous a condition as to be in danger of falling, the Lord-Mayor, aldermen, and common council, ordered it to be taken down, which was accordingly done in the year 1616, when it was rebuilt in a ſubſtantial manner, Mr. William Parker, merchant-taylor, having bequeathed a thouſand pounds towards the expence of the new edifice.

In a large ſquare over the arch of the gate was the figure of king James I. on horſeback, in the ſame poſture as when he made his entry through this gate, on his coming to take poſſeſſion of the crown. Above his head were quartered the arms of England, Scotland and Ireland.

In a nich on the eaſt ſide was the prophet Jeremiah, with the words of the 25th verſe of the 17th chapter of his book; "Then ſhall enter "into the gates of this city, kings and princes, "ſitting upon the throne of David, riding in "chariots, and on horſes, they and their princes, "the men of Judah, and the inhabitants of Je-"ruſalem; and this city ſhall remain for ever."

In a nich on the weſt ſide ſtood the prophet Samuel, with the firſt verſe of the twelfth chapter of the firſt book of that prophet; "And Sa-"muel ſaid unto all Iſrael, behold, I have "hearkened unto your voice, in all that you "have ſaid unto me, and have made a king over "you."

On the ſouth ſide was the effigies of king James I. in his royal robes, ſitting in a chair of ſtate, done in relief.

This gate was very much damaged by the great fire in 1666; but was repaired and beautified, at the expence of the city, in the year 1670, during the mayoralty of Sir Samuel Stirling, knight.

The apartments over the gate were appropriated to the uſe of the common crier of the city; and by the ſides of the gate were two poſterns for the convenience of foot paſſengers.

It is obſerved by a modern writer, that this gate was ſo heavy and gothic a ſtructure, that it hardly deſerved notice, unleſs for the ſake of the baſs relief of king James, which, though in an awkward and elegant taſte, was a very tolerable piece of workmanſhip, and might challenge ſome ſhare of applauſe.

NEWGATE.

Newgate is at this time * ſituated at the diſtance of 1037 feet ſouth weſt from the ſpot where Alderſgate did ſtand; and it is the opinion of moſt of our antiquarians, that it obtained its name from its being firſt erected in the reign of Henry I. ſeveral hundred years after the four original gates of the city.

Howel diſſents from this opinion, and aſſerts that it was only repair'd in the abovementioned reign, and that it was anciently denominated CHAMBERLAIN GATE: but if this be true, it is very extraordinary that this gate is not once mentioned before the conqueſt.

It appears, however, from ancient records, that it was called Newgate, and was a common jail for felons taken in the city of London, or the county of Middleſex, as early as the year 1218; and that ſo lately as the year 1457, Newgate, and not the Tower, was the priſon for the nobility and great officers of ſtate.

In the year 1241, the Jews of Norwich were hanged for circumciſing a chriſtian child; their houſe, called the Thor, was pulled down and deſtroyed; and Aaron the ſon of Abraham, a Jew, who lived in London with ſeveral more of that people, were ſentenced to pay 20,000 marks† at two payments within a year, or otherwiſe to be kept perpetual priſoners, in Newgate, and other priſons.

In the year 1255, one John Offrem, who was committed to Newgate for having killed a prior, finding means to make his eſcape out of that priſon, king Henry III. was ſo much diſpleaſed with the city of London on that account, that he ſent for the mayor and ſheriffs to come before him to anſwer for the conſequence.

The mayor blamed the ſheriffs, to whom the cuſtody of priſoners properly belonged; whereupon he was permitted to depart, but the ſheriffs remained priſoners in the Tower upwards of a month, notwithſtanding the biſhops officers were principally to blame; for though the ſheriffs had given leave for the offender to be impriſoned in Newgate, yet they ought to have ſeen him kept in ſafety.

On the Tueſday after Palm-Sunday, in the year 1431, all the priſoners of Ludgate were conveyed to Newgate, by the ſheriffs of London; and on the 13th of April, on a falſe complaint made by the keeper of Newgate, eighteen freemen were conducted to the compters, chained as if they had been felons: but on the ſixteenth of June, Ludgate was again appointed for the reception of ſuch freemen as ſhould be priſoners for debt; and on the ſame day, the ſaid freemen were removed thither by order of the Lord Mayor, aldermen and commons.

Mr. Robert Dow, merchant-taylor, who died in the year 1612, appointed the ſexton, or Bellman of St. Sepulchre's to pronounce two ſolemn exhortations to the perſons condemned; for which, and for ringing the paſſing bell, as they are carried to the place of execution, he left £1 6*s.* 8*d.* yearly for ever.

The following is the exhortation to be pronounced to the condemned priſoners in Newgate, the night before their execution.

" You priſoners that are within,
" Who for wickedneſs and ſin,

" After many mercies ſhewn you, are now " appointed to die to-morrow in the forenoon: " give ear, and underſtand, that to-morrow morn- " ing the greateſt bell of St. Sepulchre's ſhall " toll for you in form and manner of a paſſing " bell, as uſed to be tolled for thoſe that are at " the point of death, to the end that all godly " people hearing that bell, and knowing it is for " you, going to your deaths, may be ſtirred up " heartily, to pray to God to beſtow his grace " and mercy upon you, whilſt you live; I be- " ſeech you, for Jeſus Chriſt his ſake, to keep " this night in watching and prayer, for the " ſalvation of your own ſouls, while there is yet " time and place for mercy: as knowing to mor- " row you muſt appear before the judgment ſeat " of your Creator, there to give an account of " all things done in this life, and to ſuffer eter- " nal torments for your ſins committed againſt " him, unleſs upon your hearty and unfeigned " repentance, you find mercy, through the me- " rits, death, and paſſion of your only mediator " and advocate, Jeſus Chriſt, who now ſits at the " right hand of God, to make interceſſion for as " many of you, as penitently return to him."

On the day of execution, as the condemned criminals paſs by St. Sepulchre's church, the following words were appointed to be ſpoken:—

" All good people, pray heartily unto God for " theſe poor ſinners, who are now going to their " death, for whom this great bell doth toll."

" You that are condemned to die, repent with " lamentable tears: aſk mercy of the Lord, for " the ſalvation of your own ſouls, through the me- " rits, death, and paſſion of Jeſus Chriſt, who " now ſits at the right hand of God, to make in- " terceſſion for as many of you as penitently re- " turn unto him.

" Lord have mercy upon you;
" Chriſt have mercy upon you;
" Lord have mercy upon you;
" Chriſt have mercy upon you;"

But the exhortation is not pronounced to ſuch as have been guilty of murder.

Newgate being much damaged by the fire of London in 1666, was repaired, in the manner it now appears, in the year 1672.

The weſt ſide of this gate is adorned with three ranges of tuſcan pilaſters, with their entablatures, and in the intercolumniations are four niches, in one of which is a figure repreſenting Liberty, having the word Libertas inſcribed on her cap; and at her feet lies a cat, in alluſion to the ſtory of Sir Richard Whittington, a benefactor to the priſon, who is ſaid to have made the firſt ſtep towards his good fortune by means of a cat.

The eaſt ſide of the gate is likewiſe adorned with a range of pilaſters, and in three niches are the figures of juſtice, mercy, and truth.

A late writer obſerves, that " Newgate conſi- " dered as a priſon, is a ſtructure of more coſt " and beauty than was neceſſary; becauſe the " ſumptuouſneſs of the outſide but aggravates " the miſery of the wretches within: but as a " gate to ſuch a city as London, it might have " received conſiderable additions both of deſign " and execution, and abundantly anſwer the coſt " in the reputation of building. The gate of a " city, erected rather for ornament than uſe, " ought to be in the ſtyle of the ancient triumphal arches; and it muſt be allowed, that " hardly any kind of building admits of more " beauty or perfection."

If we conſider Newgate as a priſon, it is indeed a very ſhocking one. The debtor, rendered unfortunate by the viciſſitudes of trade, undergoes the ignominy of being confined in the ſame priſon with the moſt abandoned villains; and it happens but too frequently, that his being in Newgate is imputed, by the ignorant, to crimes which his ſoul abhors!

On the other hand, thoſe confined as criminals, are, even before the laws of their country have found them guilty, pent up ſo cloſe together, that the air being corrupted by their ſtench and naſtineſs, occaſions a contagious diſeaſe, called the jail diſtemper, which has frequently deſtroyed great numbers of them, and even carried its contagion to the court of juſtice, where the trials are held.

To prevent as much as poſſible theſe dreadful effects, a ventilator has been placed on the top of Newgate to expel the foul air, and make way for the admiſſion of ſuch as is freſh; and during the time that the ſeſſions are held, herbs are alſo ſtrewed in the court of juſtice, and in the paſſages leading thereto, to prevent infection.

However, there are in this priſon ſeveral commodious and airy apartments, for the accommodation of ſuch as are able to pay for them: and there is alſo a private paſſage behind the houſes to the hall of juſtice in the Old Bailey, by which the the danger of priſoners being reſcued, while going to, or returning from their trials, is totally obviated.

It is much to be wiſhed that the plan ſo long talked of for building a new priſon for felons may ſoon be carried into execution, and that a ſeparate priſon may be erected for the reception of unfortunate debtors.

The following is a liſt of the donations belonging to the priſon of Newgate.

LUDGATE.

At the diſtance of 797 feet ſouth of Newgate, was ſituated Ludgate, which, according to Geffrey of Monmouth, derived its name from king Lud, a Briton, who, according to that author, built it about ſixty years before the birth of Chriſt.

But as Geffrey's pretended hiſtory is now univerſally acknowledged to be the mere production of an inventive brain, his aſſertion has no weight with the judicious; for it is certain that the ancient Britons had no walled towns. This name, therefore, is with much greater appearance of probability, derived from the rivulet Flood, Flud, Vloat, Fleote or Fleet, which ran into Fleet-ditch, and was very probably called Ludgate, inſtead of its original name, Fludgate.

In the year 1373 this gate was conſtituted a priſon for poor debtors, who were free of the city; and it was afterwards greatly enlarged by Sir Stephen Forſter.

This gentleman had been a priſoner there, and was begging at the gate, when a rich widow paſſing by, aſked him what ſum would procure his diſcharge; and on his anſwering twenty pounds (which at that time was a conſiderable ſum) ſhe generouſly advanced the money.

His liberty being thus obtained, his kind benefactreſs took him into her ſervice, in which, by his indefatigable application to buſineſs, and his obliging behaviour, he gained the affections of his miſtreſs, and married her; after which he had ſuch great ſucceſs in trade, that he became Lord-Mayor of London, and obtained the honour of knighthood.

In the midſt of his proſperity, Sir Stephen thought of the place of his confinement, and acquainting his lady with a deſign he had formed of enlarging the priſon, ſhe alſo determined to contribute to the execution of ſo benevolent a plan.

Hereupon they cauſed ſeveral of their houſes near the gate to be pulled down, and in their ſtead erected a ſtrong ſquare ſtone building, containing the following rooms, viz. the porch, the paper-houſe, the watch-hall, the upper and lower lumberies, the cellar, the long ward, and the chapel; in the laſt of which were the following inſcriptions:

"This chapel was erected and ordained for
"the divine worſhip and ſervice of God, by
"the Right Honourable Sir Stephen Forſter,
"Knight, ſome time Lord-Mayor of this ho"nourable city, and by Dame Agnes his wife,
"for the uſe and godly exerciſe of the priſo-
"ners in this priſon of Ludgate, Anno 1454."

Devout Soules, that paſſe this way,
For Stephen Forſter, late Maior, heartily pray,
And Dame Agnes, his S ouſe, to God conſecrate,
That of pitie this houſe made for Londoners in Ludgate.
So that for Lodging and Water Priſoners here nought pay,
As their keepers ſhall all anſwere at dreadful doomes-day.

Theſe venerable founders not only ſettled a ſalary for a chaplain of this priſon, but ordered that all the rooms in theſe additional buildings ſhould be for ever free to all unfortunate citizens, and that they, on providing their own bedding, ſhould pay nothing at their diſcharge for lodging or chamber rent: but the avaricious diſpoſition of the keepers has long ſince broke through this appointment, and for many years paſt, took rent for the rooms built for the ſole uſe of the poor, contrary to the expreſs order of the generous donor.

Though at the taking down of the city gates, the priſoners in Ludgate were removed to the LONDON WORKHOUSE in Biſhopſgate, which is at this time called NEW LUDGATE; yet, as the domeſtic government of the priſon is, or ought to be nearly the ſame as it formerly was, and as it is in itſelf very ſingular and remarkable, we will now give a compendious account of it, from a work publiſhed ſome years ago, by a perſon who had been long a priſoner there.

For the government of the priſon, and the puniſhment of crimes and miſdemeanors committed therein, the maſter, keeper and priſoners choſe from among themſelves a reader of divine ſervice; an upper ſteward, called the maſter of the box; an under ſteward, ſeven aſſiſtants, who by by turns officiate daily; a running aſſiſtant; two church-wardens; a ſcavenger; a chamberlain; a running poſt; and the criers or beggars at the grates, who were generally ſix in number.

The reader was choſen by the maſter, keeper, ſtewards, and aſſiſtants, and not at a general election, as the other officers were. Beſides reading the prayers, he was formerly obliged to ring the bell twice a day for prayers, and alſo for the ſpace of a quarter of an hour before nine o'clock at night, as a warning for all ſtrangers to depart the priſon: but on account of the dignity of his office, he has been for ſome years paſt exempted from theſe ſervile employments, and others have been appointed to perform them in his ſtead.

The ſalary of the reader was two ſhillings and eight-pence per month; a penny of every priſoner at his entrance, if his garniſh amounted to ſixteen-pence; and a diſh of meat out of the Lord-Mayor's baſket.

All the priſoners held the upper ſteward, or maſter of the box in equal eſteem with the keeper of the priſon; and to him was committed the keeping of the ſeveral orders of the houſe, with the accounts of caſh received upon legacies; the diſtribution of all proviſions ſent in by the Lord-Mayor and others; and the caſh received by garniſh and begging at the grates, which he uſed to expend weekly, in bread, candles and other neceſſaries.

He likewiſe kept a liſt of all the priſoners, as well thoſe that were upon the charity as thoſe who were not; to each of whom, by the aid of the aſſiſtant for the day, he uſed to deliver their reſpective ſhares of bread and other proviſions.

It was alſo his buſineſs to receive the gifts of the poulterers, fiſhmongers, and other market people, ſent in from the clerk of the market, by the running poſt, for which he gave a receipt; and afterwards, in the preſence of the aſſiſtant for the day, expoſed all to ſale to the charity men, in a fair market; and the money ariſing therefrom was depoſited in the common ſtock.

This officer, with the under ſteward, aſſiſtants, and church-wardens were elected monthly, by the ſuffrages of the priſoners; but all the other officers, except the chamberlain, were appointed by the maſter, keeper, ſtewards, and aſſiſtants.

The deſign of theſe frequent elections was to prevent frauds and abuſes among the reſpective officers; but when they were known to be perſons of probity, they were commonly re-elected, and frequently held their poſts for ſeveral months together.

The under ſteward was an aſſiſtant to the upper ſteward, and uſed to perform the functions of his office, in caſe of his abſence or indiſpoſition.

The ſeven aſſiſtants were choſen monthly, with the ſtewards, and one of them uſed to officiate daily; whoſe buſineſs it was to attend in the hall, to enter all charities, and keep an account of the money taken out of the boxes, which were opened at five o'clock in the afternoon, and at nine at night. This money he pays to the upper ſteward, at the paſſing of whoſe accounts the ſtewards uſed to officiate as auditors.

If any perſon was nominated to the office of an aſſiſtant, and refuſed to ſerve, it was cuſtomary to fine him a ſhilling, in default of paying which it was cuſtomary to put him in fetters for three days.

The officiating aſſiſtant was inveſted with the power of a magiſtrate, and could commit a priſoner to the ſtocks or ſhackles, for abuſing any perſon. His buſineſs was to ſee the cellar cleared of all the priſoners every night by ten o'clock; for which he received ſixpence out of the charity money; two-pence of which was for the upper ſteward, two-pence for the running aſſiſtant, and two-pence for himſelf.

In ancient times this office was held in ſuch eſteem, that the aſſiſtant, on his entering upon it, uſed to be uſhered into the hall at eight o'clock at night, by forty or fifty of the priſoners, each carrying a large lighted candle.

It was the buſineſs of the running aſſiſtant to attend on the criers at the grates to change money; to open the boxes; put up candles in their reſpective places; look after the clock; ring the bell for prayers, and perform the office of crier, at the ſale of proviſions. His ſalary was four ſhillings and eight pence per month, and an eighth part of the garniſh-money.

The church wardens were choſen from among the younger priſoners. The buſineſs of the upper church-warden was to call to prayers on Sundays, after the bell had done ringing; and that of the under church-warden was to call the priſoners to prayers all other days. They likewiſe took cognizance of all perſons upon the charitable foundation, who in default of attendance were fined one penny each.

The ſalary of the under church-warden was four-pence per month; and if a perſon was duly elected, and refuſed to ſerve the office, he was fined four pence.

The duty of the ſcavenger was to keep the priſon clean, and to fetter offenders, or put them in the ſtocks: for which he was intitled to receive one penny from each criminal, together with a ſalary of five ſhillings and eight-pence per month, and two-pence out of every ſixteen-pence of the garniſh-money.

The chamberlain, who was choſen by the keeper of the priſon, took care of all the bedding and linen belonging to the keeper; appointed the lodgings of the new-comers; furniſhed the priſoners with ſheets, and gave notice to ſtrangers to leave the priſon by ten o'clock at night. In former times this officer was obliged to make the beds of the charity-men, for which he was paid two-pence a month.

The buſineſs of the running poſt was to fetch in a baſket the broken meat from the Lord-Mayor's table, proviſions from the clerk of the market, from private families, and the charities given in the ſtreets; which, when ſo inconſiderable as not to admit of being divided among them all, were publicly ſold. The ſalary annexed to this office was four ſhillings a month, one penny out of each man's dividend, and one penny out of every ſixteen-pence of garniſh-money.

The criers were ſix in number; two of whom daily begged at the grates; the perſon at the grate in Ludgate-ſtreet being allowed one fourth of what was given, and him on the Black-friars ſide, one half of the money collected there.

On the Monday following every election, the accounts were audited and paſſed, and the balance divided; but if it amounted to three ſhillings and fourpence per man, the keeper of the priſon, without the leaſt colour of right, uſed arbitrarily to extort two ſhillings and four-pence from each priſoner; but if the dividend did not amount to ſo much, he then took only fourteen pence, the other moiety of the two ſhillings and four-pence being placed to the account of the priſoner, to be paid at the time of his diſcharge.

Another great grievance the priſoners laboured under was, their being obliged to pay the turnkey twelve ſhillings per month, for no other ſervice than that of opening the door to admit gifts and charities ſent to the priſon, which frequently amounted to little more than what he received.

Thus far our author: but it may be proper to inform the reader that the book * from which this account was extracted, was printed many years ago; and we hope that the grievances abovementioned have already been remedied, as far as the conduct of the New Ludgate in Biſhopſgate-Street will admit.

The following is an account of the fees to be taken by the keeper of Ludgate, and the turnkeys under him, allowed of, and confirmed at a court of Aldermen, held on the 19th of January, 1686.

At the coming in of every priſoner one ſhilling to the turnkey, and two-pence to the officer who conducts him thither.

The keeper finding and providing beds, bedding, mats and cords, ſheets, blankets and coverlets, the priſoners pay him for the beſt lodging three-pence per night; for the ſecond lodging two-pence, and for the third or meaneſt lodging one penny per night.

The keeper is to provide clean ſheets every month for all his beds, and the priſoners who lie in them are to pay monthly to the chamberlain for waſhing them, eight-pence between them, and no more.

But when the priſoners find their own beds and bedding, which the keeper is by no means to hinder, the priſoner is only to pay three-pence per week for bed-room; or for chamber-room four-pence at the moſt per week; and not above two to lie in a bed.

If the priſoner by his inability can go no farther than a couch, he is to pay only one penny per week for chamber-room, and only one penny per week for lamps and candles, which the keeper is to provide.

For every priſoner's diſcharge the keeper is to receive two ſhillings and no more. For all actions and writs againſt him, he is to pay the keeper only one ſhilling, and not one ſhilling for every action, and two ſhillings and ſix-pence for every writ, as was formerly taken.

The keeper ſhall not preſume to take any other fees upon any pretence, demand, or allowance whatſoever, for execution-money, action-money, or writ-money.

The reader will judge by the following account, how theſe orders have been of late years obeyed.

A freeman being arreſted by an action entered in either of the compters, may refuſe to go thither, and inſiſt on being carried immediately to Ludgate; but the officers will extort from him four or five ſhillings as their fee for carrying him thither, though their due is but two-pence.

On his being brought to Ludgate, the turnkey entered his name and condition in a book kept for that purpoſe; for which entry the priſoner uſed to pay fourteen pence; after which the chamberlain furniſhed him with a lodging at the rate of one penny, two-pence, or three-pence per night; but demanded one ſhilling and ſix-pence for ſheets; and before he went to reſt, his fellow-priſoners demanded four ſhillings for garniſh, and if he did not pay it, his cloaths were privately taken from him at night, and not returned till he had raiſed the money the next day. The ſteward likewiſe demanded eighteen pence of him, for coals, candles, and the uſe of the houſe.

He was, however, allowed the liberty of going abroad; which he might do either with a keeper, or on giving good ſecurity to return at night.

If he went out with a keeper, he was obliged to pay two ſhillings and ſix-pence to the head turnkey, and eighteen-pence to the keeper who attended him; and every day he went abroad afterwards, one ſhilling to the keeper, and the ſame ſum to the turnkey. A bond was likewiſe given for the payment of his lodging to the maſter-keeper, for which the turnkey took at leaſt five ſhillings as his fee.

If the priſoner paid the debt, and diſcharged all other actions againſt him in either or both of the compters, he, on his diſmiſſion, paid two ſhillings to the maſter keeper; fourteen pence to the turnkey; one ſhilling for every action entered againſt him; and if he was charged in execution, two ſhillings and ſix-pence for every action againſt him. Theſe fees, together with his lodging, have frequently amounted to more than the whole debt.

The following is a liſt of the donations belonging to this priſon.

DOWGATE.

According to the opinion of Stow, DOWGATE was originally called Downgate, from the ſteepneſs of the deſcent from the church of St. John, Walbrook, to the river Thames; and that it was anciently a principal key for ſhips and veſſels to load and land goods and proviſions.

It was likewiſe called Dourgate, that is, the water-gate, and that it was one of the four original gates of the city, where was anciently the Trajectus, or ferry of Watling-ſtreet, one of the four great military ways.

And it is farther obſerved, leſt it ſhould be objected that one gate was not ſufficient to afford a paſſage to the ſeveral ſorts of merchandize exported and imported at that time, that "before the deſtruction of the wall on that "ſide, one gate was ſufficient for that purpoſe, "had the commerce of London been double "to what it was, as much more merchandize is "carried through the weſtern gate-way of the "cuſtom-houſe in one year at preſent, than I "imagine all the trade of London in thoſe days "could amount to in twenty."

Several other gates on this ſide of the city are mentioned by Stow, viz. Wolfgate, Ebgate, Oyſtergate, Buttolphſgate, Billingſgate, &c. but theſe ſo far from having been real gates in the wall of the city, were only wharfs appropriated to the landing of merchandize, and took their names from the kind of goods there landed, or from the names of other places in their neighbourhood; for as the wharf near Dowgate took its name from that gate, ſo, in emulation thereof, the erectors of the other wharfs, or quays, dignified theirs with the epithet of gates.

BRIDGEGATE.

Stow is of opinion that this gate, which was ſituated on London-bridge, took its name from that circumſtance; which is ſo obvious a truth, that there was no neceſſity for making ſo wiſe a remark.

He likewiſe thinks it was one of the four principal gates of the city, and that it was built long before the conqueſt, when there was only a bridge of timber over the Thames; but being a weak pile of building, it often ſtood in need of repair.

In the year 1436 this gate, with the tower upon it, fell down, and being rebuilt, it was burnt in the year 1471, by ſome rioters mariners of Kent, headed by the baſtard Fauconbridge.

On the third of April, 1266, king Henry III. granted to the keepers of this, and the other gates of London, three-pence per day each; from whence Mr. Maitland concludes that they were only his collectors, and that the toll was appropriated to the uſe of his majeſty.

This gate being very much damaged by fire in the year 1726, it was ſoon afterwards taken down and rebuilt, and was finiſhed in the year 1728, when two poſterns were made, and the following inſcription was placed over the arch on the ſouth ſide:

"This gate was widened from eleven to "eighteen feet, in the mayoralty of Ed-"ward Becher, Knt.

And the king's arms was placed over this inſcription.

CHAPTER III.

London firſt erected into the ſee of a biſhop. Firſt building of Weſtminſter-Abbey. London almoſt deſtroyed by fire. Parliament held in London. Moſt of the inhabitants of London murdered by the Danes. King Alfred beſieges and takes this city, and repairs its walls, &c. The Danes defeated by the citizens of London. Bricks and ſtones firſt uſed in the building of houſes. The Londoners, under king Athelſtan, defeat the Scots army. Singular law againſt drunkenneſs made by king Edgar. Remarkable ſea-fight between the Engliſh and the Danes. Great ravages committed by the Danes. King Ethelred orders the Danes to be maſſacred, whereupon Sweyn, king of Denmark, invades and conquers the kingdom. Firſt coronation in London. Canute beſieges London, and, on the death of king Edmund, becomes ſole monarch of England. A ſcene of bloodſhed prevented by a compromiſe between king Edward and Godwin, earl of Kent.

HAVING in the two former chapters given an account of the name, ſituation, form, extent, and foundation of the city of London: together with many circumſtances relative thereto, till the 368th year of the chriſtian Æra; and likewiſe a deſcription of the wall, gates and liberties of this city; we ſhall now continue our hiſtory in the moſt regular manner, and pay the ſtricteſt regard to the moſt authentic records; nor will we omit a ſingle circumſtance which we apprehend may contribute to the inſtruction or entertainment of the reader.

A Roman hiſtorian of great credit * informs us, that when Theodoſius the elder arrived in Britain, the city of London, then called Lundinium, was ſaid to be an ancient town, and that in future times it was denominated Auguſta: but be this as it will, it did not long retain the latter name; for when the Saxons arrived in Britain, they found it bore that of Caer Llundain, which was changed, in about eight years afterwards, to Lunden-Byrig, by which name it was known when Hengiſt, having defeated the Britons at Crayford † in Kent, they took refuge in this city.

Great numbers of the Saxons having been converted to the chriſtian faith, by Auguſtine the monk; that prieſt was therefore ordained archbiſhop of the Engliſh nation, by the expreſs order of pope Gregory; after which Auguſtine ordained Mellitus, biſhop of the Eaſt-Saxons; and that nation being converted by the endeavours of Mellitus, ‡ Ethelbert, of Kent, cauſed a church to be built for him in London, which was then the capital of Eaſt-Saxony. Thus did this city become the ſee of a biſhop.

London, was, even at this time, famous for its extenſive commerce; but it does not appear to have been dignified with the title of the metropolis, the city of Canterbury rather claiming that honour, as it was the reſidence of king Ethelbert, to whom all the Saxon nations ſouth of the river Humber were vaſſals; and Sebert, king of the Eaſt-Saxons, his feudatory.

In the year 605, or, according to other authors, in 610, Sebert built a church or minſter in the iſland of Thorney § ſituated to the weſt of London, which, at the deſire of Mellitus, biſhop of London, was dedicated to St. Peter: but it was deſtroyed by the Danes in a ſhort time after its erection.

Sebert had three ſons, Sexred, Seward and Sigbert, who, during the life of their father, profeſſed the chriſtian religion; but after his death, which happened about the year 616, they revolted to paganiſm, and expelled from their dominions Mellitus, biſhop of London.

So extremely defective is the civil hiſtory of the Saxon heptarchy, that London is not even mentioned therein from the year 616 to that of 764; but of its eccleſiaſtical hiſtory we have the following particulars.

About the year 664, the church of St. Martin, Ludgate, was founded by Cadwallader the valiant Britiſh king, who, according to the teſtimony of Robert of Glouceſter, was buried there in the year 677.

After the expulſion of Mellitus, the ſee of London remained without a biſhop, till the year 653, when Sigbert, king of the Eaſt-Saxons, embracing the chriſtian religion, Cedda, or Chad, was advanced to the biſhopric of this city.

This prelate was ſucceeded by Wine, who having been deprived of the biſhopric of Winchеſter, by Kerewaltho, king of the Weſt-Saxons, ſat on the epiſcopal chair of London till the time of his death, which was about the year 675.

After the deceaſe of Wine, the biſhopric of this city was given to Erkenwald, ſon of Offa, king of the Eaſt-Angles, who had been educated under Mellitus, the firſt biſhop of London.

* Tacitus.

† Then called Creceanford.

‡ Mellitus was abbot of a monaſtery of monks at Rome, and ſent into England by pope Gregory, to aſſiſt Auguſtine in the converſion of its inhabitants.

§ This part of Weſtminſter lay waſte many years, and being overgrown with thorns and bramble buſhes, and almoſt encompaſſed by the Thames and Long-ditch, was called Thorney Iſland.

Erkenwald was ſo diſtinguiſhed by the ſanctity of his life, and by ſeveral religious foundations, that after his death, which happened at Barking in Eſſex, the canons of St. Paul's and the monks of Chertſey diſputed the poſſeſſion of his body: but the inhabitants of London, eſpouſing the ſide of the canons, took away the remains of the biſhop, and cauſed them to be honourably interred in his own cathedral, the revenues of which he had augmented, and enlarged its buildings.

Erkenwald was ſucceeded by Walter or Waldhere, in the reign of king Sebbi, who being wearied with the cares of a crown, acquainted the biſhop with his reſolution to abdicate, and to aſſume the monaſtic life: he accordingly paſſed through the forms of a recluſe, and having received the habit from Waldhere, he gave that eccleſiaſtic a conſiderable ſum of money, to be applied to the purpoſes of charity, and continued the monaſtic life ever after.

The collegiate church of St. Martin's-le-Grand, within Alderſgate, is ſaid to have been founded by Victred or Wydred, king of Kent, about the year 700: but ſome writers, over-fond of every appearance of great antiquity, carry the date of its foundation much farther back, and aſcribe it to the king Cadwallein, or to ſome antient Britons, in memory of that prince: but we find no foundation for ſuch a ſuppoſition.

In the year 764 London ſuffered very conſiderably by fire; ſome time after which * it was almoſt wholly burnt down; and the ſtreets being very narrow, and the houſes built of wood, numbers of its inhabitants periſhed in the flames: nor was it nearly rebuilt before many of the new houſes were deſtroyed by a third conflagration. †

In the year 833, Egbert king of the Weſt Saxons, Ethelwolf his ſon, Withlaf king of Mercia, together with moſt of the biſhops, and other great men of the realm aſſembled at London, where they held a Witena-gemot, or parliament, in which they deliberated on the moſt effectual meaſures to be purſued, to prevent the invaſions of the piratical Danes.

Notwithſtanding all their precautions, it was not long before London ſeverely felt the effects of Daniſh cruelty; for arriving with a large fleet of ſhips on the coaſt of Kent, they landed, and having deſtroyed Rocheſter and Canterbury, they marched to this city, which they ſacked, and with a horrid rage of barbarity, murdered moſt of its inhabitants.

Fluſhed with the ſucceſs of this and ſeveral other attempts, the Danes entertained ſerious thoughts of making a compleat conqueſt of the whole iſland.

With this view they ſhipped a large army on board a fleet of three hundred and fifty ſail, which arriving in the Thames, the troops were landed near London, which they ſoon reduced and plundered; and thinking it a proper fortreſs, from which to make incurſions at their pleaſure into the kingdom of the Weſt Saxons, they placed a large garriſon therein, and, notwithſtanding the moſt ſolemn oaths to, and treaties with king Alfred, they made perpetual inroads among the neighbouring ſtates, which they robbed and harraſſed with the moſt unrelenting rage of diabolical fury.

Alfred, reſolved to puniſh theſe ſons of violence, theſe infractors of the moſt ſolemn treaties, repaired all his old fortreſſes, erected new ones, and laying ſiege to London, attacked that city with ſo much bravery, that the Danes were glad to capitulate, after a very faint reſiſtance.

As ſoon as Alfred had thus poſſeſſed himſelf of London, he began to rebuild its walls, towers, and gates, which had been almoſt deſtroyed by the Danes; and having driven out the Daniſh inhabitants who had ſettled there, he beſtowed the government of the city on Ethelred, duke of Mercia, who had married his daughter Ethelfleda.

It appears to be evident that Ethelred was veſted with powers ſuperior to thoſe of an ordinary governor; and it is probable that he held this city in fee, becauſe, on his deceaſe, Ethelfleda delivered it up to her brother, which, if her huſband had been only an ordinary governor, ſhe need not have done, ſince it would of courſe have fallen to her brother Edward, as being right heir to Alfred his father.

The ambition of conquering this kingdom ſtill predominating in the breaſts of the Danes, they were perpetually hovering over the coaſt of England, and at length, under the conduct of their general Hæſten, they landed in conſiderable numbers, on the coaſt of Eſſex, a little below Tilbury; and having erected a fort or caſtle at Beamfleote, ‡ they made perpetual excurſions thence into the adjacent country, committing great depredations wherever they went.

Hereupon Alfred diſpatched Ethelred the governor of London, with a number of regular troops, which being joined by a large body of the citizens, they drove the ravaging Danes back to the caſtle, to which they laid ſiege, and took both the caſtle and a very rich booty, at the ſame time making priſoners of the wife and ſons of the Daniſh general Hæſten, whom they conducted to London.

On this occaſion the citizens diſtinguiſhed themſelves in ſuch a manner, as evinced at once their great courage and loyalty.

On the approach of winter, another body of Danes, who had waited the ſucceſs of their countrymen at the Iſland of Mæriſige, § thought it prudent to retire with their fleet to a place of greater ſecurity; whereupon they ſailed up the river Thames, and entering Lea river, at the place now called Bow creek, and paſſing up the river in their ſmall veſſels to the diſtance of

* A. D. 798.

§ Now called Mearſy, a ſmall Iſland at the mouth of the river Coln, or Colcheſter river.

twenty twenty miles or upwards, erected a fortification at or near Ware in Hertfordshire. *

Thus situated, they gave no small uneasiness to the Londoners, who, in conjunction with the king's forces, with the brave Alfred at their head, marched against them, and attacked them with the greatest resolution; but in this attack Alfred had four of his chief officers killed, and was repulsed with considerable loss.

Alfred now gave a great proof of good generalship; for apprehending he should run too great a risk by renewing the attack, he disposed his army in such a manner as to cut off all supplies of provision to the enemy by land, and diverting the current of the river Lea into three channels, the water became insufficient to admit the return of their fleet to the Thames.

The navigation being thus cut off, and no provisions to be obtained, the Danes were obliged to break up their camp, and to leave their ships behind them: upon which the Londoners instantly demolished their works, restored the navigation of the river Lea, destroyed some of their ships, and conveyed the rest down the river to London. †

In the reign of king Alfred almost all the houses in London were built of wood; but that monarch beginning to build his palaces with stone and brick, his example was followed by the nobility, and many of the wealthy citizens; but it was some centuries afterwards before this practice became general.

Alfred was succeeded by his son Edward, who was troubled with the invasions of the Danes during the whole of his reign, though his successes against them in the field were far from being unfrequent or inconsiderable.

In the year 925, during the reign of Athelstan, who succeeded Edward, there was a great convention of the church and state at London, wherein many important regulations, for the good government of the kingdom, were resolved upon.

Constantine, king of Scotland, having invaded Northumberland in the year 938, Athelstan marched against him with a powerful army, and coming up with him at Brunanburgh, a terrible battle ensued, which continued from morning till night, when Constantine being slain, victory declared in favour of the English.

To the intrepid valour of the Londoners, this great conquest was chiefly owing; for their behaviour was valiant without description: nor was the king unmindful to reward their merit; for, by a law made soon afterwards respecting the coinage of money, the city of London was allowed eight coiners; whereas no other city or town in the kingdom, except Canterbury, had near that number.

The palace of king Athelstan (or Adelstan) was situated in Adle-street, near Aldermanbury, which, from his residing there, is called King-Adle-street, in some of our ancient records. The church of St. Alban, in Wood-street, was founded by this monarch.

In the year 940, king Edmund succeeded his brother Athelstan; and in the year 945 he held a Witena-gemote, or parliament, in London, wherein divers good laws were passed, and among the rest one respecting marriage, in which it was ordained, 1. "That after a woman and her "friends have given their consent to marry, the "bridegroom is not only to make a solemn pro-"mise of the performance of articles, but like-"wise to declare his entering into an engage-"ment, according to the tenor of the gospel. "2. That then the maintenance of the bride is "to be adjusted, and the bridegroom and his "friends are to give security upon this head. "3. That after this, the bridegroom shall make "a declaration of his wife's dowry, and mention "the particulars in which it is to consist. 4. "That if she should happen to survive her hus-"band, she shall be allowed the moiety of his "goods and estate: and in case of their having "no issue, that she shall enjoy the whole fortune "till her second marriage: and that securities "shall be given for the performance of the fore-"going articles, by the man and his friends." And it was further ordained, "5. That when the "conditions were agreed between the parties, the "woman's relations shall engage for her virtue "and good behaviour, and take security for the "solemnity of the marriage. 6. That if the "husband should remove her out of the juris-"diction of the thane or baron, where she was "brought up, he was to enter into articles, that "nobody should injure her. And on the other "side, that in case she should do her husband "any considerable damage, her friends were ob-"liged to make him satisfaction."

Edmund, who was murdered in the year 946, left two sons, minors, who, by the intrigues of Dunstan, usually called St. Dunstan, confessor to their uncle Edred, were set aside from the throne in favour of that prince: but on the death of Edred, in the year 955, Edwy, the eldest son of Edmund, was advanced to the throne.

Edwy departing this life in the year 959, was succeeded by his brother Edgar, during whose reign great numbers of foreigners, attracted by the report of the king's great abilities and wise administration, resorted to London, bringing with them many vices and ill habits, and particularly that of drunkenness, which at length became so excessive, that Edgar made a law to restrain that vice, in which it was ordained that within every drinking cup there should be pins fixed at certain distances, and if any person presumed to drink beyond the mark, he should be liable to pay a penalty.

In the year 961, land sold for no more than one shilling an acre. In the same year, a dreadful malignant fever raged in the city of London, destroying great numbers of its inhabitants: and St. Paul's cathedral was destroyed by fire.

* Some writers are of opinion, that this camp or fortification was at Hertford.

† Part of the remains of these vessels, as planks, nail, &c. were discovered a few years ago, on the erecting the present bridge at Stanstead.

There were at this time but few houſes within the walls of London, and thoſe were ſcattered about in a very irregular manner: the greater number of buildings being to the weſt of Ludgate.

In the year 992, the Danes returned again to the coaſt of England; upon which king Ethelred, to hinder their landing, fitted out a very large fleet in the port of London, the command of which he gave to the Ealdermen Thorod and Ealfrick, and to two biſhops.

The Engliſh fleet coming up with that of the Danes, the traitor Ealfrick, on the evening of the intended engagement, deſerted with his ſhip to the enemy: but as ſoon as this was known, a ſignal was made to purſue, and the Engliſh coming up with the rear of the Danes, took one of their ſhips; and a ſquadron of the Londoners falling in with one of the enemy's ſquadrons, a deſperate engagement enſued, in which ſeveral thouſands loſt their lives, and the treacherous Ealfrick narrowly eſcaped being taken.

In the year 994, Anlaf and Sweyn, kings of Norway and Denmark, attacked London with a fleet of ninety-four ſhips; but the valiant citizens gave them ſo warm a reception, that they were glad to raiſe the ſiege: but full of revenge for the loſs they had ſuſtained, they committed the moſt dreadful outrages in Middleſex, Eſſex, Suſſex, Kent and Hampſhire, murdering all that fell in their way, and burning their habitations to the ground.

It may be matter of curioſity to take notice of the price of proviſions in the year 1000, when the price of an ox was only two ſhillings and ſixpence, that of a cow two ſhillings, of a ſheep one ſhilling, and of a ſwine eight pence.

The Danes, in the year 1009, having made an incurſion as far as Oxford, burnt that city, and in their return therefrom committed the moſt ſhocking devaſtations on each ſide of the river Thames: but being informed that an army of the Londoners was marching to attack them, thoſe on the north ſide of the Thames croſſed over at Staines, and both parties being united, they haſtened through the county of Surry to their ſhips on the coaſt of Kent; and having refitted their veſſels, they wintered in the Thames, and made frequent attacks on the city of London, but they were conſtantly repulſed by the valour and military ſkill of the citizens.

In the year 1011 the inhabitants of this kingdom were plunged into the utmoſt diſtreſs: for all the countries about London being reduced by the Danes, king Ethelred had no place of importance in his poſſeſſion but this city and Canterbury.

In this deplorable ſituation, he ſhut himſelf up in London, to which place he ſummoned a national aſſembly, to aſk their advice in the preſent exigency.

If the authority of the Saxon annals may be relied on, the council determined to give the Danes eight thouſand pounds to leave the kingdom; but other writers inform us, that the ſum given was forty-eight thouſand pounds; and indeed this ſeems to have been the real purchaſe of the Danes abſence, becauſe in a former inſtance, even when leſs ſucceſs had attended their arms, they had been preſented with thirty-ſix thouſand pounds, as the conditions of their relinquiſhing their conqueſts.

According to the value of money at that time, this muſt have been a very dear purchaſe; but dear as this peace had been bought, it was of no long continuance; for Ethelred, with a barbarity that does him infinite diſcredit, and a want of policy that renders him contemptible, ordered all the Danes in England to be maſſacred, without diſtinction of age, ſex, or rank in life.

Among thoſe who fell a ſacrifice to this ill-judged piece of cruelty, was the princeſs Gunhild, ſiſter to Sweyn king of Denmark, and her huſband Palingus, who had become hoſtages for the preſervation of the peace ſo lately concluded.

This behaviour of Ethelred could not fail to engage the reſentment of Sweyn, who in the year 1013 entered the river Humber with a numerous fleet of ſhips, and vowing vengeance and deſtruction, on the murderer of his countrymen, the people were terrified into a ſubmiſſion, and the countries near the place of his landing ſurrendered to him without oppoſition.

Sweyn taking his rout to the ſouth, received the ſubmiſſion of the inhabitants of Oxford and Wincheſter, from which laſt place he marched to London, which he ſummoned to ſurrender: but the citizens were ſo animated by the preſence of their king, that they refuſed all terms of ſubmiſſion, and boldly ſallying forth on the enemy, he was ſoon compelled to raiſe the ſiege.

Sweyn, thus diſappointed in his attempt upon the metropolis, marched into the weſtern parts of the kingdom, where all places, as he advanced, ſubmitted to his power.

All the kingdom having ſubmitted, except London, Sweyn prepared to make a freſh attack on that city: but whilſt he was making the neceſſary preparations for this enterprize, he was informed that Ethelred had withdrawn himſelf from the capital: and the citizens, being deſerted by their king, prudently ſubmitted to the conqueror; upon which Sweyn became king of England by conqueſt, and was proclaimed in London.

Ethelred had retired to Normandy; but upon the death of Sweyn which happened only a few months after his elevation to the throne, the nobility of England, and the citizens of London ſent commiſſioners to their former ſovereign, who returned to England and reaſſumed the reigns of government; which however he held but a ſhort time; for dying in the year 1016, he was interred in the chancel of the old cathedral church of St. Paul.

On the demiſe of Ethelred, the citizens of London proclaimed his eldeſt ſon Edmund Ironſide; who was crowned king * by the archbiſhop of York, by the general conſent of the nobility and citizens.

Though the young king appeared altogether worthy of the crown to which he was raiſed, yet many of the nobility, and almoſt all the clergy, deſerted his cauſe, and declaring in favour of Cnut, or Canute,† not only proclaimed that prince king of England at Southampton,‡ but publicly abjured the whole race of Ethelred.

The citizens of London, however, remaining ſteady in their loyalty to the line of Ethelred, Canute, incenſed at this proof of their attachment, fitted out a powerful fleet, to reduce the city: but on his arrival, he found he could not paſs London-bridge, which the citizens, apprehending he would make ſuch an attempt, had ſtrongly fortified.

Hereupon Canute determined to beſiege the city by water as well as by land; in order to which he cauſed a cut or canal§ to be made thro' the marſhes on the ſouth ſide of the Thames, of a depth and breath ſufficient to convey his ſhips to the weſt of London-bridge, that he might prevent all ſupplies from entering the city, either by land or water.

The canal being finiſhed, and the ſhips conveyed to the weſt ſide of the bridge, Canute immediately aſſaulted the city with great fury: but the citizens made ſo gallant a reſiſtance, that Canute withdrew his army, leaving his ſhips, which formed a kind of blockade.

Canute retiring to the weſt, Edmund, at the head of his army, purſued him, and met with ſo much ſucceſs in ſeveral battles, that Canute was obliged to relinquiſh all thoughts of conquering London, and gave orders for his ſhips to ſail from the Thames.

After various trials for the ſuperiority, a peace was at length concluded between Edmund and Canute, by which the kingdom was divided between them, and London becoming a part of Canute's territories, he ordered his fleet into the Thames, and took up his winter quarters in this city.

The death of Edmund, which happened ſoon after the making this peace, put Canute into poſſeſſion of the whole kingdom; for that prince, ſummoning a parliament to meet at London, they ſwore allegiance to him, and renounced and abjured the ſons of Edmund.

Having thus obtained poſſeſſion of the throne, Canute determined on a refined ſtroke of policy, by ſending back his fleet to Denmark, and diſbanding his army, with a view to convince his ſubjects that his ſole reliance was on their affections.

The parliament, then aſſembled at London, were ſo pleaſed with this inſtance of his majeſty's confidence, that they granted him eighty-three thouſand pounds,‖ for the purpoſe of carrying this deſign into execution.

Of this ſum, which was an immenſe one at that time, ſeventy-two thouſand pounds were raiſed in the various parts of England, excluſive of London, and eleven thouſand in this city; a ſufficient proof what a great proportion it then poſſeſſed of the whole national riches!

Canute dying in the year 1036, a Witena-gemote, or convention of wiſe men, was held at Oxford, where earl Leofric, and moſt of the thanes on the north of the river Thames, together with the magiſtrates of London, made choice of Harold for their ſovereign; who immediately taking poſſeſſion of the whole kingdom, choſe the city of London for the place of his reſidence.

On the death of Harold, in the year 1039, commiſſioners were ſent from the nobility and citizens of London, to his brother Hardicanute, who was then at Bruges in Flanders, inviting him to come to England and accept the crown.

Hardicanute accepted the invitation; but was no ſooner in poſſeſſion of the throne, than he diſpatched proper perſons to dig up the body of his brother Harold, who was buried at Weſtminſter, and cutting off his head, to throw both head and body into the Thames.

By this act of inhumanity, and Hardicanute's extreme partiality to the Danes, the Engliſh were ſo diſguſted with their ſovereign, that they reſolved on a reſtoration of the Saxon line whenever his death ſhould give them an opportunity.

Accordingly, on the death of Hardicanute, which happened in the year 1041, prince Edward, ſurnamed the Confeſſor, was recalled from Normandy, and choſen king of England, in the city of London, by the general voice of the whole nation.

Not long after Edward's elevation to the throne, ſo dreadful a famine happened to this kingdom, that wheat was ſold at five ſhillings the quarter; * a prodigious price at that time.

A great council being held in the city of London, in the ſixth year of the reign of king Edward, it was therein reſolved to ſend out nine ſhips of war, to protect the coaſts of England againſt the piratical attacks of the Danes; as five other ſhips were to remain in port as guard-ſhips.

The court of Edward was crouded with his Norman friends and dependants, who having, by many vile inſinuations, exaſperated the ſovereign againſt Godwin, earl of Kent, that nobleman was ſummoned to anſwer the charge againſt him, before a great council aſſembled in London, to enquire into the truth of the allegations: but Godwin, aſſured that no endeavours, however unjuſtifiable, would be left untried, to accompliſh his deſtruction, refuſed to appear, unleſs pledges were given for his ſafe conduct: this, however, being denied, a proclamation was iſſued to baniſh him the kingdom.

Godwin, reſolved at all events to provide for his own ſecurity, having engaged many of the principal citizens to eſpouſe his cauſe, ſoon raiſed a conſiderable army, and fitted out a powerful fleet, with which he ſailed as high as London-bridge, and meeting with no oppoſition from the

In the interim, Godwin's army having arrived in Southwark, was drawn up on the ſouth bank of the Thames where they made a very formidable appearance.

The king was preparing to give battle to Godwin, and all ſeemed ripe for bloodſhed, when many of the nobility, anxious to prevent a needleſs effuſion of blood, propoſed a compromiſe between the king and the earl, by which the latter was reſtored to all his eſtates and honours, and the former engaged to diſmiſs all ſtrangers from places of truſt or profit in church or ſtate.

London ſubmits to William duke of Normandy, who grants two charters to the citizens. A tranſlation of thoſe charters. The building of the white ſquare Tower of London. Account of a dreadful hurricane, and fires in this city, with other remarkable events. King Henry I. grants a charter. The Londoners declare for king Stephen. Queen Maud diveſts the city of its privileges. London ſubmits to that queen. London again declares for king Stephen. The great wickedneſs of many of the citizens.

ON the death of Edward the confeſſor, which happened in the month of January 1066, Harold, ſon of earl Godwin, ſeized the crown; but he had to maintain the poſſeſſion by force of arms, againſt William duke of Normandy, who laid claim to the throne in conſequence of the laſt will of the late king, and Sweyn king of Denmark, whoſe claim was founded on his right of ſucceſſion from Canute.

The Danes backed the pretenſions of their monarch, by ſending a fleet and army into the river Humber, which laid ſiege to the city of York; but being entirely routed by Harold, they were obliged to return to Denmark, after having ſuſtained conſiderable loſs.

Harold now turned his arms againſt the duke of Normandy, with whom he had a moſt bloody battle near Haſtings in Suffolk, in which Harold himſelf was ſlain by an arrow ſhot through his left eye into the brain, and almoſt his whole army was cut in pieces.

Hereupon Edwin and Morchar, earls of Northumberland and Mercia, who arrived ſafe in London from the field of battle, propoſed to the citizens to place the crown upon the head of Edgar Atheling, as the moſt effectual method to ſave the kingdom from falling a prey to the victorious Norman, and to extricate themſelves from their preſent diſtreſſes.

The public was greatly divided in its opinion how to act in ſo critical a conjuncture; ſome being for an immediate ſubmiſſion to the conqueror, and others for taking the advice of Morchar and Edwin: but at length the latter party prevailing, a majority of the nobility and citizens declared for Edgar, and determined on defending the city againſt the duke of Normandy.

William, however, having authentic information of their proceedings, had marched to prevent their carrying their deſigns into execution, and was actually arrived in Southwark, when the Londoners ſallied out upon him, and fought ſo reſolutely, that though they were repulſed by five hundred of the Norman horſe, yet William was convinced that they would not be eaſily frighted into a ſubmiſſion.

Thinking, therefore, that the winter ſeaſon, which was now advanced, was an improper time to lay ſiege to a place of ſo much importance, he laid Southwark in aſhes, and marched to reduce the weſtern counties, having firſt prevailed on the clergy to eſpouſe his cauſe, and endeavour to engage the people in his intereſt.

Such was the influence of the clergy, that, according to a celebrated hiſtorian, † they prevailed on the citizens to make an abject ſubmiſſion to the conqueror.

As ſoon as this defection of the citizens was known to Edwin and Morchar, thoſe noblemen conſulted their own ſafety by retiring into the north of England; while the ſucceſsful William began his march towards this city, into which he was received by the magiſtrates and principal citizens, who delivered to him the keys of the city gates, acknowledged him their ſovereign, and in conjunction with the nobility and gentry entreated his acceptance of the crown.

The example of the capital was followed by the reſt of the kingdom, ſo that in a ſhort time William was in peaceable poſſeſſion of the throne.

Preparations were now made for the coronation of the new king, which was ſolemnized in Weſtminſter-abbey, on Chriſtmas-day, in the year 1066, by Aldred, archbiſhop of York.

William, doubtful of the attachment of a people who had ſo tamely ſubmitted to his dominion, in prejudice to the right heir, gave orders for the building of a ſtrong fortreſs in London, in order to preſerve, by the appearance of determined authority, what he had obtained by the ſucceſs of his arms, and the fears of his adverſaries.

The conqueror having made his public entry into London, and ſettled the mode of his government, made a viſit to his Norman dominions; and on his return, in the year following, was received in London by a ſolemn proceſſion, and with every external token of acclamation and joy.

William, reſolving to conciliate the affections of his new ſubjects rather by acts of favour than thoſe of ſeverity, granted a charter to the citizens of London in the Saxon tongue; which, as the French language began then univerſally to prevail, was conſidered as an obligation of the higheſt kind.

This charter, of which the following is a faithful tranſlation, is carefully preſerved in the archives of this city.

The firſt CHARTER of WILLIAM the conqueror. *

" WILLIAM the king ſalutes WILLIAM the biſhop, and GODFREY the portreve, and all the " Burgeſſes within London, both French and " Engliſh. And I declare that I grant you to be " all law-worthy, as you were in the days of king " Edward; and I grant that every child ſhall be " his father's heir, after his father's days: and I " will not ſuffer any perſon to do you wrong. " God keep you." †

There is preſerved in the ſame box with the above recited charter, a ſecond, which was alſo granted by king William the conqueror, to the citizens of London; and this, as well as the former, is written in their own language. This ſecond charter is very fairly written on a ſlip of parchment, of the length of ſix inches and a half, and the breadth of three quarters of an inch; ‡ the writing is quite legible, and in Engliſh runs thus:

The ſecond CHARTER of WILLIAM the conqueror.

" WILLIAM the king ſalutes WILLIAM the biſhop, and SWEYN the ſheriff, and all my " Thanes § in Eaſt Saxony; whom I hereby acquaint, that, purſuant to an agreement, I have " granted to the people my ſervants, the hide of " land at Geddeſdune. And alſo that I will not " ſuffer either the French or the Engliſh to hurt " them in any thing."

It is very extraordinary that this charter does not mention the perſons to whom the grant was made: but our writers are of opinion that by the people, we are to underſtand the citizens of London in a collective body; and that the hide of land conveyed by this grant was at Gaddeſden in Hertfordſhire.

King William the conqueror having brought with him a conſiderable number of Jews, from Roan in Normandy, they ſettled in London, in the ward of Coleman Street, in a place which is known by the name of the Old Jury to this day.

One of the greateſt fires which ever happened in London was in the year 1077, which beſides deſtroying the greater part of the city, had the farther ill effect of creating an enmity between the Engliſh and French, the former regarding the latter as the incendiaries; and this animoſity increaſed ſo much, that the king, doubtful of the fidelity of the citizens, cauſed the preſent great white ſquare tower of London to be erected, with a view to awe them into obedience.

This tower was built in the year 1079, under the inſpection of Gundulph, biſhop of Rocheſter, who, according to ſome hiſtorians, was eſteemed the greateſt architect of his age.

This metropolis had ſcarcely riſen from the aſhes of the dreadful fire abovementioned, when another conflagration broke out at Ludgate,

* This charter is very fairly written in the Saxon character, on a ſlip of parchment of the length of ſix inches, and breadth of one, and conſiſts of four lines and a quarter.

The ſeal of the charter is of white wax, but being broken into ſeveral pieces, they are ſewed up and carefully preſerved in an orange-colour'd ſilken bag. On one ſide is the conqueror on horſeback; and, on the reverſe, he is ſitting in a chair of ſtate:—the rim of the ſeal being almoſt gone, the only letters remaining are M. WILL.

† The following are the remarks of a learned and judicious antiquary on this charter. " 1. The burgeſſes were " declared all to be law-worthy. 2. That their children " ſhould be their heirs. Now there were two ways of being law-worthy, or having the benefit of the law. By the " ſtate and condition of mens perſons; ſo almoſt all freemen " had the free benefit of the law; but men of ſervile condition had not, eſpecially ſuch as were in Dominio, in Demeſne; for they received juſtice from their lords, were " judged by them in moſt caſes, and had not the true benefit of the law: ſo neither as to the ſecond obſervation in " this charter, could their children be their heirs, for they " held their lands and goods at the will of the lord, and " were not ſure to enjoy them longer than they pleaſed him. " The ſecond way of being law-worthy was, when men had " not committed any crimes, or done any thing for which " they forfeited the law, and deſerved to be outlawed; then " they were ſaid to be legales homines, recti in curia or law-worthy, but not ſo properly as in the firſt ſenſe of the " word.

" From hence we may make a very probable conjecture at " the meaning of this protection or charter. It is not to be " doubted, but that the Burgeſſes of London had obtained " of the Saxon kings ſeveral liberties and immunities, a- " mongſt which this was one, to be ſo far free, as not to be " in Dominio, or ſo obnoxious to any lord, but that, by rea- " ſon of their ſtate and condition, they might be law-worthy, that is, have the free benefit of the law; and likewiſe further (obtained, if it was not then a conſequent " of their perſonal eſtate and condition) that their children " ſhould be heirs of their lands and goods, and in both " theſe were free from the injuries and unreaſonable demands " and power of any ſevere lord; ſo that all the application " made by their biſhop William, and not unlikely by Godfrey the portreve, to the conqueror for them, was, that " their ſtate and condition might be the ſame it was in king " Edward's days, that their children might be their heirs, " and that they might in both be protected from the injury " and violence of imperious lords; which by the prevalency " of their biſhop were granted. Conſidering therefore, " that by the foregoing inſtances it is clear, that many or " moſt burgeſſes of other burgs were in Dominio, either of " the king, or ſome other lords or patrons in the time of " king Edward, and that the Londoners might fear the conqueror would break in upon their privileges, and reduce " them to the ſame condition; this was a great privilege " obtained."

which conſumed the cathedral church of St. Paul, and again rendered the greater part of the city a heap of ruins.

On the death of William the conqueror, which happened in the year 1087, the crown was placed on the head of his ſon William Rufus, to whom the Jews preſented ſuch large ſums, that, in a ridiculous fit of gratitude, his majeſty encouraged them to diſpute with the Chriſtians on the excellency of their reſpective faiths, promiſing that himſelf would embrace the Jewiſh religion, provided they came off conquerors: but hiſtory does not inform us that the debate was ever held.

In the month of November, in the year 1091, a moſt dreadful hurricane happened in this city, which blew down above ſix hundred houſes, together with many churches, and ſhattered the Tower of London very conſiderably.

But the moſt extraordinary conſequence ariſing from this hurricane was its blowing away the roof and part of the wall of the church of St. Mary-le-bow, in Cheapſide, by the fall of which two men were killed: the roof was carried by the violence of the wind to a conſiderable diſtance, where it fell with ſuch amazing force, that ſix of the rafters were forced above twenty feet deep into the ground, in almoſt the ſame poſition as they had ſtood on the church. *

A great part of this city was again deſtroyed by fire in the year 1093, and this calamity was ſucceeded by a great ſcarcity of corn, and almoſt all kinds of the neceſſaries of life.

In the year 1097, William Rufus impoſed grievous taxes on his ſubjects throughout the kingdom, to defray the charges of rebuilding London-bridge (which had been carried away by a land-flood) of erecting a ſtrong wall round the Tower of London, and building Weſtminſter-hall as it now ſtands.

In the year 1099, the river Thames, by an extraordinary ſwelling of the ſea, was driven weſtward with ſuch violence, that it overflowed its banks in many places, by which ſeveral towns and villages were laid under water, many of the inhabitants were drowned, and the large eſtate of Godwin, earl of Kent, was encroached on by the ſea, ſo that it could never afterwards be drained, but forms what is called the Godwin-Sands to this day.

There happened, in the year 1114, ſuch an amazing deficiency of water in the river Thames, that numbers of people paſſed on dry ground below London-bridge, and through ſeveral of its arches.

William Rufus was ſucceeded on the throne of England by his brother Henry the firſt, in the twenty-ſixth year of whoſe reign there was ſo dreadful a famine, that wheat was ſold at the high price of ſix ſhillings for a horſe load.

King Henry, at another period of time, being more in want of money to pay his army and his domeſtic ſervants, than of proviſions to ſubſiſt them, iſſued an order that his tenants, inſtead of ſupplying bread for a meal for a hundred men, ſhould pay one ſhilling; inſtead of a ſheep, four pence; and inſtead of oats for twenty horſes for one night, four pence.

The third charter we find granted to the city of London, was by this monarch; and the terms of it have always been conſidered as very advantageous to the city. The following is a faithful tranſlation of it.

" Henry, by the grace of God, king of Eng" land, to the biſhop of Canterbury, and to the " biſhops and abbots, earls and barons, juſtices
" and ſheriffs, and to all his faithful ſubjects of " England, French and Engliſh, greeting. Know
" ye, that I have granted to my citizens of Lon" don, to hold Middleſex to farm for three hun" dred pounds, upon accompt to them and their " heirs; ſo that the ſaid citizens ſhall place as " ſheriff whom they will of themſelves, and
" ſhall place whomſoever, or ſuch a one as they " will of themſelves, for keeping of the pleas of " the crown, and of the pleadings of the ſame,
" and none other ſhall be juſtice over the ſaid
" men of London; and the citizens of London,
" ſhall not plead without the walls of London for " any plea. And be they free from ſcot and " lot, and daneguilt, and of all murder, and " none of them ſhall wage battle: and if any of " the citizens ſhall be impleaded concerning the " pleas of the crown, the man of London ſhall
" diſcharge himſelf by his oath, which ſhall be " adjudged within the city; and none ſhall lodge
" within the walls, neither of my houſhold, nor " any other, nor lodging delivered by force.
" And all the men of London ſhall be quit
" and free, and all their goods, throughout
" England, and the ports of the ſea, of and
" from all toll and paſſage and leſtage, and all
" other cuſtoms; and the churches and barons
" and citizens ſhall and may peaceably and quiet-
" ly have and hold their ſokes with all their cuſ-
" toms; ſo that the ſtrangers that ſhall be " lodged in the ſokes, ſhall give cuſtom to none
" but to him to whom the ſoke appertains, or to " his officer, whom he ſhall there put: and a man
" of London ſhall not be adjudged in amercia-
" ments of money, but of one hundred ſhillings
" (I ſpeak of the pleas which appertain to money)
" and further, there ſhall be no more miſkenning
" in the huſtings, nor in the folkemote, nor in " any other pleas within the city; and the " huſtings may ſit once in a week, that is to ſay,
" on Monday: and I will cauſe my citizens to " have their lands, promiſes, bonds and debts
" within the city and without; and I will do
" them right by the law of the city, of the " lands of which they ſhall complain to me:
" and if any ſhall take toll or cuſtom of any " citizen of London, the citizens of London in " the city ſhall take of the borough or town,
" where toll or cuſtom was ſo taken, ſo much as
" the man of London gave for toll, and as he

* However incredible and aſtoniſhing this account may appear, yet we have the united teſtimony of all our hiſtorians to the truth of it; and before we haſtily determine againſt it, we ſhould conſider that the ſtreets of London were not paved in thoſe days, and that the ground whereon the roof happened to fall, was of a ſoft and boggy nature, which might eaſily be penetrated by ſo immenſe a weight.

" received damage thereby: and all debtors, " which do owe debts to the citizens of London, " ſhall pay them in London, or elſe diſcharge " themſelves in London, that they owe none; " but, if they will not pay the ſame, neither " come to clear themſelves that they owe none, " the citizens of London, to whom the debts " ſhall be due, may take their goods in the city " of London, of the borough or town, or of " the county, wherein he remains, who ſhall owe " the debt: and the citizens of London may " have their chaces to hunt, as well and fully as " their anceſtors have had, that is to ſay, in the " Chiltre, and in Middleſex and Surry.

" Witneſs the biſhop of Wincheſter, and Ro- " bert ſon of Richard, and Hugh Piggot, and " Almer of Totneſs, and William of Albs- " prima, and Hubert Roger, Chamberlaine, and " William de Mountfitchett, and Hangul Taney, " and John Ballet, and Robert ſon of Steward " of Weſt." *

This charter being an excellent ſecurity of the liberties of the citizens, they began to reduce their various cuſtoms into writing, to be thenceforward obſerved as laws; and the members of their arts and myſteries, which till this time had been kept up only by preſcription, were now eſtabliſhed into companies and fraternities; but the appointment of the portreve, or chief magiſtrate of the city, ſtill continued in the power of the king.

King Henry the firſt dying in Normandy, Stephen, earl of Bologn, nephew of the late king, and grandſon, by the female line, to William the Conqueror, privately haſtened to England, where by the aſſiſtance of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the biſhops of Wincheſter and Saliſbury, he found means to poſſeſs himſelf of the throne, in prejudice to the empreſs Maud, or Matilda, daughter of the late king, though theſe very eccleſiaſtics had ſolemnly ſworn to ſupport Matilda's claim.

The advancement of Stephen to the throne, which happened in the year 1135, was productive of a bloody war, by which the city of London ſuffered greatly; for theſe unconſcientious prelates artfully prevailed upon the citizens to receive Stephen into the city, and to eſpouſe his cauſe.

In the year 1136, a moſt dreadful fire broke out near London-bridge, which it deſtroyed, and raging in a furious manner to the weſtward as far as St. Clement's Danes, cauſed the moſt horrid devaſtation in its progreſs. †

The citizens of London, in the year 1139, purchaſed of king Stephen the right of chuſing their own ſheriffs, for which they paid his majeſty one hundred marks of ſilver.

* A former hiſtorian has the following obſervations on this valuable charter.

1. The citizens had their ancient cuſtoms and immunities confirmed to them, and likewiſe the county of Middleſex added to their juriſdiction in fee-farm, without homage, fealty, ſervice, or other conſideration, than a quit-rent of £300 per annum; with a power of not only appointing a ſheriff, but alſo a juſticiary from among themſelves, for holding the pleas of the crown: beſides whom, in the reign of the ſaid Henry, there appears to have been two other officers, under the appellation of ſheriffs, who, together with the former, accounted to the exchequer for the farm of the city: the number of which officers were in a fluctuating condition, till fixed in the time of Richard the firſt.

2. The conceſſion of Middleſex to the city was to prevent that county's being any longer an aſylum for bankrupts, cheats, and other fraudulent perſons; who, having deſerted London with the goods and effects of their creditors, lived there ſecurely in impunity, and open defiance of the injured.

3. The citizens valuable privilege, that they ſhould not be compelled to plead without the walls of the city, was granted them, that, if any citizen ſhould be impleaded or proſecuted concerning pleas of the crown, he might purge himſelf by an oath upon trial in the city.

4. The citizens by the ſaid charter were alſo exempt from Scot, Lot, and Daneguild; which were certain duties payable to the king by all his ſubjects.

5. And to be free from all murder; that is, when any murder ſhall happen in London, and the murderer or murdereſs make his or her eſcape, then, and in ſuch caſe, the city ſhall not be amerced for not producing the malefactor.

6. And none of them ſhall wage battle:—In the Saxon times, a perſon accuſed of a crime, whereof he could not acquit himſelf by evidence, was obliged to challenge the accuſer, and decide the ſame by a duel: this the citizens juſtly regarding as an intolerable grievance, were exempt therefrom by this charter.

7. That none of the king's houſhold, or other perſon, ſhall take lodging in the city by force:—by this gracious conceſſion the citizens got rid of a very great ſlavery; for, before this grant, the king's domeſtics, and whom elſe he pleaſed, were, by his arbitrary officer the portreve, quartered upon them at diſcretion.

8. That the citizens, with their goods and merchandizes, ſhall in all parts and ſea-ports of the kingdom be exempt from toll, paſſage and leſtage; that is, they ſhall not as formerly be liable to pay toll, at either fair or market, paſſage or ferriage for croſſing of rivers; nor leſtage, a certain duty paid in fairs and markets for each laſt of mercantile commodities.

9. That the churches, barons and citizens ſhould peaceably enjoy their ſeveral ſokes; that is, that the incumbent of no pariſh ſhall be moleſted on account of the glebe, or other lands belonging to the cure; nor the aldermen in reſpect of their wards, which then, being alienable, were ſold, aſſigned and conveyed, like other poſſeſſions; whereby the purchaſer or purchaſers became an alderman or aldermen of his or their reſpective purchaſes; as is evident by an eminent hiſtorian: by whom it likewiſe appears, that part of the aldermen's office at that time was, to aſſign proper lodgings for ſtrangers in their reſpective wards, for which they or their deputies received a certain pecuniary reward.

10. That no citizen ſhall be amerced beyond his ware; that is, the price of his head or life, which was valued at one hundred ſhillings.

11. There ſhall be no miſkenning in the huſtings, folkemote, or other pleas within the city: that is, no man ſhall unjuſtly proſecute another in any of the city courts, by deſerting his firſt plea, and aſſuming another; and, for the more regular and better diſtribution of juſtice, the court of huſtings is weekly to ſit on Monday.

12. That the citizens ſhall enjoy their properties, both real and perſonal, according to the conſtitutions of the city; and whatſoever city, town or place ſhall extort toll or cuſtom from any of them, they are by the ſaid charter empowered to make repriſals in London, upon the inhabitants of ſuch city, town or place where the ſame was exacted.

13. Upon the remiſſneſs of country debtors, in making proper payments, or in default of adjuſting accounts with the Londoners, they are impowered to attach the effects of all ſuch defaulters in London, for the diſcharge of their reſpective debts.

14. And the city privileges of hunting are confirmed in as ample a manner as their predeceſſors ever enjoyed the ſame in the counties of Middleſex and Surry, and the Chiltern.

† The above is the account of this fire by Matthew of Weſtminſter; but Stow ſays, that " it began in the houſe " of one Ailward, near London-Stone, and conſumed all " the way eaſt to Aldgate, and weſt to St. Erkenwald's " ſhrine in St. Paul's cathedral; both which it deſtroyed, " together with London-brige, which was then of wood."

March

March 1140, there was a total eclipſe of the ſun; and ſuch was the ignorance of the people in that age, that the citizens were in the utmoſt conſternation, from a ſuppoſition that the world was almoſt at an end. How much are we obliged to modern improvements in phyloſophical and aſtronomical knowledge, that even the loweſt of our people are now freed from thoſe needleſs terrors and apprehenſions, with which the minds of our anceſtors were agitated.

The army of king Stephen being routed, and himſelf made priſoner by the empreſs Maud, ſhe reſolved to wreak her vengeance on her enemies; and as ſhe looked upon the Londoners as her moſt inveterate foes, ſhe granted to Geffrey, earl of Eſſex, all the poſſeſſions which his grandfather, his father, or himſelf, had held of the crown, in lands, tenements, caſtles and bailiwicks; among which were the Tower of London, and the ſheriffwicks of London and Middleſex, which the grand father of the earl had held, at a fee-farm rent of three hundred pounds per annum.

Maud likewiſe granted to the ſaid earl Geffrey the office of juſticiary of London, and of the county of Middleſex; ſo that without his ſpecial licenſe, no perſon could hold pleas either in the city or county.

By this compact, which was a direct violation of the charter granted by king Henry, the citizens of London were deprived of ſome of their moſt important privileges.

King Stephen was now deſerted by many of his former adherents, and in particular by thoſe very eccleſiaſtics who had been the chief inſtruments of his advancement to the throne: for the biſhop of Wincheſter (who was brother to king Stephen) being at this time the pope's legate in England, having obtained from the empreſs Maud a ſolemn promiſe, ratified by an oath, that all the moſt important affairs both in church and ſtate ſhould be left to his direction, he forgot the oath of fidelity he had taken to king Stephen, and in a ſolemn aſſembly of the nobility and clergy, received the empreſs into the city of Wincheſter, and conducted her to the cathedral, where he pronounced ſentence of excommunication againſt all the adherents of Stephen, and abſolved ſuch of his friends as would join the empreſs's party.

The legate having ſummoned a general convention of the clergy to meet at Wincheſter, propoſed to them to recognize Maud as queen of England; and the whole council tacitly acceded to this propoſal.

However, they poſtponed coming to a final reſolution, till the arrival of the magiſtrates of London, who had been ſummoned to this convention: and theſe arriving on the ſecond day of the convention, inſtead of concurring with the ſentiments of the legate, earneſtly recommended the releaſe of king Stephen, as a circumſtance much deſired by the nobility reſiding in London, as well as by a great majority of the citizens.

In anſwer to this the legate advanced many arguments in defence of Maud's right to the crown, and concluded by obſerving that "it ill became "the citizens of London, who made ſo reſpectable a figure in the kingdom, to take part "with the cowardly barons, who had deſerted "their king in battle."

Notwithſtanding all the arguments of the legate, the citizens could by no means be induced to abandon Stephen, to whom they had ſworn obedience.

Hereupon the empreſs, who foreſaw the difficulty of eſtabliſhing herſelf on the throne, without the concurrence of the Londoners, entered into a treaty with them, and took up her reſidence at St. Alban's, to wait the event of their deliberations.

The city was now divided into different factions, one of which was for adhering to the intereſt of king Stephen, and the other for ſubmitting to Maud; but the latter prevailing, the city was at length ſurrendered to her, and ſhe was received therein with great pomp and ſolemnity.

The empreſs having ſucceeded to the height of her expectations, began to treat her ſubjects in general, and the Londoners in particular, with the greateſt arrogance; and when the latter requeſted her to reſtore to them the laws of king Edward, and to eaſe them of part of the taxes with which they were loaded, ſhe told them with the utmoſt diſdain, that as they had heretofore eſpouſed the cauſe of her enemy, they muſt expect no favour at her hands.

This inſolent behaviour had ſuch an effect on the citizens, that they entered into a conſpiracy to ſeize her perſon, which would certainly have been accompliſhed, had ſhe not privately withdrawn herſelf from the city, in conſequence of information ſhe had received of their intentions.

It was no ſooner publicly known that the empreſs had fled, than the populous aſſembled, and plundered her palace, and at length, by the powerful aſſiſtance of the citizens of London, ſhe was obliged to fly the kingdom, and king Stephen was reſtored to the throne.

Previous however, to the empreſs's leaving the kingdom, ſhe beſieged the caſtle of Wincheſter, but the citizens of London, and many of the barons of the kingdom, marched againſt her, and obliged her to raiſe the ſiege, after ſhe had ſuſtained conſiderable loſs.

The caſtle of Farringdon in Berkſhire, being occupied by the friends of Maud, king Stephen headed the citizens of London, who marching againſt it, ſoon took it by ſtorm.

In the year 1145, the price of an ox in London was three ſhillings: and we are told that in the year 1150 the ſummer proved ſo extremely wet, that a dearth almoſt equal to famine enſued; and the winter of this year was remarkable for a ſevere froſt, which commenced on the ninth of December, and continued till the beginning of March, during a great part of which time the Thames was frozen ſo hard, as to admit of carts and other carriages paſſing over the ice.

In the year 1158, the fourth year of king Henry the ſecond, the citizens of London paid the king one thouſand and forty-three pounds, which we apprehended to have been a gift from the city, to prevent its being tallaged.

In

In the ſame year there happened ſo remarkable a deficiency of water in the river Thames, that the citizens paſſed through the bed of the river on foot, without being wet.

In the reſpective years 1159, 1170, 1172, and 1173, the citizens of London made the king the following free-gifts, viz. one thouſand marks; ſix hundred and ſixty ſix pounds, thirteen ſhillings and four-pence; and a farther ſum of ſix hundred and ſixty-ſix pounds, thirteen ſhillings and four-pence, for each of the two latter years.

In the year 1175, the degeneracy of the citizens of London arrived at a greater height than perhaps at any period before or ſince: for it was then no unuſual thing, for the ſons of the richeſt and moſt reſpectable citizens, to form combinations for the horrid purpoſes of robbery and murder.

This banditti having attempted one night to rob the houſe of an eminent citizen, the owner cut off the right hand of the firſt that entered, and ſome neighbours coming to his aſſiſtance, the reſt of the gang made their eſcape.

The perſon who was diſabled, on the promiſe of a pardon, made a full diſcovery of his accomplices, among whom was one Senex, a wealthy citizen, who lived in the higheſt degree of reputation.

This man being apprehended, was brought to his trial and convicted; whereupon he offered five hundred pounds of ſilver for his pardon; which, according to the value of money at that time, was a full proof of his great riches: but the offer was rejected, and Senex met with the reward of his crimes, being hanged, as a terror to other offenders.

CHAPTER V.

Account of the firſt building of London-bridge, and of the burning of the wooden-bridge. An architect for building the ſtone bridge recommended by king John. Account of London-bridge in its ancient and modern ſtate, including every curious particular relative to that ancient ſtructure.

IT is ſomewhat doubtful at what period of time the ancient wooden bridge of London was firſt erected; we ſhall therefore give the opinion of various writers, and leave the reader to form his own opinion.

Stow, in his ſurvey of London, quotes the authority of Bartholomew Linſted, alias Fowle, the laſt prior of St. Mary Overie's church, in Southwark, in the following words: "A ferrie "being kept in the place where now the bridge "is builded; at length the ferriman and his wife "deceaſing, left the ſame ferrie to their only "daughter, a maiden, named Marie, which, "with the goods left by her parents, as alſo with "the profits ariſing of the ſaid ferrie, builded a "houſe of ſiſters, in a place where now ſtandeth "the eaſt part of St. Mary Overie's church, above "the queere, where ſhe was buried; unto the "which houſe ſhe gave the overſight and profits "of the ferrie: but afterwards the ſaid houſe of "ſiſters being converted into a college of prieſts, "the prieſts builded the bridge of timber, as all "other the great bridges of this land were: and "from time to time kept the ſame in good repa-"rations; till at length, conſidering the great "charges of repairing the ſame, there was, by "ayd of the citizens of London, and others, a "bridge builded with arches of ſtone."

A more modern writer, who does not appear to credit a word of this ſtory, ſays that, "to con-"vince poſterity of the truth of this relation, "the prior ought by ſome authority, firſt to have "ſhewn, that there anciently was a nunnery in "that neighbourhood, and when and by whom "the ſame was turned into a college of prieſts."

The ſame author likewiſe expreſſes his doubts whether there ever was any religious houſe in Southwark before the conqueſt: and he ſays that, after the ſtricteſt ſearch, he could not diſcover, either by record or tradition, other than that of the abovementioned Linſted, that there ever was ſuch a place in thoſe parts before that time: "For (continues he) the firſt religious houſe we "read of on that ſide the river, within the bill "of mortality, was the convent of Bermondſey, "founded by Alwin Child, a citizen of London, "in the year 1032;* and the ſecond in that "neighbourhood was the priory of St. Mary "Overy's, founded by William Giffard, biſhop "of Wincheſter, in the reign of Henry the "firſt."

In oppoſition to this opinion, a ſtill later writer obſerves, that the author "in this place relies on "the authority of Dugdale: but biſhop Tanner, "in his Notitia Eccleſiaſtica, is clear that this "antiquarian was miſtaken; and is of opinion, "that Stow's account, making biſhop Giffard "no more than a good benefactor, and aſcribing "the building of the body of the church "to him, is right: and though biſhop Tan-"ner confeſſes that nothing had occurred to "him in any book, printed or manuſcript, to "ſupport the contrary, except that of Stow, he "gives us an extract from Doomſday-book, "which ſeems to imply the truth of a monaſtic "foundation on this ſituation."

Linſted, the prior, having informed us, that the wooden bridge was not only erected, but kept in repair by the college of prieſts: a late writer on the contrary, ſays, "It is is evident that

* This was the ſixteenth year of the reign of William the Conqueror.

" the ſaid bridge was ſupported at a public " charge, as appears by a charter of Henry the " firſt, granted to Ralph, biſhop of Chicheſter, " &c. for exempting the manor of Alceſtone, " and other lands (given by the conqueror to the " abbot and canons of Battle in Suſſex) from " being charged to the work of London-bridge." This charter is as follows :

" Henry, king of England, to Ralph, biſhop " of Chicheſter, and all the miniſters of Suſſex, " ſendeth greeting: Know ye, &c. I command " by my kingly authority, that the manor called " Alceſtone, which my father gave with other " lands to the abbey of Battle, be free and quiet " from ſhires and hundreds, and all other cuſtoms " of earthly ſervitude, as my father held the ſame " moſt freely and quietly; and namely, from " the work of London-bridge, and the work of " the caſtle of Peverſey: and this I command " upon my forfeiture. Witneſs William de " Pontlearche at Berry.

Hereupon our author argues, that as it appeared only ſome religious foundations were exempt from the work of this bridge, and that even thoſe were exempted by charter, it is manifeſt that all civil bodies and incorporations were liable to contribute towards the repairs thereof; and that conſequently, Linſted, and thoſe who adopt his ſentiments, are wrong in aſcribing the honour of ſo public a work to a ſmall ſociety of religious perſons, whereas it is much more probable, that as they had been formerly ſupported by the ferry from London to Southwark, that they only gave their conſent to the building of the bridge, on being allowed an equivalent for the loſs of the ferry.

Upon the whole, this author is of opinion, that the firſt wooden bridge at London was erected in the reign of king Ethelred, between the years 993 and 1016, in the latter of which Canute, king of Denmark, cauſed a large canal to be made on the ſouth ſide of the river Thames, for conveying his ſhips to the weſt ſide of the bridge, as hath been already obſerved in a note, on the 23d. page of this work.

This wooden bridge was in a great meaſure deſtroyed by fire in the year 1136, and notwithſtanding the reparations then made, it was in ſo ruinous a condition in the year 1163, that it was thought neceſſary to build a bridge of ſtone; the ſuperintendance of which was given to Peter, the curate or miniſter of St. Mary Colechurch, who was then a perſon of the higheſt reputation for his ſkill in architecture.

The ancient wooden-bridge abutted on Botolph's wharf; but the new bridge of ſtone was ordered to be built a little farther to the weſtward; and a tax upon wool having been granted, towards defraying the expence of this great undertaking, a vulgar error aroſe from that circumſtance, that the bridge was built upon woolpacks.

It appears from undoubted authority, that either through death, or the infirmities attendant on a very advanced age, Peter, the curate of Colechurch, was prevented from finiſhing the great work he had undertaken; for among the records in the Tower of London there is a letter, dated in the third year of the reign of king John, in which that monarch recommends to the mayor and citizens of London, one Iſenbert, as a proper perſon to compleat the ſaid bridge: and the following is a faithful tranſlation of the ſaid letter.

" John, by the grace of God, king of Eng- " land, &c. to his faithful and beloved the mayor " and citizens of London, greeting.

" Conſidering how the Lord in a ſhort time " hath wrought in regard to the bridges of " Xaintes and Rochelle, by the great care and " pains of our faithful, learned and worthy " clerk, Iſenbert, maſter of the ſchools of Xainc- " tes; we therefore, by the advice of our reve- " rend father in Chriſt, Hubert, archbiſhop of " Canterbury, and that of others, have deſired, " directed and enjoined him to uſe his beſt endea- " vours in building your bridge, for your bene- " fit and that of the public: for we truſt in the " Lord that this bridge ſo neceſſary for you, and " all who ſhall paſs the ſame, will, through his " induſtry and the divine bleſſing, ſoon be finiſh- " ed. Wherefore, without prejudice to our " right, or that of the city of London, we will " and grant, that the rents and profits of the ſe- " veral houſes, that the ſaid maſter of the ſchools " ſhall cauſe to be erected upon the bridge afore- " ſaid, be for ever appropriated to repair, main- " tain, and uphold the ſame. And ſeeing the " neceſſary work of the ſaid bridge cannot be " accompliſhed without your aid and that of " others; we charge and exhort you kindly to " receive and honour the above-named Iſenbert, " and thoſe employed by him, who will perform " every thing to your advantage and credit, ac- " cording to his directions, you affording him " your joint advice and aſſiſtance in the premiſes. " For whatever good office or honour you ſhall " do to him, you ought to eſteem the ſame as " done to us. But ſhould any injury be offered " to the ſaid Iſenbert, or to the perſons employed " by him (which we do not believe there will) " ſee that the ſame be redreſſed, as ſoon as it " comes to your knowledge. Witneſs myſelf at " Molinel, the eighteenth day of April."

Notwithſtanding this royal recommendation of Iſenbert, it does not appear that the citizens accepted his ſervices towards the rebuilding their bridge; for none of our hiſtorians make mention of him as the architect, and it is well known that, after the death of Peter of Colechurch, the care of this great work was committed to Serle Mercer, William Almaine, and Benedict Botewrite, merchants of this city, under whoſe inſpection the firſt ſtone bridge was compleated in the year 1209.

When the building of the bridge was finiſhed, there was a chapel erected thereon, which was dedicated to St. Thomas, and endowed for two prieſts and four clerks.

This chapel was erected on the eaſt ſide of the bridge, on the ninth pier from the north end, and was ſixty feet long, twenty feet and a half wide, and fourteen high.

Beſide the entrance from the bridge, there was another from the river, and both of them were elegantly elegantly paved with black and white marble. There was a handſome ſepulchral monument in the middle of the chapel, under which it is imagined that Peter of Colechurch was buried.

A commodious dwelling houſe having been built over this chapel, it was occupied from time to time, by various perſons in trade; and the laſt tenants, before the total demolition of the houſes on London Bridge, were Wright and Gill, wholeſale ſtationers, by whom this venerable old chapel was converted into a warehouſe.

By a ſurvey of the Bridge made in the year 1730, it appeared that the exterior part of the foundation, on which the ſtone piers are laid, conſiſted of huge piles of timber, driven cloſe together, on the top of which were laid large planks ten inches in thickneſs, whereupon the baſes of the ſtone piers were laid, three feet below the ſterlings, and nine feet above the bed of the river.

It likewiſe appeared that the lowermoſt layers of the original ſtones, were placed with pitch inſtead of mortar, which we imagine was done with a view of preventing the water from damaging the work till it was advanced above the high water mark; for the modern method of building within a caiſſoon, as hath been ſucceſſfully practiſed at the erecting of the bridges at Weſtminſter and Blackfriars, was then totally unknown.

In the year 1280, which was but about ſeventy years after this ſtone bridge was compleated, it was found to be in ſuch a ruinous condition, that king Edward I. in the ninth year of his reign, granted to the keeper of the bridge, his licence to ſolicit the charitable donations of his ſubjects, towards keeping the ſame in repair.

The following is a faithful tranſlation of this royal brief or licenſe.

" The king, to all his baliffs, and liege ſub-
" jects, to whom theſe preſents ſhall come, greet-
" ing. It hath been lately repreſented unto us,
" and it grieves us to ſee, that London Bridge
" is in ſo ruinous a condition, that, unleſs it be
" ſpeedily repaired, it muſt inevitably fall down;
" and the great number of inhabitants dwelling
" thereon are in great danger of being deſtroyed:
" and that the work, which, taken in time,
" may now be prevented from falling, ſhall for " want of ſufficient help be reduced to ſo wretch-
" ed a condition, as not to be recovered out of " its ruins. Wherefore we, who are bound to " take care of, and by all gentle means to pro" vide for, both the public and private good,
" and affectionately to embrace thoſe whom we " perceive to be in need of our aſſiſtance, and
" to receive them under our royal protection:
" we command and require you, that, when the " keepers of the ſaid coſtly bridge aforeſaid, or " their meſſenger, or agent, ſhall come to you,
" authorized by our ſpecial licence and protec" tion, to collect every where throughout our " realm the aſſiſtance of our pious and well-diſ-
" poſed ſubjects, you do admit them friendly at
" the contemplation of God, and in regard of " charity, and for ſhew of devotion, on this be" half; not bringing on them, or permitting to " be brought, wrongs, moleſtations, loſs, hin" drance, or grievance: any, if and damage be " done them, that ye make them amends without " delay: and that, when the ſaid keepers, or " their meſſengers, ſhall apply for your aſſiſtance
" in the repairs of the ſaid bridge, ye ſhall
" chearfully contribute thereto, according to " your reſpective abilities. And let each of you
" ſtrive to out-run the other in ſuch great works
" of charity; for which ye muſt needs merit of " God, and have our thanks. In witneſs where-
" of, &c. witneſs the king at Walſingham, the " eighth day of January."

This method of raiſing money not proving ſufficient to defray the expences attending ſo large a work, his majeſty, in the year following, granted his letters patent for the taking a toll, to be applied to the purpoſe of repairing the bridge; of which we have ſubjoined a tranſlation.

The king to his mayor of London, &c. greeting.

" Whereas lately, by reaſon of the ſudden
" ruin of London Bridge, we commanded, that,
" aſſociating to you two or three of the moſt
" diſcreet and loyal men of the city aforeſaid, ye
" ſhould take unto our parliament after Eaſter
" next paſt, for the ſupply of the reparation of " the aforeſaid bridge, a certain cuſtom; as in " theſe letters patents, which we have cauſed to " be made from that time to you, more fully is " contained: we, being willing that the taking
" of the ſaid cuſtoms be continued longer, com" mand you, that from the feaſt of Margaret the " virgin next coming, unto the end of three years
" next following, to be completed, ye take the " under-written cuſtom of the aforeſaid bridge:
" to wit, of every man on foot bringing merchan-
" dize, or other things ſaleable, and paſſing over
" the ſaid bridge, and he taking himſelf to other " parts, as aforeſaid, with merchandize, or other
" ſaleable things, one penny: of every ſaleable
" pack, carried and paſſing over the bridge one
" half-penny, nor will we, in the mean time,
" that any thing be taken there on this occaſion,
" but in the ſubſidy of the reparation of the " bridge: and our will is, that the foreſaid
" cuſtom ſhall ceaſe, and become void, at the " full end and term of three years. Witneſs the " king at Cheſter, the ſixth day of July."

It may ſeem extraordinary that the bridge ſhould be in ſo decayed a condition within ſo ſhort a time after its being built; but this was partly owing to a dreadful fire, which breaking out in Southwark, burnt a part of St. Mary Overy's church, and a ſtrong ſouth wind driving the flakes of fire to the north ſide of the bridge, prevented the return of great numbers of people who had run from London to aſſiſt in extinguiſhing the fire in Southwark; and while they were attempting to get back through the flames at the north end of the bridge, the fire had extended from the borough of Southwark to the ſouth end of the bridge, ſo that more than three thouſand perſons either periſhed in the flames, or were drowned by the overſetting of boats and other veſſels, which went to aſſiſt them.

A very ſevere froſt, accompanied by a deep ſnow, in the year 1282, produced ſuch prodigious floods and immenſe loads of ice, that five arches of the bridge were broken down and deſtroyed; which, with the abovementioned accident of fire, eaſily accounts for the bad condition of the bridge, and the great need it had of repairs.

The reaſon of the crown interpoſing in the reparation of the bridge, appears from the following circumſtances: king John having taken the cuſtody of the bridge from the mayor of London, and given it to Friar Weſt, his royal ſucceſſors claimed the diſpoſal of it, and in the year 1269, king Henry III. granted the cuſtody thereof, with the liberties, and all matters thereto appertaining, to his queen conſort, who made no ſcruple of applying to her own uſe all the profits ariſing therefrom, while ſhe permitted the bridge to run to ruin.

In the reign of king Edward I. the citizens exhibited their complaint to the judges itinerant at the Tower, aſſerting their right to the cuſtody of the bridge, which at length, by the moſt unwearied perſeverance, they recovered.

There was antiently a tower on the north-ſide of the draw-bridge, which was firſt erected in the year 1426 and was built for the purpoſe of reſiſtign the attempts of an enemy.

By a careful admeaſurement made in the year 1725, it appeared that the length of the bridge was nine hundred and fifteen feet and one inch, the height of it forty three feet and ſeven inches, and the breadth of it twenty feet, excluſive of the houſes on each ſide, which, together, occupied a ſpace of fifty three feet, ſo that the whole breadth of the bridge was ſeventy three feet.

On the thirteenth of February in the year 1632, a dreadful fire broke out at a needle-makers near St. Magnus church, which burnt down two and forty houſes on the bridge, an accident which was in a great degree owing to a ſcarcity of water, the Thames being almoſt frozen over at the time.

The bridge remained in this ruinous condition for ſeveral years; but at length, in the year 1645 and 1646, ſeveral houſes, on the north ſide of the bridge, were rebuilt with timber, in a ſtrong and handſome manner.

By the terrible conflagration which laid this city in ruins in the year 1666, moſt of the houſes on the bridge were again deſtroyed, and the ſtone work received ſo much damage, that it coſt fifteen hundred pounds to repair it, before the houſes could be rebuilt.

In the year 1582 a water engine at London-bridge for the purpoſe of ſupplying the city of London with water, was erected under the inſpection of Peter Morrice, a Dutchman, which having been conſiderably improved ſince that time, by the care of ſeveral ingenious perſons, is at this time thought to be the beſt engine of the kind in the world.

In the year 1722 the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common council of this city, publiſhed the following order, to preſerve a free paſſage over the bridge.

" This court being ſenſible of the great in" conveniences and miſchiefs which happen by " the diſorderly leading and driving of cars,
" coaches, and other carriages over London-
" bridge, whereby the common paſſage there
" is greatly obſtructed, doth ſtrictly order and " injoin (purſuant to ſeveral former orders made
" by this court, for prevention of thoſe miſ-
" chiefs) that three ſufficient and able perſons be " appointed, and conſtantly maintained; one by " the governors of Chriſt's-Hoſpital, one by the " inhabitants of the ward of Bridge within, and " the other by the Bridge maſter: which three per-
" ſons are to give their diligent and daily attend" ance at each end of the bridge, and by all good
" means to hinder and to prevent the ſaid incon" veniences; and for that purpoſe to direct and " take care that all carts, coaches, and other, car-
" riages coming out of Southwark into this city,
" do keep all along on the weſt ſide of the ſaid
" bridge; and all carts and coaches, and other " carriages going out of this city, do keep all " along on the eaſt ſide of the ſaid bridge; and

In the year 1725, a fire breaking out at a bruſh-makers, greatly damaged the gate at the ſouth end of the bridge, and deſtroyed ſeveral of the neighbouring houſes. This gate was afterwards rebuilt with ſtone, with two poſterns for the convenience of foot paſſengers, and was compleated in the year 1728, at the expence of the city.

The want of a proper foot-path over the bridge having occaſioned the loſs of many lives, from the great number of carriages conſtantly paſſing over it, and the building leaſes being at length expired, a plan was projected for rebuilding the ſtreet over the bridge, with colonades on each ſide, ſo that the paſſengers might be ſheltered from the inclemencies of the weather, at the ſame time that they were protected from any danger that might ariſe from the number of horſes and carriages.

Not long afterwards a part of this plan was carried into execution, beginning at the north-eaſt end; and the advantages reſulting from this alteration were ſo great, that a wiſh to ſee the whole completed univerſally prevailed.

At length, in the year 1746, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common council, taking into their conſideration the number of lives that were loſt by the narrowneſs of the arches, which took up a fourth part of the bed of the river, and occaſioned a fall of five feet at low-water; and likewiſe the great expence of repairing the bridge, which had coſt no leſs than two thouſand pounds per annum for ſeveral years paſt, they reſolved to take down all the houſes on the bridge, and to widen and enlarge one or more of the arches.

The

The court therefore gave orders to their ſurveyor to draw a plan, and make out an eſtimate of the expence of the intended work; which being done, the whole amounted to £95,000.

It was now immediately reſolved not to grant or renew any leaſe or leaſes of the houſes, but to let the unexpired leaſes run out, and the houſes of courſe run to ruin.

Indeed Sir Chriſtopher Wren and Sir John Evelyn, had offered a plan of this kind, ſoon after the great fire in the year 1666; both thoſe gentlemen propoſing, inſtead of houſes on the bridge, to erect a ſtrong balluſtrade on each ſide of it.

The remarks of a gentleman who publiſhed a "Review of the public buildings of London" ſome years ago, are well worthy to be inſerted in this place.

"As ſome people (ſays he) are ignorant enough "to admire the bridge merely becauſe it is en- "cumbered with houſes from end to end; it will "not be amiſs to obſerve, that nothing can be "more ridiculous than this invention; nothing "can poſſibly offend the eye more, or extinguiſh "ſo many beauties as might take place, in caſe "this popular nuſance was removed: ſuppoſe "the preſent ſtructure of the bridge was ſtill to "continue as it is, there would, at leaſt, be room "for a magnificent breaſt-work and balluſtrade "above, and the top would afford one of the "fineſt proſpects in the world: on one hand a "fleet of merchant-ſhips, equal in value and im- "portance to half a nation; on the other, two "of the moſt conſiderable cities in Europe, "ſtretching along the banks of a beautiful river, "and ending with a diſtant view of the adjacent "landſcape."

For ſome years before the houſes on London-bridge were taken down, they leaned in ſuch a manner over the river, that a humane perſon could not look at them without terror, when he conſidered that many of them were inhabited; and while he dreaded the fate, he wondered at the folly and temerity of the inhabitants.

The elegant bridge at Weſtminſter likewiſe contributed in a great degree to convince the citizens of the advantages that would ariſe from the pulling down of the houſes; and it gave great ſatisfaction to the public, when, in the year 1756, the Lord-mayor, and common-council, applied to parliament to enable them to put this reſolution in practice.

An act of parliament was ſoon obtained, which enabled them to provide for the expence, by collecting a toll for every horſe and carriage that paſſed over the bridge, till the principal and intereſt of the money that ſhould be borrowed and laid out upon it, ſhould be repaid.

In a ſhort time after the paſſing of the act, orders were given for taking down the houſes on both ſides of the bridge to a conſiderable diſtance north of the gate.

The houſes and arches that extended acroſs the bridge being taken down, a ſtrong temporary bridge of wood was, with the moſt aſtoniſhing expedition, erected upon the weſtern ſterlings of the old bridge, for the paſſage of carriages, as well as of horſemen and perſons on foot, till the propoſed alterations ſhould be made; and in the month of October, 1757, this temporary bridge was opened, and found to be extremely ſafe and convenient.

But when the pavement of the old bridge was taken up, and an opening made into the cavities of all the piers; when ſome of them were taken down almoſt to the edge of the water, and all the ſpace on which the houſes had ſtood was a confuſed heap of ruins, the temporary bridge burſt ſuddenly into a flame, and was totally deſtroyed.

This fire began about eleven o'clock in the night of the eleventh of April, 1758, and by nine o'clock the next morning the temporary bridge was conſumed, though ſome pieces of timber among the ruins of the old ſtructure, together with the draw-bridge, continued on fire during the whole day.

There were various reports reſpecting the manner in which the bridge was ſet on fire. Some perſons declared, that about ten o'clock at night, they obſerved ſeveral people who appeared in liquor, coming over the bridge with a torch, and while ſome of them endeavoured to get it from the perſon who held it, he, in play, ſtrove to defend himſelf by burning them, and at length threw it over the boarded fence of the bridge, when the light diſappeared, till the timber below burſt into a flame.

On the contrary, the watchmen at the ſteelyard, thoſe on the cuſtom-houſe quay, and many other perſons, * declared that about eleven o'clock they obſerved ſome lights under the bridge, which appeared in ſeveral places like candles in lanthorns;

* The following is a copy of the depoſition of Mary, wife of John Dennis, living in George-alley, Thames-ſtreet, taken the 14th day of April, 1758, before the right honourable Sir Charles Aſgill, Knt. Lord-mayor of the city of London.

This deponent ſaith, That, about ten o'clock at night of the 11th of this month, ſhe, this deponent, was in the watch-houſe belonging to Dyers-hall, near London-bridge. That ſhe, being looking over the hatch of the ſaid watch-houſe, obſerved a lanthorn in the chapel pier of London-bridge. That ſoon after ſhe ſaw another lanthorn in the ſame place. That, ſoon loſing ſight of both lanthorns, preſently afterwards ſhe took notice of three lanthorns being upon the ſaid ſpot. That, upon obſerving the firſt lanthorn, ſhe ſuppoſed there might be ſome lighter or barge at the bridge; but when ſhe ſaw the ſecond lanthorn, ſhe perceived the lights were amongſt the wood-work of the ſaid pier: and that when the three lanthorns were there together, ſhe took notice one of them was held down. Another was at a ſmall diſtance; and the third was held up towards the upper part of the wood-work: which made her ſuppoſe there were workmen employed to rectify ſome defect in the bridge. This deponent farther ſaith, that in a ſhort ſpace of time, the lanthorns being all gone, ſhe ſoon after perceived, in the abovenamed place, a ſmall flame, which being dampt for a ſhort time, it then roſe again. That, after the flame's appearing damp the ſecond time, it blazed out very much. Upon which ſhe, this deponent, went to the next wharf to give notice London-bridge was on fire.

Note. This depoſition was confirmed by ſome people, who declared they ſaw the lanthorns from Cuſtom-houſe quay. It was alſo in part confirmed by the watchmen on the bridge. For theſe latter declared, that, upon the firſt alarm of fire, they ran down to the ſterling of the pier that was then almoſt removed to make the preſent great arch, when they perceived, juſt under the very centre of the temporary bridge, a ſmall flame, which, as they could not get near, ſoon ſpread itſelf with great velocity.

thorns; and that ſoon after this, the bridge burſt into flames from one end to the other.

This dreadful conflagration filled the citizens and the inhabitants of Southwark, with the apprehenſion that their intercourſe with each other would in a great degree be prevented for a long time; and it was the univerſal opinion that the bridge was purpoſely ſet on fire.

The Lord-mayor, who attended almoſt the whole time of the fire, gave every neceſſary direction for ſtopping the progreſs of it; but all proved ineffectual; and in the morning his lordſhip waited on Mr. Secretary Pitt, with the ſhocking news of this diſaſter.

His majeſty's pardon being immediately obtained for any perſon who would diſcover the authors of the calamity, except the perſons who actually committed the fact, the Lord-mayor ſummoned a court of common council, who reſolved to offer a reward of £200 for diſcovering the vile incendiaries; but no diſcovery was ever made reſpecting this very extraordinary affair.

The builders of the bridge were now aſked how ſoon they could poſſibly render it paſſable for carriages; and the public were very agreeably ſurprized when they promiſed to compleat it within three weeks, on condition of being allowed to employ a great number of hands, and permitted to work ſundays.

"But this ſurprize (ſays an ingenious writer) "was greatly increaſed, when they found that "by keeping men conſtantly at work, day and "night, this great work was compleated, and "the old bridge opened again in leſs than a "fortnight; and that in this ſhort time thoſe "arches that had been taken down, and the deep "cavities in all the piers lately uſed for cellars, "were covered over; the piers which had been "demoliſhed had ſtages formed of large beams "of timber raiſed to ſupport the upper works, "and the whole track of ruins was covered "with rows of ſtrong beams placed cloſe toge-"ther; theſe were gravelled over to a conſider-"able depth, and a ſtrong wooden fence, on "each ſide, raiſed about ſix feet high, with "places formed for foot paſſengers to ſtand in at "proper diſtances, to ſecure themſelves from "being hurt by the carriages.

"This great work was no ſooner finiſhed with "ſuch amazing expedition, than preparations "were made for a new temporary bridge, which "was ſoon after begun, and in a ſhort time was "opened."

The great loſs the city had ſuffered by the burning of the temporary bridge, induced the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, to apply to parliament for relief; when that body, rendering the repairing and beautifying of London bridge a national concern, an act was paſſed the ſame year, for granting the city fifteen thouſand pounds, towards the carrying on of that work; upon which two toll-booths that had been erected for receiving the toll granted by a former act, were immediately taken down, and all horſes and carriages ſuffered to go toll free.

London-bridge has been denominated by ancient writers "The bridge of the world," "The "wonder of the world," and "The bridge of "wonders:" but we ſhall hardly ſuffer ourſelves to be deceived by theſe pompous titles, if we conſider it even in its preſent much improved ſtate; for the wretched diſproportion of its arches, and the great fall of water, by which the lives of many of his majeſty's ſubjects are annually loſt, are a diſgrace to this city: but we hope the time is advancing, when a ſenſe of the dangers and inconveniences of this bridge, will inſpire thoſe in whoſe power it is, to apply for the aid of parliament towards erecting a ſuperb and magnificent ſtructure, which may do equal honour to the taſte, policy, and humanity of the preſent age.

CHAPTER VI.

The mayor of London acts as chief Butler at the coronation of Richard the firſt. A great maſſacre of the Jews. Preparations made for the king's expedition into Paleſtine. Regulations reſpecting the building of houſes in the city and liberties. A charter of confirmation granted by Richard I. The ſingular hiſtory of William Fitz-Oſbert. The valuable charter of king Richard I. by which the city of London claims the juriſdiction and conſervancy of the river Thames. A conciſe, but accurate account of that noble river.

IN the year 1189, the chief magiſtrate of London, claimed to act as chief butler at the coronation of king Richard the firſt; and as this claim was admitted, and he did actually officiate, there can be little doubt but the ſame office was exerciſed by his predeceſſors, though this is the firſt mention of this circumſtance in hiſtory.

An intimation was given to the Jews reſiding in London, that they muſt not make their appearance at Weſtminſter, on occaſion of the coronation: but notwithſtanding this, ſome of thoſe people, prompted by motives of curioſity, did attempt to get into Weſtminſter-abbey; where they were repulſed by ſome of the king's domeſtic ſervants, and a report was immediately propagated, that his majeſty had given orders that all the Jews ſhould be deſtroyed.

Hereupon the populace immediately attacked thoſe poor people, and killed all they could lay their hands on; not content with which, they haſtened into the city, where they maſſacred great numbers numbers of the unfortunate Jews, robbed their houſes, and then ſet them on fire.

This horrid deed was applauded by the monks, who pretended that it was a meritorious action; but the king appears to have been of a very different opinion; for he immediately iſſued orders for apprehending the murderers, ſeveral of whom being taken, the ring leaders were hanged on the day after the dreadful maſſacre.

Not long after the coronation of king Richard, that monarch, having determined to fulfil a treaty, his father had concluded with the king of France, relative to a joint expedition to the Holy-land, directed his precepts to Henry de Cornhil, then ſheriff of London, to provide a certain number of helmets, ſteel caps, ſhields, ſpears, pavillions, and other military accoutrements; and alſo ſilken habits, mitres, caps, dalmatiques, coats, and wine, for the uſe of his majeſty.

In the year 1191 the magiſtrates of London, taking into their conſideration the great damages ſuſtained by the citizens, on the breaking out of fires among houſes built of wood, and thatched with ſtraw or reeds, ordained that "all houſes "thereafter to be erected in London, or within "the liberties thereof, ſhould be built of ſtone, "with party walls of the ſame, and covered "either with ſlates or tiles;" and it was farther provided, "to appeaſe contentions that might "ariſe among neighbours, upon incloſure be-"tween land and land, that twelve aldermen of "the city ſhould be choſen in full huſting, and "theſe ſworn to attend the mayor in making the "propoſed regulations."

Theſe regulations were that "the party walls "ſhould be built with ſtone, and be at leaſt three "feet in thickneſs and ſixteen in height, and "theſe magiſtrates were likewiſe to give direc-"tions reſpecting girders, windows, gutters, and "wells."

In the year above-mentioned the earl of Moreton, * attended by moſt of the biſhops and the nobility, aſſembled in St. Paul's church yard, where they were met by the principal citizens of London, by whoſe joint concurrence, William Longchamp, chancellor, biſhop of Ely, and one of the regents during the abſence of the king, was unanimouſly degraded from the high offices which he held, for his proud, inſolent and tyrannical behaviour.

The ready concurrence of the citizens to this act of degradation, gave ſo much ſatisfaction to the earl of Moreton, and the other members of the regency, that they confirmed the ancient privileges of the city, and ſwore to maintain the ſame during his majeſty's pleaſure.

In grateful acknowledgement of ſo ſingular a favour, the Londoners took an oath of fidelity to king Richard and his heirs, and engaged that in caſe of his death without iſſue, they would acknowledge his brother John for their ſovereign, ſwearing fealty to him in preference to every other perſon except king Richard.

From the circumſtances above recited, it is obſervable, that at this period the citizens of London were held in the moſt reſpectable light, as their advice was thought indiſpenſably neceſſary, in an affair of ſo much conſequence as the degrading an inſolent and deſpotic miniſter.

On king Richard's return to England, he was received by his faithful citizens, with every teſtimony of the ſincereſt joy, and with a pomp and magnificence becoming the ſentiments of loyalty which they expreſſed.

In grateful return for theſe tokens of loyalty, and in conſideration of the fidelity of the citizens of London during his abſence, king Richard granted them a charter of confirmation, of which the following is a faithful tranſlation.

"Richard, by the grace of God, king of "England, duke of Normandy, and earl of An-"jou; to his archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, earls, "barons, juſtices, ſheriffs, miniſters, and all "others his faithful French and Engliſh people, "greeting.

"Know ye, that we have granted to our citi-"zens of London, that none of them may plead "without the walls of the city of London, for "any pleas, ſaving pleas of foreign tenures, "(except our monyers and miniſters): alſo we "have granted to them acquittal of murder "within the city, and in Portſoken; and that "none of them may wage battle; and that they "may diſcharge themſelves of pleas belonging "to the crown, according to the ancient cuſtom "of the city; and that none may take any lodg-"ings within the walls of the city by force, or "by delivery of the marſhal.

"This alſo we have granted to them, that all "the citizens of London be free from toll and "leſtage, throughout all England, and the ſea "ports; and that none be adjudged of amercia-"ments of money, but according to the law of "the city, which they had in the time of king "Henry, grandfather to Henry our father; and "that there be no miſkenning in any place within "the city; and that the huſtings be kept only "once a week; and they juſtly have all their "lands and tenures, and premiſes, and all o-"ther their debts, whoſoever do owe them to "them, and that right be done to them, ac-"cording to the cuſtom of the city, of all their "lands and tenures, which they have within the "city; and of all their debts which ſhall be lent "at London, and of promiſes there made: the "pleas ſhall be holden at London; and, if any "in all England ſhall take toll or cuſtom of the "men of London, after he ſhall fail of right, "the ſheriff of London, may take goods thereof "at London.

"Alſo we have granted to them, that they "may have their huntings whereſoever they had "the ſame in the time of king Henry, grandfa-"ther to Henry our father. Furthermore alſo, "for the advancement of the city, we have grant-"ed to them, that they all be acquit of all Brid-"toll, Childwite, Jeriſgive and Scotale; ſo that "no ſheriff of London, or any other bailiff, "ſhall make any Scotale. The ſaid cuſtoms we "do grant to them, and all other liberties and "free cuſtoms which they had in the time of "king Henry, grandfather unto Henry our fa-"ther,

* Afterwards king John.

" ther, when as they more better and freely had " the ſame. Wherefore we will and ſteadfaſtly " command, that they and their heirs have and " hold all their things aforeſaid of us and our " heirs.

" Witneſs Hubert, archbiſhop of canterbury; " R. biſhop of Lincoln; Ralph, earl of Cheſ- " ter; R. earl of Clarence; Will. Marſhall, " Rog. Bigolt. Jeophery, ſon of Peter; Hugh " Bardolph, Will. Brewer, and Will. Warren. " Given by the hand of William, biſhop of " Ely, our chancellor, at Wincheſter, the " twenty third of April, in the fifth year of " our reign.

It would be ſuperfluous to inform ſuch of our readers as are acquainted with the Engliſh hiſtory, that king Richard, on his return from Paleſtine, was unjuſtly detained a priſoner by the Emperor Henry VI. * but it will be proper to obſerve, that ſoon after his majeſty's return to England, the citizens of London paid the ſum of fifteen hundred marks towards his ranſom.

In the year 1195 the tranquillity of this city was greatly diſturbed by one William Fitz-Oſbert, alias Longbeard, and his adherents, the particulars of whoſe conduct we will faithfully recite, as given by our beſt hiſtorians.

The perſon of Fitz-Oſbert was deformed, and he obtained the appellation of Long-beard, from his permitting his beard to grow to an unuſual length, partly from an affectation of gravity, and partly in deriſion of the Norman cuſtom of ſhaving the face.

The greateſt enemies of Fitz-Oſbert acknowledge, that being a perſon of moſt powerful elocution, he became the profeſſed advocate of the poorer citizens, againſt the oppreſſions of the more wealthy; and having frequently pleaded the cauſe of the poor before the magiſtrates, he became the idol of the lower orders of the people, who were univerſally at his devotion.

Matters being thus ſituated, Fitz-Oſbert began to act more openly, and made uſe of all his rhetoric to incenſe the people againſt a certain aid or tallage, which was to be raiſed for the ſervice of the public.

Fitz Oſbert inſiſted that this tax was proportioned in a very unjuſt manner, for that the poor were to bear the burden of almoſt the whole, while the rich were in a manner exonerated: and this inſinuation wrought ſo powerfully on the minds of the people, that a tumult enſued near St. Paul's church, in which many of the citizens were killed.

Advice of this inſurrection being tranſmitted to Hubert, archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was the king's juſticiary, that prelate ſummoned Fitz-Oſbert to appear before him, at a fixed time and place.

Fitz-Oſbert obeyed the ſummons, but was attended by ſuch a numerous croud of his adherents, that the archbiſhop, inſtead of ſeizing his perſon, thought it neceſſary for his own ſafety to diſmiſs him with a gentle reproof, and his advice not to appear in any unlawful aſſembly for the future.

The more wealthy among the citizens being greatly terrified at the proceedings of Fitz Oſbert and his party, it was at length agreed that a number of men ſhould lay in wait to ſeize him at a time when he had but few attendants; and an opportunity of this kind ſoon offered; but Fitz-Oſbert, with the few friends he had with him, made a moſt deſperate defence, and having poſſeſſed themſelves of the church of St. Mary-le-bow in Cheapſide, they fortified the ſteeple, with a full determination of defending themſelves till further aſſiſtance ſhould arrive.

The ſituation of Fitz-Oſbert and his friends was no ſooner known, than the populace, from all parts in and near the city, aſſembled in Cheapſide, with the view of ſetting their champion at liberty: but the magiſtrates uſed ſuch perſuaſive arguments, that the people were at length prevailed on to diſperſe.

Matters were in this ſituation, when a reſolution was formed of ſetting fire to the ſteeple, ſo that Fitz-Oſbert and his abettors had no chance, but to force their way through the flames and fight for their lives, or to be burnt on the ſpot.

It cannot be doubted but they choſe the former expedient, as the leſs dreadful of the two; wherefore making an impetuous ſally, they endeavoured to ſeek their ſafety by wading through the blood of their opponents: but being overpowered by ſuperior numbers, Fitz-Oſbert and eight of his adherents were made priſoners, and committed to the Tower of London.

The next morning they were brought to their trial; and ſentence of death being paſſed upon them, they were allowed only one night to make their peace with heaven; for on the following day they were drawn by the feet through the city to a part of Smithfield then called the Elms, where they were publicly executed, and then hung in chains.

Still, however, the diſturbances were not wholly appeaſed; for the body of Fitz-Oſbert being taken down and carried away, a report was immediately propagated by a prieſt who was a kinſman of the deceaſed, that ſeveral miracles had been wrought at the place of his execution.

Hereupon vaſt numbers of people reſorted to Smithfield, many of whom picked up and carried away, as holy relicks, pieces of the earth on which the blood of their champion had been ſpilt, while others continued there the whole night in the utmoſt fervors of devotion; nor did they quit the place till a military guard was ſent, by whom they were at length, though with great reluctance on their part, diſperſed to their reſpective habitations.

It was now thought neceſſary, in order to undeceive the deluded populace, to make public the life of Fitz-Oſbert, which was accordingly done by authority; his relation, the prieſt, was excommunicated for attempting to deceive the people, who hereupon applied quietly to their

reſpective occupations, and all the riots and tumults ſubſided.

Such is the account of this extraordinary affair, as related by ſeveral of our hiſtorians; who, while they load Fitz-Oſbert with the opprobrious names of perfidious, turbulent and implacable villian, impoſtor, incendiary and traitor, do not advance one ſolid argument to prove that he was not a real friend to the poor, a ſtaunch defender of the liberties of his fellow citizens. How contemptible are theſe writers rendered, by ſuch egregious and ſcandalous partiality!

In the year 1197, king Richard the firſt granted a moſt valuable charter to the citizens of London, of which the following is a faithful copy:

"Richard, by the grace of God, king of "England, duke of Normandy, and earl of "Anjou, to his archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, "earls, barons, juſtices, ſheriffs, ſtewards, con"ſtables, bailiffs, miniſters, and all his faithful "ſubjects, greeting.

"Know ye all, that we for the health of our "ſoul, and for the ſoul's health of our father, "and all our anceſtor's ſouls: and alſo for the "commonweal of our city of London, and of all "our realm, have granted and ſtedfaſtly com"manded, that all wears that are in the Thames "be removed, whereſoever they ſhall be within "the Thames: and that no wears be put any "where within the Thames: alſo we have quit"claimed all that which the keeper of our tower "of London was wont yearly to receive of the "ſaid wears. Wherefore we will and ſtedfaſtly "command, that no keeper of the ſaid tower, "at any time hereafter, ſhall exact any thing of "any one, neither moleſt or burden, or any de"mand make of any perſon, by reaſon of the "ſaid wears. For it is manifeſt to us, and by our "right reverend father, Hubert, archbiſhop of "Canterbury, and other our faithful ſubjects, "it is ſufficiently given us to underſtand, that "great detriment and diſcommodity hath grown "to our ſaid city of London, and alſo to the "whole realm, by occaſion of the ſaid wears. "Which thing, to the intent it may continue "for ever firm and ſtable, we do fortify by the "inſcription of this preſent page, and the put"ting to of our ſeal: theſe being witneſſes:

"John of Worceſter, Hugh of Coventry, "biſhops; John earl of Moreton, Ralph earl "of Cheſter, Robert earl of Leiceſter, William "earl of Arundel, William of St. Mary's church, "Peter ſon of Hereb, Matthew his brother, "Simon of Ryma, Scherio de Quincero. Given "by the hand of Euſtace dean of Saliſbury, "vice-chancellor, then agent at the Iſle of "Audlyer, the fourteenth day of July, in the "eighth year of our reign."

In conſideration of this charter the citizens paid the king fifteen hundred marks: and if we conſider the amazing importance of the river Thames, we muſt acknowledge that the purchaſe was a very valuable one.

As the juriſdiction of the Lord-mayor of the city of London over the river Thames is very extenſive, and as this noble river is the principal ſource of the wealth of this metropolis, our readers will be pleaſed with a particular deſcription of it; and we ſhall endeavour to be as entertaining as conciſe in our account.

If we conſider the Thames with reſpect to its courſe and navigation, we muſt acknowledge that it is unequalled by any river in the known world.

This wonderful ſtream takes its riſe from a ſmall ſpring near the village of Hemble, in the pariſh of Cubberley, or Coberly, a little to the ſouth-weſt of Cirenceſter in Glouceſterſhire; and taking its courſe eaſtward, becomes navigable at Lechlade for veſſels of fifty tons, and there receives the river Colne, about one hundred and thirty-eight miles from London.

It continues its courſe north-eaſt from Lechlade till it reaches Oxford, where it receives the Charwell; after which it runs ſouth-eaſt to Abingdon, and from thence to Dorcheſter, where it receives the Thame, and continuing its courſe to the ſouth-eaſt by Wallingford to Reading, flows through Berkſhire, Buckinghamſhire, Middleſex, Eſſex and Kent, and waſhes the towns of Henley, Marlow, Maidenhead, Windſor, Eaton, Staines, Chertſey, Weybridge, Shepperton, Sunbury, Hampton, Thames Ditton, Kingſton, Twickenham, Richmond, Shene, Iſleſworth, Kew, Brentford, Mortlake, Barnes, Chiſwick, Hammerſmith, Putney, Fulham, Wandſworth, Batterſea, Chelſea, and Lambeth, from whence both ſhores may be conſidered as a continued city, through Weſtminſter, Southwark, and the city of London, Horſleydown, Wapping, Rotherhithe, Shadwell, Ratcliff, Limehouſe, almoſt to Deptford and Greenwich; and from thence this river proceeds to Woolwich, Erith, Grays, Graveſend and Milton.

It is not in the power of language to deſcribe the beauties which adorn the banks of this noble river from Windſor to London; the numerous villages on each ſide being embelliſhed with the magnificent houſes, and elegant gardens of the nobility and gentry.

Thoſe who have not been accuſtomed to ſuch a ſight, would view with wonder and ſurprize the prodigious number of barges and boats, as well thoſe of pleaſure as of burden, continually paſſing and repaſſing above London-bridge, for the convenience and ſupply of the towns and counties through which the Thames runs; and ſtill greater would be their aſtoniſhment on beholding the vaſt fleets which conſtantly appear below bridge, which are continually exporting the manufactures of this kingdom, and bringing back the productions of every part of the globe.

In this place our readers will be pleaſed with Sir John Denham's moſt admirable deſcription of this river, which for juſtneſs of ſentiment and elegance of language, has never been excelled, poſſibly never equalled.

My eye deſcending from the hill ſurveys:
Where Thames among the wanton valleys ſtrays:
Thames, the moſt lov'd of all the Ocean's ſons,
By his old ſire, to his embraces runs,
Haſting to pay his tribute to the ſea,
Like mortal life to meet eternity.

Tho' with thoſe ſtreams he no reſemblance hold,
Whoſe foam is amber, and their gravel gold;
His genuin and leſs guilty wealth t'explore,
Search not his bottom, but ſurvey his ſhoar;
O'er which he kindly ſpreads his ſpacious wing,
And hatches plenty for the' enſuing ſpring.
Nor then deſtroys it with two fond a ſtay,
Like mothers which their infants overlay.
Nor with a ſudden and impetuous wave,
Like profuſe kings, reſume the wealth he gave.
No unexpected inundations ſpoil
The mower's hopes, nor mock the plowman's toil:
But godlike his unwearied bounty flows;
Firſt loves to do, then loves the good he does.
Nor are his bleſſings to his banks confin'd,
But free and common as the ſea or wind;
When he to boaſt, or to diſperſe his ſtores
Full of the tributes of his greateful ſhores
Viſits the world, and in his flying tow'rs
Brings home to us, and makes both Indies ours;
Finds wealth where 'tis, beſtows it where it wants,
Cities in deſerts, woods in cities plants.
So that to us no thing, no place is ſtrange,
While his fair boſom is the world's exchange.
O could I flow like thee, and make thy ſtream
My great example, as it is my theme!
Tho deep, yet clear, tho' gentle, yet not dull,
Strong without rage, without o'erflowing full;
Heaven her Eridanus no more ſhall boaſt,
Whoſe fame in thine, like leſſer currents loſt.

The great advantage from the river Thames ariſes from the tides flowing above ſeventy miles up it, twice in every twenty-four hours; and hence alſo ariſes its great convenience with reſpect to trade and navigation; and as the tide is influenced by the moon, ſo each tide is twenty-four minutes later than that preceding it, and therefore there is but twelve minutes wanting of a whole hour in twenty-four.

By this rule the return of the tide to London-bridge, at any diſtance from the new or full moon, may be eaſily computed by the following tide table.

N. Moon / F. Moon.	Hour. 3		Min.
1	3	Time of high-water at London.	48
2	4		31

A perſon deſirous of learning when it will be high water at London-bridge, may by this table be immediately ſatisfied, provided he knows how many days it is ſince the laſt new or full moon; for ſuppoſing it is the eighth day after, by looking at the figure 8 in the firſt column, he will find the tide on that day to be at the eighth hour and twenty-four minutes, or twenty four minutes eight o'clock.

This table, however, can only be depended on when the tide is regular, and not interrupted by accidents; for if the wind blows hard at weſt or ſouth weſt, it will prevent the tide from flowing to its uſual height; and a contrary effect is produced by a hard gale at north-weſt.

The juriſdiction of the Lord-mayor of London over the river Thames, extends from Colne-ditch a little to the weſtward of Staines-bridge, to Yendal or Yenleet, to the eaſt, including part of the rivers Medway and Lea; and his lordſhip has a ſubſtitute or deputy, called the water-bailiff, whoſe office is to ſearch for and puniſh all perſons infringing the laws made for the preſervation of the river and the fiſh therein.

The Lord-mayor and aldermen hold courts of conſervancy eight times in the year, in the counties of Middleſex, Surry, Kent, and Eſſex, in order to maintain the rights and privileges of the river Thames, and to charge four juries on oath to make enquiry after all offences committed on the river, in order to proceed to judgment againſt ſuch as may be found offending.

There are many laws reſpecting the fiſhery and the preſervation of the fry and ſpawn, from among which we have ſelected the following as the moſt important.

" No fiſherman ſhall uſe any net under two " inches and a half in the meſh above Richmond " Crane, nor any net in the work called beating " of the buſh, flag or reed, of leſs than three " in the meſh; nor uſe any weights or ſtones to " their nets, upon the forfeiture of forty ſhil- " lings for each offence.

" That no pike-net, or other net or engine be " drawn over the weeds for catching of pikes, " by any fiſherman within the juriſdiction of the " Lord-mayor, by reaſon it is deſtructive to, and " occaſions the driving of all the other fiſh out " of the weſtern rivers, that would otherwiſe lie, " ſpawn, and breed in the weeds, upon the ſame " penalty of forty ſhillings for every ſuch offence.

" That no fiſherman ſhall bend any net by " anchors, or otherwiſe, acroſs the channel, ſo " as to draw another net into it, whereby the " ſpawn of barbel and other fiſh may be de- " ſtroyed, upon the forfeiture of the ſame ſum " for each offence.

" That no perſon ſhall draw any net for ſal- " mon, of leſs than three inches in the meſh, " from the 10th of March till the 14th of Sep- " tember, in any part of the river Thames, from " Kew pile weſtward, to the city of London " mark-ſtone above Staines-bridge, upon the for- " feiture of forty ſhillings for every offence.

" That no perſon ſhall take or ſell any fiſh " contrary to the ancient aſſize: pike, fourteen " inches; barbel, twelve inches; ſalmon, ſix- " teen inches; trout, eight inches; tench, eight " inches; roach, ſix inches; dace, ſix inches; " and flounders, ſix inches.

" That every fiſherman ſhall have on his boat " both his chriſtian and ſurname, and the name " of his pariſh legibly painted, where any one " may

" may ſee it; on the forfeiture of twenty ſhil-
" lings for every offence.

" No perſon whatſoever ſhall fiſh for ſmelts
" or ſhads, or any other fiſh whatſoever, or lay
" leaps, or rods for eels, in any place within the " juriſdiction of the Lord-mayor, without a li" cence from the water-bailiff, who ſhall appoint
" the proper ſeaſons for fiſhing: and upon every " ſuch occaſion, all the fiſhermen ſhall, upon due
" ſummons or notice given, repair to the water-
" bailiff at the chapel at Guildhall, to take out
" their ſeveral licences for going to fiſh, and to " hear the ordinances for the preſervation of the " fiſheries publicly read, that they may be the " better able to preſerve and keep them; and
" that none go out to fiſh without ſuch a licence;
" and that every fiſherman offending herein,
" ſhall pay five pounds for every ſuch offence."

For the better preventing the uſe of unlawful nets or engines, it is farther ordained that,

" Any perſon or perſons authorized by the wa" ter-bailiff, may enter any fiſhermen's boats or
" veſſels, to view and ſearch for all unſizeable
" nets and engines, and for any fiſh they ſhall
" ſuſpect to be taken contrary to the laws of this " kingdom; to ſeize and carry ſuch nets to the " water-bailiff, with the names of the offenders,
" that they may be brought to juſtice; likewiſe to
" ſeize the fiſh taken contrary to law, and diſtribute
" it among the poor; and whoſoever ſhall reſiſt
" or diſturb the water-bailiff, or his deputies, in " their ſearching for and ſeizing unlawful nets,
" engines, or fiſh, ſhall forfeit twenty marks."

There is no doubt but theſe laws are admirably calculated for the preſervation of the fiſh, or for an increaſe of their breed; and we wiſh we could ſay that theſe laws were at all times properly enforced, and the offenders againſt them puniſhed in an exemplary manner; as, in that caſe, there can be little doubt but that the immenſe numbers of fiſh with which providence has enriched the river Thames, would afford ſuch a large and conſtant ſupply, as would, in a great degree, tend to reduce the exorbitant prices of other proviſions in this metropolis.

Although the river Thames is ſaid to be navigable one hundred and thirty-eight miles above London bridge, yet in that courſe there are ſuch a number of flats, that a total ſtop would be put to the navigation weſtward, in the ſummer time, when the ſprings are low, were it not for a number of Locks, or machines made of wood, placed quite acroſs the river, and ſo contrived as to confine the current of water as long as is found convenient; that is, till the water riſes to ſuch a height as to allow depth enough for the barges to paſs over the ſhallows; which being effected the confined water is ſet at liberty, and the loaded veſſel proceeds on its voyage, till another ſhoal requires the ſame contrivance to carry it forward.

Theſe conveniences are undoubtedly very great, but they are attended with a very conſiderable expence; for a barge paſſing from Lechlade, to London pays no leſs than thirteen pounds, fifteen ſhillings, and ſixpence for paſſing through theſe locks; and one from Oxford to London pays twelve pounds eighteen ſhillings.

This expence, however, is incurred only in the ſummer, when the water is low: and from London-bridge to Bolter's-lock, which is a diſtance of fifty-one miles and a half, there is no lock on the river.

We ſhall conclude this account of the river Thames, by giving a catalogue of the greater part of the fiſh with which this celebrated river, by the goodneſs of providence, is moſt bountifully ſtored: The ſalmon, flounder, ſmelt, ſhad, trout, graylin, perch, carp, tench, barbel, chub, roach, dace, gudgeon, pike, eel, lamprey, bleak, ruffee, ſturgeon, baſs, mullet, turbot, ſole, maid, plaice, dab, ſkate, thornback, halibut, pearl, whiting, haddock, oyſter, muſcle, cockle, buntin, crab, prawn, red and white ſhrimps, craw fiſh and others.

CHAPTER VII.

Charters granted by king John to the City of London. A council of thirty-five perſons choſen to hold the aſſizes in London. The fraternity of weavers expelled the city. The exchange of London farmed. Title of mayor firſt beſtowed. King John ſummons a Parliament to meet at Bridewell. Pope Innocent lays the city under an interdict. The exchequer removed to Northampton. The walls of London encompaſſed with a ditch. The barons and citizens compel king John to grant Magna-charta. The contents of that famous charter of liberty. King John breaks through his engagements and procures abſolution. The citizens invite Lewis, ſon of king Philip of France, to the crown of England. He accepts it. The French defeated. King John dies. Peace concluded between Lewis and the young king Henry. Lewis leaves England. Henry makes a public entry into London.

IN the year 1198, the king iſſued his orders to the ſheriffs of London and Middleſex, to provide meaſures, gallons, iron rods, and weights, to be ſent to the ſeveral counties of England, to be uſed as one general ſtandard for weights and meaſures.

King Richard dying in the year 1199, was ſucceeded on the throne by his brother John, earl of Moreton, who had no ſooner aſſumed the reins of government, than he granted three charters to the city of London.

The firſt of theſe charters was only a recital and confirmation confirmation of the charters granted by former monarchs with this additional privilege; "that "all the citizens of London ſhall be quit "from toll or laſtage, and every other cuſtom, "throughout all our lands, on this ſide and be-"yond the ſeas."

For this charter the citizens preſented the king with three thouſand marks; and immediately received a ſecond charter, a copy of which we have ſubjoined.

"John, by the grace of God, king of Eng-"land, lord of Ireland, duke of Normandy, "Aquitain, and earl of Anjou; to his archbi-"ſhops, biſhops, abbots, earls, barons, juſtices, "ſheriffs, ſtewards, caſtle-keepers, conſtables, "bailiff's, miniſters and all his faithful ſubjects, "greeting:

"Know ye all, that we for our ſoul's health, "and for the ſouls health of Henry our father, "and all our predeceſſors; and alſo for the com-"monweal of our city of London, and all our "realm; have granted and ſteadfaſtly commanded, "that all the wares [or wears] which are in the "Thames or in the Medway, be amoved, where-"ſoever they ſhall be within the Thames and the "Medway; and that no wares from henceforth "be put any where in the Thames or Medway, "upon forfeiture of ten pounds ſterling; alſo "we have clearly quit-claimed all that, which "the keepers of the Tower of London were "wont yearly to receive of the ſaid wares: "wherefore we will and ſtedfaſtly command, that "no keeper of the ſaid Tower, at any time here-"after, exact any thing from any body, nor "trouble or moleſt any perſon, by reaſon of the "ſaid wares; for it is ſufficiently manifeſt to us, "by the right reverend Hubert, archbiſhop of "Canterbury, and other our faithful ſubjects, "it is given us ſufficiently to underſtand, that "very great detriment and diſcommodity hath "grown to our ſaid city of London, and alſo to "our realm, by occaſion of theſe wares; which "to the intent it may continue both firm and "ſtable for ever, we do fortify the ſame by in-"ſcription of this preſent page, and putting to "our ſeal:

"Theſe being witneſſes, William of London, "Euſtace of Ely, Godfrey of Wincheſter, "biſhops; Jeffrey, ſon of Peter, earl of "Eſſex; William Marſhall, earl of Pem-"broke; H. earl of Warren; earl Rogers "Pigott; R. earl of Clare; earl de Braos; "Robert, ſon of Roger, Hugh Bord, Wil-"liam Brewer, Stephen Turnham, William "Warren, Simon of Pattiſhel: given by "the hands of Hubert, archbiſhop of Can-"terbury our chancellor, at Shoreham, the "ſeventeenth day of June, in the firſt year "of our reign."

This charter extends the juriſdiction of the city of London over the river Medway, as it before had the conſervancy of the Thames, and granted a power to inflict a penalty of ten pounds, on any perſon who ſhould erect a wear or wears in either of thoſe rivers.

The third charter which was granted but a few days after the ſecond, exhibits peculiar marks of the kings regard to the city of London; for his majeſty therein grants them the fee-farm of the ſheriffwicks of London and Middleſex at the ancient rent; and likewiſe allows them the power of chuſing their own ſheriffs.

The following is a copy of this charter:

"John, by the grace of God, king of Eng-"land, lord of Ireland, duke of Normandy, "Aquitain, and earl of Anjou; to his archbi-"ſhops, biſhops, abbots, earls, barons, juſtices, "ſheriffs, rulers, and to all his bailiffs and loving "ſubjects:

"Know ye, that we have granted, and by this "our preſent writing confirmed, to our citizens "of London, the ſheriffwicks of London and "Middleſex, with all the cuſtoms and things to "the ſheriffwick belonging, within the city and "without, by land and by water, to have and to "hold to them and their heirs, of us and our "heirs, paying therefore three hundred pounds "of blank ſterling money, at two terms in the "year; that is to ſay, at the eaſter exchequer, "one hundred and fifty pounds; and at Mi-"chaelmas exchequer, one hundred and fifty "pounds; ſaving to the citizens of London all "their liberties and free cuſtoms.

"And further, we have granted to the citizens "of London, that they amongſt themſelves "make ſheriffs whom they will; and may amove "them when they will; and thoſe whom "they make ſheriffs, they ſhall preſent to our "juſtices of our exchequer, of theſe things, which "to the ſaid ſheriffwick appertain, whereof they "ought to anſwer us; and unleſs they ſhall ſuf-"ficiently anſwer and ſatisfy, the citizens may "anſwer and ſatisfy us the amerciaments and "farm, ſaving to the ſaid citizens their liberties "as is aforeſaid; and ſaving to the ſaid ſheriffs "the ſame liberties, which other citizens have: "ſo that, if they which ſhall be appointed ſheriffs "for the time being, ſhall commit any offence, "whereby they ought to incur any amerciament "of money, they ſhall not be condemned for "any more than to the amerciament of twenty "pounds, and that without the damage of other "citizens, if the ſheriffs be not ſufficient for the "payment of their amerciaments: but, if they "do any offence, whereby they ought to incur "the loſs of their lives or members; they ſhall "be adjudged, as they ought to be, accord-"ing to the law of the city; and of theſe things, "which to the ſaid ſheriffs belong, the ſheriffs "ſhall anſwer before our juſtices at our exche-"quer, ſaving to the ſaid ſheriffs the liberties "which other citizens of London have.

"Alſo this grant and confirmation we have "made to the citizens of London for the amend-"ment of the ſaid city, and becauſe it was in "ancient times farmed for three hundred "pounds: wherefore we will and ſteadfaſtly "command, that the citizens of London and "their heirs may have and hold the ſheriffwick "of London and Middleſex, with all things to "the ſaid ſheriffwick belonging, of us and our "heirs, to poſſeſs and enjoy hereditarily, freely "and quietly, honourably and wholly, by fee-

This is the firſt conveyance on record, in which we find the terms, to have and to hold, which have been ſince, and ſtill are conſidered as eſſential to all conveyances.

If we may credit the authority of Arnold's Chronicle, in the year 1200, thirty-five perſons were made choice of by the wiſe men of the city, and formed into a council to hold the aſſizes in London.

In the year 1201, king John granted a fourth charter to the city of London, by which the guild or fraternity of weavers were expelled the city, as it is imagined for ſome great offence; but what their crime was, is not recorded; tho' a certain writer is of opinion that it muſt have been very heinous, as the whole community were expelled, for ſo trifling an addition as two marks annually to the royal revenue.

The following is a copy of this fourth charter:

" John, by the grace of God, king of Eng- " land, lord of Ireland, duke of Normandy and " Aquitain, and earl of Anjou; to his archbi- " ſhops, biſhops, abbots, earls, barons, juſtices, " ſheriffs, and to all his bailiffs and faithful ſub- " jects, greeting: Know ye, that we, at the re- " queſt of our mayor and citizens of London, " have granted, and by this our preſent writing " confirmed, that the guild of weavers ſhall not " from henceforth be in the city of London, " neither ſhall be at all maintained: but, be- " cauſe we have been accuſtomed yearly to re- " ceive eighteen marks in money, every year, of " the ſaid guild; our ſaid citizens ſhall pay unto " us and our heirs twenty marks in money, for " a gift, at the feaſt of St. Michael, at our ex- " chequer.

" Witneſs Hubert, archbiſhop of Canterbury, " &c. &c."

It appears from the great roll of the exchequer, that in the firſt year of the reign of king John, the farm of the Cambium, or Exchange of London, was let upon leaſe for a term of years, to one Guy de Von, who in the fourth year of the ſame reign ſtood indebted to the crown, in the ſum of one thouſand and ſixty-ſix pounds, eight ſhillings and four-pence, for the farm of the ſaid exchange; which proves the trade of London to have been very conſiderable at that time.

The office of chamberlain of London likewiſe appears to have been very profitable, about the ſame period of time; for in the year 1204, William de St. Michael paid the king a fine of one hundred pounds for the ſame, and agreed to pay a rent of one hundred marks annually; by which it is alſo evident that this office was then veſted in the crown.

In the ſame year 1204, a ſevere froſt began on New-year's day, which, according to ſome authors, held till the nineteenth, and according to others, till the twenty-fifth of March: which occaſioned the price of wheat to be advanced to twelve ſhillings the quarter, a great part of the ſeed having been damaged in the ground by the froſt.

In the year 1207, Henry Fitz-Alwyn, the chief magiſtrate of this city, by the title of Bailiff, or Cuſtos, was honoured with that of Mayor.*

Matthew Paris informs us, that in the year 1210, king John ſummoned a parliament to meet him at his palace in St. Bride's pariſh, (on the ſpot of ground where Bridewell hoſpital now ſtands) when he exacted one hundred thouſand pounds from the clergy and religious houſes, and forty thouſand pounds from the white friars or monks in particular.

In the ſame year the biſhops of London, Ely, and Worceſter, laid the city of London, and other parts of the kingdom, under an interdict, by command of pope Innocent, becauſe the king refuſed to obey the imperious orders of the ſee of Rome.

In conſequence of this interdict, almoſt all eccleſiaſtical ceremonies ceaſed, the churches and church-yards were ſhut up, the bodies of the deceaſed were buried in the highways and ditches, and no burial ſervice read over them.

King John being offended with the citizens, though hiſtorians do not relate the cauſe of his anger, he this year removed his exchequer from Weſtminſter to Northampton, as a puniſhment for the offence.

The weakneſs of this monarch having induced him to take ſuch meaſures as loſt him in a great degree the affections of his ſubjects, and the public ſafety becoming every day more and more precarious, the citizens of London determined to put that city into a proper poſture of defence.

In conſequence of this reſolution, they, in the year 1211, began to encompaſs the wall of the city with a ditch two hundred feet wide, and of a great depth; and this great work was compleated in the year 1213.

Robert Fitzwater, caſtellain and ſtandard-bearer of the city of London, having eſpouſed the cauſe of the malecontent barons, and refuſed to give ſecurity for his fidelity to king John, fled into France: upon which the king gave orders for the demoliſhing of Fitzwater's ſtately palace, called Baynard's-Caſtle, which was ſituated at the ſouth-end of Thames-ſtreet.

Soon after this the king ſummoned a convention of the ſtates to be held in St. Paul's cathedral, where, in the preſence of Nicholas, biſhop of Freſcati, the pope's legate, he acknowledged and renewed a ſcandalous ſubjection of his crown to the pope, which he had before made to a former legate named Pandulph; to whom the king's charter, ſealed with wax, having been heretofore delivered, it was now re-delivered to Pandulph, with a ſeal of gold.

The king having agreed to pay the pope a large ſum of money for taking off the national debt, the citizens of London were obliged to pay two thouſand marks towards the ſame: but to prevent as much as poſſible thoſe murmurs which he had but too much reaſon to apprehend, he granted the citizens his fifth and laſt charter, a copy of which we have ſubjoined:

" John, by the grace of God, king of Eng" land, duke of Normandy, Aquitain, and earl
" of Anjou; to his archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots,
" earls, barons, juſtices, ſheriffs, rulers, and to
" all his faithful ſubjects, greeting:
" Know ye, that we have granted, and by this
" our preſent writing confirmed, to our barons
" of our city of London, that they may chooſe to " themſelves every year a mayor, who to us may " be faithful, diſcreet, and fit for government
" of the city, ſo as, when he ſhall be choſen, to " be preſented unto us, or our juſtice, (if we " ſhall not be preſent); and he ſhall ſwear to be " faithful to us; and that it ſhall be lawful to " them, at the end of the year, to amove him,
" and ſubſtitute another, if they will, or the
" ſame to retain, ſo as he be preſented unto us,
" or our juſtice, if we ſhall not be preſent. We " have granted to the ſame our barons, and by
" this our preſent charter confirmed, that they
" well and in peace, freely, quietly, and wholly,
" have all their liberties, which hitherto they " have uſed, as well in the city of London as " without, as well by water as by land, and in " all other places, ſaving to us our chamberlain-
" ſhip: Wherefore we will and ſtreightly com" mand, that our aforeſaid barons of our afore-
" ſaid city of London may chuſe unto themſelves
" a mayor of themſelves, in manner and form
" aforeſaid; and that they may have all the " aforeſaid liberties well and in peace, wholly
" and fully, with all things to the ſame liberties
" appertaining, as is aforeſaid.
" Witneſs the lords, P. of Winton, William " of Worceſter, William of Coventry, bi-" ſhops; William Brigword; Peter, ſon of
" Herbert, &c. &c.

The citizens of London, by this charter, received a confirmation of their antient rights and privileges, with the additional one of chuſing their own chief magiſtrate, the king reſerving to himſelf the nomination of a chamberlain only.

King John appears to have been, upon the whole, an enemy to the liberties of the people; but his ſubjects were not of that kind who would eaſily ſubmit to reſign thoſe rights, which ought ever to be held ſacred in the eſteem of every free-born Engliſhman; this will ſufficiently appear in the ſequel.

The barons of the kingdom, determined to aſſert their rights and liberties, aſſembled in great numbers at St. Edmundſbury, under pretence of devotion, and there took a ſolemn oath at the altar of the church, that they would repair to the king, and demand a re-eſtabliſhment of king Edward's laws, and a confirmation of all the conſtitutional acts, contained in the charter of Henry the firſt; and if the king refuſed to comply with their demand, to compel his acquieſcence by force of arms.

In purſuance of this reſolution, they, in the beginning of January 1214, repaired to London, and going to the new temple (where now ſtand the inns of court) the reſidence of the king, they made their demands; alledging, that they required nothing but what he had ſolemnly ſworn to grant at the time of his abſolution at Wincheſter.

John could not deny that he had made ſuch a promiſe; but in order to put off the evil day, he deſired till Eaſter to give his anſwer. This was complied with; but inſtead of giving an anſwer to the ſatisfaction of the barons, he then treated their demand with the utmoſt contempt.

Hereupon the barons, reſolving to effect by force what they could not obtain from the favour and juſtice of the king, ſet on foot a private negotiation with ſome of the principal citizens of London, who ſoon prevailed on their fellow citizens to join in oppoſing a prince who had always conſidered his own arbitrary will as a law, and had oppreſſed his ſubjects to a degree not to be borne by a free and ſpirited people.

The army of the barons was at this time encamped at Bedford; where private meſſengers arrived from London, with advice that the city was ready to admit them, provided they made their approaches with ſecrecy and reſolution.

On receipt of this agreeable intelligence, they proceeded to Ware in Hertfordſhire, and marching from thence in the night, arrived at London early in the morning of Sunday the twenty-fourth of May, without the king's receiving the leaſt intelligence of their approach, notwithſtanding he was at that time in the Tower of London.

The gates being opened for their reception, they entered the city by Aldgate, and being joined by their friends, took poſſeſſion of the city, while the greater part of the inhabitants were employed at their devotions.

They now began to plunder the houſes of the royaliſts and Jews, the latter of which they pulled down, and repaired the city walls with the ruins thereof.

Their next ſtep was to beſiege the Tower of London; and as their numbers increaſed every day, by the junction of the nobility and gentry, the king found himſelf under a neceſſity of endeavouring to compromiſe all matters in diſpute between him and his diſcontented ſubjects.

With this view he offered to refer the deciſion of the matter to four noblemen to be choſen from each party, and to leave the arbitration of the whole to the pope: but this propoſal being rejected, he ſubmitted at diſcretion, promiſed to grant them all their demands, and conſented to ſend commiſſioners to a conference to be held between Staines and Windſor.

Accordingly, on the fifteenth day of July, the barons made their appearance, and after a conference of a few days, the deputies adjuſted

the articles of the two valuable charters, called MAGNA CHARTA, and Charta de Foreſta, in the former of which it is expreſsly ſtipulated, that "the city of London ſhall have all its ancient "privileges and free cuſtoms, as well by land as "by water."

Theſe noble charters were moſt ſolemnly ratified and confirmed at Runnymead, near Staines; and as that called Magna Charta has been always conſidered as the great baſis of Engliſh liberty, and every reader muſt conſequently be greatly intereſted therein, we ſhall ſubjoin an abſtract of the principle heads thereof as we find it recorded in Clarendon's Hiſtory of England.

"Magna Charta, or the great charter, confirm-"ed what was lately granted to the clergy, re-"lative to the freedom of elections; allowed "perſons to leave the kingdom without ſpecial "licence, except in time of war; ordained that "no clergyman ſhould be amerced in proportion "to his benefice, but according to his lay tene-"ment; ſecured to the lay nobility, the cuſtody "of vacant abbies and convents, which were "under their patronage; aſcertained the reliefs "for earldoms, baronies, and knight's fees, which "before were arbitrary; decreed that barons "ſhould recover the lands of their vaſſals, for-"feited for felony, after they ſhould have been "a year and a day in the poſſeſſion of the crown; "that they ſhould enjoy the wardſhips of their "military tenants, who held no other lands of "the crown by a different tenure; that a perſon "knighted by the king, though a minor, ſhould "enjoy the privileges of an adult at law, pro-"vided he was a ward of the crown; but ſuch "knighthood conferred on a ward of a baron, "ſhould not deprive that baron of his ward-"ſhip; that widows ſhould not be forced to mar-"ry againſt their inclination, or to pay any fine "for their dower; that the wardſhips of mi-"nors ſhould not be ſold; that guardians ſhould "not take unreaſonable profits from the lands of "their wards, or commit waſte, but keep the "houſes in good repair, leave the farms well "ſtocked, and diſpoſe of their wards in mar-"riage, without diſparagement; that no ſcut-"tage ſhould be levied in the kingdom without "the conſent of the common-council of the "realm, except in the caſes of ranſoming the "kings perſon, knighting his eldeſt ſon, or "marrying his eldeſt daughter; that no freeman "ſhall be taken, impriſoned, or diſſeized of "his freehold, liberties, or free cuſtoms, but by "the lawful judgment of his peers, or by legal "proceſs; that ſheriffs ſhould not hold county "courts above once a month; that they, as well "as caſtellans, coroners, and kings bailiffs, "ſhould be reſtrained from holding pleas of the "crown; that ſheriffs who had the management "of the crown revenues within their ſeveral "diſtricts, ſhould not raiſe the farms of counties, "hundreds, and tythes according to their plea-"ſure, except in the king's demeſne manors; "that the people ſhould not be unjuſtly proſe-"cuted, and put to canonical purgation, with-"out legal proof, in regard to carriages, pur-"veyance of victuals and other ſervices; that "amerciaments ſhould be proportioned to the "offence, and circumſtances of the offenders, "ſo as not to affect his landed eſtate, or diſable "him from following his vocation, but be rated "by the verdict of twelve creditable men in the "neighbourhood."

The king, however, was ſo far from being ſincere in his engagements, that he made no ſcruple of breaking through moſt of them, and applied to the pope for abſolution, and to ſeveral foreign princes for their aſſiſtance; agreeing at the ſame time, that ſhould he through their means conquer his rebellious ſubjects, he would immediately make them maſters of their poſſeſſions: in conſequence of this promiſe, a prodigious number of mercinary troops from Flanders, Gaſcony, Brabant, Poictou and Normandy, arrived in England, and entered into his ſervice. Upon this, the barons retired to London, convinced they ſhould not be able to withſtand a power ſo far ſuperior to their own; at which place a meſſenger from the pope arrived almoſt as ſoon as themſelves, and announced a bull of excommunication not only againſt the barons, but the whole city, for having joined them.

The barons and citizens alike affected to treat the pope's bull with contempt; and John, taking advantage of their inactivity, deſtroyed all their caſtles, and committed great devaſtations upon their eſtates.

This rouzed them; and, determined to be revenged on their perfidious monarch, they ſent ambaſſadors to France, with an invitation to Lewis, the eldeſt ſon of king Philip, to accept the crown of England.

The predominant paſſion of the young prince was ambition; no wonder then if he embraced the propoſal. Meſſengers arrived from France with acknowledgements of the ſignal proof the Londoners had given him of their eſteem, which were ſoon followed by himſelf at the head of a moſt powerful army.

On his arrival, he received oaths of allegiance from the barons and citizens, and he ſwore to reſtore their laws, their liberties, and their poſſeſſions.

The citizens kept their engagements; but John dying, William, earl of Pembroke taking the part of Henry his ſon, perſuaded about fifty of the barons to deſert Lewis, and acknowledge him for their ſovereign.

Lewis, upon this, was conſtrained to agree to a truce: and going over to France ſoon returned to London with freſh ſupplies: previous to his arrival, however, the king's troops had taken the field, and lay encamped before the caſtle of Mount Sorrel in the county of Leiceſter: Lewis immediately diſpatched 600 knights from London, and upwards of 20,000 regular troops to relieve the beſieged; and upon their appearance in the field, the earl of Cheſter raiſed the ſiege.

However, Lewis was not every where ſucceſsful, for a prodigious number of the French being defeated at Lincoln, and much about the ſame time, a fleet, with powerful ſupplies, deſtroyed by ſome ſhips fitted out by the cinque ports, he was conſtrained to keep cloſe in London, where being reduced to great ſtraits; he deſired a negotiation for peace might take place; adding that he hoped and expected, from the known generoſity of the Engliſh, no terms would be offered but ſuch as he might, conſiſtent with his honour, acquieſce in.

In ſhort, a treaty was concluded, in which Lewis took care to have the rights and privileges of the citizens confirmed; and, as a teſtimony of their gratitude, the citizens lent him 5000 marks to diſcharge the debts he had contracted, after doing which, he returned home.

Upon the departure of Lewis, the young king made his public entry into London with great pomp, and was received with every poſſible demonſtration of ſincere affection; notwithſtanding which, the court had conceived a violent diſlike to the citizens, which it was no eaſy matter to ſubdue.

CHAPTER VIII.

The foreſt of Middleſex diſforeſted. The goal of Newgate repaired at the expence of the crown. A great riot in conſequence of a wreſtling-match between the citizens of London and the inhabitants of Weſtminſter. The rioters executed, and ſureties given for the good behaviour of the citizens. Magna Charta confirmed in parliament. A terrible ſtorm of thunder and lightning. An order that ſheriffs ſhould hold their office only one year. Hubert de Burg, the juſticiary, narrowly eſcapes the vengeance of the citizens. The original of paying a quit-rent of ſix horſhoes into the exchequer. King Henry's ſplendid entrance into London. Water firſt brought in pipes to the city, and preſerved for uſe in conduits. Cuſtom of the Lord-mayor and aldermen hunting annually on the eighteenth of September. The Jews of London compelled to pay the king a tax of twenty thouſand marks. The falling down of part of the Tower of London. An inundation of the Thames. The wonderful death of Griffith, ſon of Leoline, prince of Wales. The king ſeizes the liberties of the city. The Lord-mayor and citizens purchaſe the fee-farm of Queenhithe.

IN the year 1218, being the ſecond year of Henry the third, the citizens paid a tax of forty marks for the privilege of ſelling a certain kind of cloth, which was not two full yards broad, which was the breadth limited by law.

In the ſame year the foreſt of Middleſex was diſforeſted, and many of the citizens purchaſing different parts of it to build on, the city and ſuburbs were greatly enlarged. About the ſame period the ſheriffs of London, agreeable to an order from the king, began to repair the gaol of Newgate, for the expence of which the crown became anſwerable, which ſhews that the government of this goal was not then veſted in the city. And in the ſame year, the citizens paid to his majeſty, for the confirmation of their ancient rights and privileges, a fifteenth of their perſonal eſtates.

The miniſtry, in the year 1222, were furniſhed with a plauſible pretext to execute their deſigns againſt the citizens of London, who had, as has been before obſerved, greatly offended the court, by their endeavours to fix the crown on the head of Lewis. A wreſtling match being held at Matilda's hoſpital (now St. Giles's in the Fields) and the citizens greatly excelling the people of Weſtminſter both in ſtrength and activity, the abbot of Weſtminſter's ſteward, mortified at the ſuperiority of the Londoners, offered a ram as a prize to be wreſtled for on the firſt day of Auguſt; and the unſuſpecting citizens accepting the invitation, were ſet upon by a ſet of deſperate, armed ruffians, who wounded many of them, and drove the reſt from the field in the utmoſt confuſion.

The Londoners, in revenge for the affront that had been offered them, reſolved to puniſh the authors of it, and a prodigious number of them being aſſembled, and headed by one Conſtantine Fitz Arnulph, a citizen of great property, they proceeded to Weſtminſter, crying, "Mount Joye, "Mount Joye, God help us and our lord Lewis," and returned to London in triumph, after having pulled down ſeveral houſes which were the property of the abbot and his perfidious ſteward.

The citizens hearing that a complaint was made to Philip Dawbney, one of the king's council, of the damage done to the abbot's property, beſet his houſe, beat his ſervants, and took away twelve of his horſes; and the abbot, endeavouring to make his eſcape by means of a back-door, was diſcovered by ſome of the mob, and pelted to the river-ſide, where he took water, and eſcaped their fury.

Shortly after this tranſaction, the mayor, and principal citizens were ſummoned to attend Hubert de Burg, the chief juſticiary, at the tower of London; where it being demanded who was the ringleader of the rioters, Fitz Arnulph ſaid he was happy that he could ſay it was himſelf: upon this bold confeſſion, the juſticiary diſmiſſed all the company except Fitz Arnulph and his nephew, and though he offered fifteen thouſand marks for his pardon, they were hanged the next morning.

Many others of the rioters were afterwards apprehended by the juſticiary, who, without the leaſt form of trial, ordered their hands and feet to be cut off, and their bodies burnt: and not contented with the grievous cruelties he had inflicted, he degraded the mayor and aldermen, obliged thirty perſons of great property to become ſureties for the good behaviour of the citizens, and ſet a guard over the city: and the king obliged the citizens to pay him many thouſand marks before he would be reconciled to them.

In the year 1224, the Londoners addreſſed the king, king, ſolliciting that he would be pleaſed to confirm to them their rights and privileges, which he at laſt agreed to. Notwithſtanding an ordinance made to the contrary, Henry, the next year, exempted the citizens from proſecutions for manufacturing liſted cloth, called Burells.

In the ſame year, in the parliament held at Weſtminſter, Magna Charta was confirmed; and a right to have a common ſeal was granted by the king to the commonalty of the city.

Henry grew every year a greater tyrant; and in the year 1227, he extorted from the citizens of London five thouſand marks, obſerving, that they could not heſitate paying a ſum to their king, which they had voluntarily given to Lewis, his enemy. However, the king, in the ſame year, granted to them five charters; the firſt of which is nothing more than an exemplification of that granted by king John, confirming to the citizens of London the ſheriffwick of London and Middleſex. The ſecond of theſe charters is a recital of king John's charter for confirming to the citizens the right of electing a mayor of London; the third the ſame that was granted by that monarch, for granting to the city the conſervancy of the rivers Medway and Thames; the fourth a repetition of the charters of king Henry the firſt, and Henry the ſecond, relative to acquital of murder, pleadings, toll, recovery of debts, right of hunting, and releaſement from bridtol, childwite, jeriſgive, and ſcotale. But by the fifth the citizens of London and others, who had purchaſed lands in the diſtoreſted warren of Staines, were exempted from all taxes and exactions, and had many other freedoms granted to them and their heirs for ever.

Henry at the ſame time, granted two clerks and two ſerjeants to the ſheriffs of London. In the year 1229, freſh exactions were made by the king on the citizens, who patiently ſubmitted and raiſed him a prodigious ſum, by ſeveral taxes, which were collected by the aldermen.

On St. Paul's day, in the following year, while Roger Niger, biſhop of London, was celebrating maſs in St. Paul's, the atmoſphere was ſuddenly overſpread with darkneſs, loud claps of thunder were heard, and it lighten'd inceſſantly; which ſo terrified the congregation, that they left the biſhop and one deacon, and ran out of the church in great diſorder and confuſion.

About the ſame time, it being diſcovered that many of the preceding ſheriffs had taken bribes of victuallers, and extorted money from their fellow citizens, an ordinance was made by the magiſtrates of the city, that, in future, the ſheriffs ſhould continue no longer than one year in office.

A great fire breaking out in the year 1232, deſtroyed a great part of the city: and in the ſame year, the ſum of twenty thouſand pounds was extorted from the citizens for the uſe of the king.

It is the opinion of moſt writers, that Hubert de Burg was the adviſer of every arbitrary and oppreſſive meaſure put in execution againſt the citizens: the villain, however, was at length diſgraced, and, the king demanding an account of his receipts and diſburſements relative to the public, he fled for ſanctuary to the priory of Merton, which ſo exaſperated Henry, that he iſſued a proclamation that all ſuch perſons as had any complaint to make of the juſticiary, ſhould immediately make application to him, with a full ſtate of their grievances. Upon which the citizens accuſed him of arbitrarily and illegally putting to death Conſtantine Fitz-Arnulph; they alſo charged him with being guilty of extortion, and many other acts of injuſtice; and the king immediately ſent a precept to the Lord-mayor of London to repair to Merton priory, and ſeize Hubert, and bring him to London.

The citizens no ſooner heard the commiſſion than they aſſembled to the number of twenty thouſand, reſolving to fulfil the king's command with alacrity, and were preparing to ſet forward on their expedition, when ſeveral of the graver citizens, fearing ſome ill conſequences might ariſe from the appearance of ſo many men in arms, they requeſted the advice of the biſhop of Winchester, who told them that the king's orders muſt be obeyed at all events.

However, Ranulph, earl of Cheſter, applying to the king in favour of the juſticiary, his majeſty was prevailed on to revoke his former orders, to the great mortification of the citizens, who were thus diſappointed of wreaking their vengeance on their inveterate foe.

In the year 1235, one Walter le Bruin, a farrier, obtained of the king the grant of a piece of ground, in the pariſh of St. Clement Danes, for the purpoſe of erecting a forge; which leaſe was granted on the following very ſingular terms.

Le Bruin was bound to deliver annually into the exchequer, a quit-rent of ſix horſhoes, with the nails thereto belonging: and though this piece of ground is not at preſent in poſſeſſion of the city of London, yet the cuſtom of making this tender at the exchequer, by the hands of the ſheriffs, is ſtill kept up.

The marriage of king Henry with Eleanor, ſecond daughter of Raymond, earl of Provence, having been ſolemnized at Canterbury, the royal pair ſet forwards to make their public entry into London; on which occaſion they were met on the road by the mayor, aldermen, and chief citizens, to the number of three hundred and ſixty, mounted on fine horſes, dreſſed in robes of embroidered ſilk, and each man carrying in his hand a cup of gold or ſilver, as an emblem of the office claimed by the mayor of London, of being chief butler at the coronation of the kings of England.

This pompous proceſſion was preceded by the king's trumpeters, and thoſe ſtreets of the city through which they paſſed, were moſt ſplendidly adorned with pageants, rich ſilks, and a great variety of elegant exhibitions.

In this manner the cavalcade proceeded to Weſtminſter, where the citizens attended the coronation of the queen: at night the city was illuminated in the moſt beautiful manner by lamps, &c. and every mark of joy and loyalty was ſhewn on the occaſion.

About this period, a great want of water prevailing in London, occaſioned in a great degree by the encroachment of buildings on the freſh water canals about the city, many of the more ſubſtantial citizens contributed in a liberal manner to a ſcheme for bringing water from ſix fountains in the town of Tyburn; which was accordingly carried into execution, and is the firſt inſtance on record of water being conveyed to the city by means of pipes.

In ſeveral parts of the city were erected conduits for the reception of this water, the firſt of which was built in the year 1285, at the weſt end of Cheapſide; * and theſe conduits were found ſo convenient, that they ſoon increaſed to nineteen in number, and were ſupplied by water pipes from different wells or fountains in the neighbourhood of the city, and from the river Thames.

But theſe conduits having been long ſince rendered uſeleſs by the preſent method of conveying water from the Thames and New-River, they have been totally removed for ſome years paſt; by which the paſſage through the principal ſtreets of the city is much leſs obſtructed than it was in former times.

We are told by an ancient writer, that when theſe conduits were in uſe, it was cuſtomary for the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and principal citizens, to repair on horſeback, annually, on the eighteenth of September, to viſit the heads from whence the conduits were ſupplied, and to hunt a hare in the morning, and a fox after dinner, in the fields adjacent to the town of Tyburn.

In the year 1241, the Jews of the city of Norwich having preſumed to circumciſe a chriſtian child, were puniſhed in an exemplary manner; and though the Jews of London were ſuppoſed to have had no concern in, or knowledge of this tranſaction, yet the king made this circumſtance a pretence for extorting twenty thouſand marks from that people, which they paid, to avoid perpetual impriſonment, which was threatened in caſe of their refuſal.

About this time an accident happened which gave great pleaſure to the citizens. The king having, in the year 1239, added ſome fortifications to the Tower of London, theſe buildings fell ſuddenly to the ground, and were totally deſtroyed. The ſatisfaction of the citizens on this event aroſe from their having been informed that theſe additional buildings had been erected as priſons for ſuch of the Londoners as ſhould aſſert their ancient rights and privileges, in oppoſition to the will of their arbitrary ſovereign.

The river Thames having overflowed and broken down its banks at Lambeth, in the year 1242, a great inundation followed, which laid the country totally under water for the ſpace of ſix miles, by which the inhabitants ſuſtained prodigious damage.

In the year 1243, Beatria, counteſs of Provence, mother to the queen of England, paid a viſit to this kingdom, and was received by the Londoners with a ſplendor and magnificence, which are great teſtimonies of their loyalty to a prince, who by his frequent exactions and arbitrary ſway, does not ſeem to have merited ſo great a compliment.

The counteſs of Provence was attended by her daughter Cincia, bride to Richard, brother to the king, whoſe nuptials were celebrated ſoon after their arrival, with a degree of pomp, which perhaps has been hitherto unequalled in this kingdom; for if the authority of Matthew Paris may be relied on, there were no leſs than thirty thouſand diſhes ſerved up at the wedding dinner.

A very ſingular accident happened in the year 1244, to Griffith, eldeſt ſon of Leoline, prince of Wales, who being impriſoned in the Tower of London, attempted to make his eſcape from the top of that building, by the help of tablecloths, ſheets, and hangings, tied together; but being a very corpulent man, he fell to the ground, and in ſuch a poſition, that his neck was broke, and his head was driven between his ſhoulders, quite into his body.

In the year 1244, king Henry extorted fifteen hundred marks from the citizens of London, under the pretence of puniſhing them for permitting one Walter Buckerel, (who had been baniſhed twenty years before) to reſide in the city; though this very king had himſelf pardoned Buckerel, by his letters patent, before he preſumed to return to his native country.

In the year following the king extorted a thouſand marks more from the citizens; and not long afterwards he ſeized upon the liberties of the city, and degraded the magiſtrates, for a falſe judgment given againſt Margaret Veil, a poor widow; on which occaſion William Haverel, and Edward of Weſtminſter, were by the king appointed Cuſtodes of the city of London.

At this period the mayor and commonalty of this city, purchaſed the fee-farm of Queenhithe, of Richard, earl of Cornwall, brother to the king, as will more fully appear by the following charter:

London damaged by an earthquake. The original of Touzens. The mayor depoſed. Charter granted by Henry. Eſcape of John Gal-gate, with its conſequences. The goods of the citizens ſeized by order of the king. The ſheriffs committed to the Marſhalſea, but bailed by the whole body of the citizens. The king grants the citizens the liberty of pleading their own cauſe without employing a lawyer. The city wall repaired. A ſervant of William de Valence, half-brother to the king, ſtoned to death by the populace. Bakers convicted of Mal-practices, expoſed in the ſtreets in a dung-cart. The firſt gold coined in London. Account of a terrible famine.

ON the thirteenth of February 1247, there happened a dreadful earthquake, which threw down many of the houſes in the city of London and occaſioned other conſiderable damage.

King Henry lived in ſo profuſe and extravagant a manner, that he was perpetually in want of money; and at length was reduced to ſuch extremity for a ſupply, as to entertain ſerious thoughts of ſelling his plate and jewels; and enquiring where he could find a purchaſer, he was told in London, to which he replied "thoſe clowniſh Londoners "who call themſelves barons, are an immenſe "treaſure of themſelves;" adding his opinion, "that "if the treaſure of Auguſtus Cæſar was "to be ſold, the city of London could purchaſe "it."

Henry, however, did not diſpoſe of his jewels, but had recourſe to a method full as effectual, to raiſe the ſums he wanted. This was no other than the paſſing a grant to Richard de Crokeſley, abbot of Weſtminſter, to hold an annual fair, for the ſpace of fifteen days, at Tothill, where the ſtreet of that name now ſtands.

This grant being made, his majeſty iſſued ſtrict orders, that during the time of Tothill fair the citizens ſhould carry on no kind of trade, either publicly or privately; the conſequence of which was, that the Londoners paid the king a large ſum of money, to be rid of ſuch an intolerable grievance.

Henry ſpent his Chriſtmas, in the year 1249, among the citizens of London; begged conſiderable ſums of them by way of new-years gift, and ſoon after he left the city, compelled them to pay two thouſand pounds at once; not content with which arbitrary proceedings, he even encouraged his dependants to enter the ſhops of the citizens, and forcibly take away their goods.

Henry's tyranny was now increaſed to ſuch a degree, that many of the moſt eminent of the citizens retired into the country, being reſolved to live no longer under the immediate eye of ſo rapacious a tyrant.

The king dreading leſt the depopulation of the city of London ſhould deprive him of his uſual reſources in time of neceſſity, iſſued an order for the magiſtrates of the city to attend him in Weſtminſter Hall, where, in the preſence of the nobility, he ſolemnly promiſed never to oppreſs them again, but that they ſhould live in the quiet poſſeſſion of the fruits of their induſtry.

This, though it appeaſed the minds of the citizens for the preſent, appears to have been nothing more than a vile piece of diſſimulation; for in the year 1251, the king ordered proſecutions to be commenced againſt a body of Italian uſurers in London, who, under pretence of being the pope's merchants, had for a long time carried on a moſt pernicious and deſtructive trade of uſury.

Hereupon ſeveral of the uſurers were taken up and impriſoned, while others took ſanctuary until the affair could be accommodated with the king; which, in fact, was eaſily affected, for upon paying his majeſty a large ſum of money, they were permitted to renew their pernicious trade, and to continue it without moleſtation.

About the ſame time the citizens were ſummoned to Weſtminſter, where the king propoſed to them the undertaking of the holy war, which being declined by the whole aſſembly except three perſons, Henry upbraided them in the moſt ignominious terms; and ſhortly after not only obliged them to pay him a fine of twenty marks in gold (200 in ſilver) but ordered all the ſhops in the city to be kept ſhut, Tothill fair to be held in the dead of winter, and four-pence a day to be paid by them for the maintenance of a white bear in the Tower of London, and its keeper.

A quarrel happening, the next year, between ſome of the king's domeſtics, and ſome young citizens (which quarrel was ſecretly ſet on foot by Henry) he ordered the citizens to pay him one

eed by them to be paid towards the e into Gaſcony.
ne ſame time a priſoner in Newgate, n Gate, otherwiſe Offrem, † having cape, the king ordered the mayor and ttend him at the Tower of London, ng ſatisfied of the innocence of the ſuffered him to depart, but notwith-
the charge againſt the ſheriffs was unſup-by the leaſt ſhadow of truth or argument, ined them in the Tower for a month.

eems the ſtate of the caſe was this: the bi-op of London, as ſoon as the above criminal was apprehended, deſired leave of the ſheriffs to commit him to Newgate, which the ſheriffs agreed to, on condition that the biſhop ſhould appoint proper perſons to prevent his eſcaping; the biſhop accordingly ſet a guard over him, which guard aſſiſted him in his elopement.

Notwithſtanding the truth of this appeared on the examination of the ſheriffs at the Tower, the king compelled the citizens to pay a fine of three thouſand marks, and degraded both the ſheriffs.

Shortly after this the citizens were ſummoned to attend the king, to have their city ‡ tallaged, when Henry demanded the ſum of three thouſand marks; but after ſome deliberation with the principal citizens, Ralph Hardel, the mayor, told the king that two thouſand marks ſhould, if he pleaſed, be immediately paid into the hands of his treaſurer, but that they could not—they would not give him any more.

Upon this, the king ordered his lawyers to ſeek for a precedent for tallaging the city, and ſeveral being found, the citizens paid the ſum demanded without farther heſitation.

The ſheriffs being to diſtrain the citizens for the Aurum Regina, they at the return of the writ told the barons that they had not brought the money, not being able to find purchaſers for certain Vadia, § which they had ſeized; upon which, they were ordered to attend the barons, and bring the ſaid Vadia, on a day appointed.

The ſheriffs attended agreeable to their inſtructions, when they informed the barons, that above a thouſand citizens, conſiſting of drapers, ſpicers, and other tradeſmen, had made a ſtout reſiſtance, and would not ſuffer their property to be carried off.

Upon this declaration the ſheriffs were immediately committed to the marſhalſea, but were ſpeedily bailed by the whole community of London, repreſented in the perſons of Michael Tony, Robert Hardel, Thomas Adrian, and Simon de Cobham.

This incenſing Henry, he degraded the mayor, appointed his under treaſurer Cuſtos of the city, and ſeized upon the liberties of the citizens, for the reſtoration of which they were obliged to pay the enormous ſum of four thouſand marks.

made uſe of by * Henry, by the means of which he continued his ſhameful exactions, and oppreſſed the citizens in a greater degree, if poſſible, than ever.

Under pretence of having found at Windſor, a roll of crimes committed by the city magiſtrates, he ordered John Manſell, his chief juſtice to ſummon a † folkmote at St. Paul's church, to read the accuſations, and to order the aldermen to chuſe an inquiſition of thirty-ſix perſons out of their reſpective wards; the aldermen appeared according to their ſummons, but peremptorily refuſed to act contrary to the rights and eſtabliſhed cuſtoms of the city.

Hereupon Manſell withdrew, and making the king acquainted with the behaviour of the citizens, they were next day ordered to attend him at Weſtminſter, but he ſent them back without ſeeing them, and ordered Manſell, attended by his council, to return to the city: the citizens, by order, being aſſembled at Guildhall, Manſell, with great plauſibility, told them that the king, his maſter, intended to puniſh ſeverely all ſuch perſons as had been acceſſary to oppreſſing his faithful commonalty of the city of London, and aſked them, if ſuch a proceeding would not be agreeable to them: the unthinking multitude unanimouſly cried out "yea, yea."—And Manſell immediately iſſued his orders for electing the conſtable of the Tower, Cuſtos of the city, and John Adrian and Michael Tony, ſheriffs: the people inſtantly ſaw their error, and breaking up the aſſembly, returned ſorrowfully to their reſpective habitations.

A ſhort time after, Manſell ſummoned the citizens to attend him at Guild-hall, where he choſe out of them an inquiſition of thirty-ſix, who, like the former, not acting, they, together with the mayor, aldermen, and four men from each ward, were ordered to attend the king in Weſtminſter-hall, where Ralph Hardel, the late mayor, Nicholas Batt, Nicholas Fitzjoſne, Matthew Buckerell, John Toleſham, and John le Mynourie, were informed that they were found guilty, by the inquiſition of their fellow citizens; and the charge being read, they ſolemnly avowed their innocence of every article, and begged they might be allowed to put themſelves upon trial, and be condemned or acquitted by a jury of their countrymen.

This was denied, and they were again ordered to attend the king and council, at the ſame place, the next day, when Henry ſpeaking with much warmth, two of them were ſo greatly terrified, that they directly threw themſelves upon his mercy, while the reſt deſired to be tried by the laws of the city; but this requeſt not being complied with, the charge was again ordered to be read to them, when each of them anſwered fully to every article, and they were for that time diſmiſſed.

The day after, a folkmote was, by order of the king, held at St. Paul's croſs; and, the aſſembly being very numerous, the accuſed aldermen were fearful that the artful inſinuations of Manſell might prejudice the populace ſo much in their diſfavour, as to approve of the meaſures taken againſt them; they therefore threw themſelves on the king's mercy, which being made known to him, they were ordered to attend the next day at Weſtminſter, when they were told that the court had awarded, that they ſhould be fined at their diſcretion, but that the king had been graciouſly pleaſed to mitigate their fines; for which they returned thanks in court upon their knees: but notwithſtanding this ſhew of mercy, Henry was no ſooner departed than they were all put under an arreſt; however, they ſoon procured ſufficient ſecurity, and, after paying immenſe ſums, were reſtored at once to their former offices and the favour of the king.

At a folkmote held at St. Paul's croſs the day before the feaſt of St. Leonard, Henry acquainted the citizens with his deſign of viſiting his foreign dominions; declaring that he would ever preſerve their rights and liberties; and at the ſame time granted them the following very advantageous privilege, viz.

"That for the future every citizen ſhould have "liberty to plead his own cauſe, without being "obliged to employ a lawyer, except in pleas "that might concern the crown; that the wiſ"dom of the court being certified of the truth "of the affair, without any colouring, they "might decree equal and juſt judgment to the "parties concerned."

The walls and bulwarks of the city being in a ruinous condition, the citizens, by the command of Henry, repaired the ſame at a prodigious expence.

In the ſame year a perſon in the ſervice of William de Valence, half brother to the king, having, without the ſmalleſt degree of provocation, dangerouſly wounded ſeveral of the citizens, was ſtoned to death by the populace; at which Henry was ſo highly offended, that he commanded the mayor immediately to attend him.

The mayor obeyed the ſummons, and, in his defence, ſaid, that it was not poſſible for him to ſtop the reſentment of the affronted populace, with which excuſe the king appeared ſatisfied.

Shortly after, a court of itinerancy was held in London by Sir Hugh Bigot, when a great number of bakers, convicted of ſelling bread ſhort of weight, and other mal-practices, were carried through the ſtreets in a dung cart, and expoſed to the reſentment of the populace; and at the ſame time the above named judge ordered many perſons to be puniſhed for having been guilty of divers proceedings totally inconſiſtent with the rights and privileges of the citizens.

A penny of pure gold, was, this year, coined,

* Tho' moſt authors are, with us, of opinion that Henry was the contriver of this fraud, Manwood tells us, that the roll of fictitious crimes was dropped in the king's wardrobe at Windſor, by ſome diſcontented citizens.

† The word Folkmote ſignifies a general aſſembly of the people, which uſed to be held in St. Paul's church-yard, to which they were ſummoned by the ringing of a great bell, in a tower erected near the eaſt end of St. Paul's church, which meeting was looked upon as the ſupreme aſſembly of the city, and was empowered to call the magiſtrates to account for miſgovernment, to examine and determine the liberties and cuſtoms by a majority of voices, &c.

by order of the king, weighing two ſterlings, and which is ſuppoſed to have been the firſt gold coined in England.

Towards the end of the ſame year a dreadful famine happened, occaſioned by too much rain, when wheat was ſold for no leſs than one pound four ſhillings per quarter.

We are informed by an ancient hiſtorian, that at this ſevere ſeaſon he ſaw a number of citizens fighting for carrion and dead dogs, and that they drank the waſh, which was uſually given to ſwine; and by another hiſtorian we are told, that it occaſioned the death of about twenty thouſand perſons.

To heighten the diſtreſs of the citizens, money was, at the ſame time exceedingly ſcarce, the king's extortions, together with thoſe of the pope, and the ſum of ſeven hundred thouſand pounds, being carried into Germany by Richard, king of the Romans, having drained the nation to ſuch a degree, that it was with great difficulty the moſt eminent citizens ſupported themſelves and their families.

CHAPTER X.

A parliament held at Oxford, in which the ancient rights and privileges of the people were eſtabliſhed. The citizens entertain king Henry and his brother the king of the Romans. Proceedings in the city during Henry's abſence in France. The houſes of ſeveral Jews plundered. Prince Edward robs the knights templars of ten thouſand pounds. Reſolution of the mayor to expel all aliens from the city. A regular watch appointed in every ward of London. Above five hundred Jews maſſacred in London. A battle between the king and his ſubjects, in which his majeſty is taken priſoner. An act to diveſt the citizens of their liberties. Several citizens impriſoned at Windſor. Matters accommodated between the Londoners and the king, who grants them a charter of remiſſion.

THE whole nation ſeverely feeling the ill conſequences of the oppreſſions of their avaricious and tyrannical monarch, it was determined in a parliament held at Oxford in the year 1218, at once to ſhake off the burden; and they accordingly took ſuch meaſures as ſoon procured a ratification of many ancient rights and privileges which had been infamouſly violated by Henry.

Meſſengers were diſpatched to London to inform the citizens of the ſteps the parliament of Oxford had taken, to ſhew to them a confirmation of their liberties, ſigned by Henry and his brother, and to know if they would upon every occaſion act in defence of the ſaid rights and privileges.

The citizens, after calling a folkmote, and debating on the ſubject, aſſented, and ſolemnly ſwore to maintain their rights from the ſmalleſt infringement.

In conſequence of theſe ſtatutes paſſing into a law, except two tons of wine, at two pounds per ton, which the king was allowed out of every ſhip, the king's purveyors were obliged to pay ready money for every thing they had in London.

At the cloſe of this year, the perſons appointed to collect money for repairing the city walls were detected in embezzling conſiderable ſums, but, contrary to expectation, through the interceſſion of Manſell, they were pardoned, on paying a conſiderable ſum of money to the king's treaſurer.

In February 1259, Henry, his brother Richard, king of the Romans, and their queens, made a public entry into the city, where they were received with every mark of reſpect, and the city was embelliſhed in a moſt ſumptuous manner; and ſhortly after the king, confirmed the privileges of the company of German or Anſeatic merchants, at the requeſt of the king of the Romans.

Henry deſigning to viſit France, ſummoned a folkmote, which was held on the ſixth of November, the ſame year, when he aſſured the citizens in an affectionate ſpeech, that he would preſerve their liberties free from all encroachments; and enjoined the mayor to be doubly vigilant, during his abſence, to preſerve peace and good order among the citizens.

A great diſſention happening, during the king's abſence, between the earl of Glouceſter and prince Edward, a parliament was ſummoned to meet at Weſtminſter, where the prince and earl, attended by numerous and armed retinues, ſoon arrived to ſupport their oppoſite intereſts in parliament; and both parties deſigning to lodge in the city, the mayor thought it prudent to adviſe with the regency; who, after calling to their aſſiſtance the king of the Romans, determined that the mayor ſhould not give admittance to either of them, but that every citizen of the age of fifteen ſhould be immediately furniſhed with arms, in order to defend themſelves on the occaſion, if force ſhould be attempted; and, at the ſame time, a prodigious number of armed men were brought by the king's brother, and two of the regency, into the city, where they continued till the diſpute was ended.

The king arriving, during the ſitting of parliament, from France, he ordered the prince to reſide at Weſtminſter, and the earl in London, lodging himſelf at the biſhop of London's palace; and the affair was ſhortly after compromiſed to the entire ſatisfaction of the parties concerned.

Henry, diſſatisfied with the ſtatutes made and ſigned at Oxford, determined to break through the reſtrictions there laid upon him: but, ſenſible that he muſt firſt gain the Londoners to his intereſt, he ſummoned a folkmote, which was held at St. Paul's croſs the day before valentine's day in the year 1260, where he ordered every citizen more than twelve years of age to be ſworn, before the mayor and aldermen, to be true and faithful to their king and his heirs, and enjoined the mayor always to have a number of armed men in readineſs to ſuppreſs any commotions in, or attempts upon the city.

The next year Henry renewed his precaution, and after having the city wall, together with the fortifications of the Tower of London repaired, he, a third time, ſwore the citizens to adhere to him, and then ſent a powerful body of guards into the city, and ordered proclamation to be made, that he would maintain all perſons that would enter into his ſervice.

All this management was nearly overturned by an injudicious ſeizure of ſeveral ſhips loaded with corn, by the conſtable of the Tower, which ſo greatly irritated the citizens, that they were with great difficulty appeaſed; however, it was determined by the chief juſtice Baſſet, that the keeper of the Tower ſhould, in future, come to the market in the city to purchaſe corn for the king and the inhabitants of the Tower, and that it ſhould be ſold to him for two pence in the quarter leſs than the aſſize fixed by the mayor.

A quarrel happening on the ninth of November following, between a chriſtian and a jew, in the church of St. Mary Cole, at the corner of the Old Jury in the Poultry, the latter dangerouſly wounded the former, and attempted to eſcape, but being purſued, he was overtaken and ſtabbed; and the mob, in the height of their fury, plundered and deſtroyed the houſes of ſeveral other jews.

The year following, the river Thames was frozen over in ſuch a manner, that not only men, women, and children, paſſed over it, but it became a highway for the heavieſt carriages.

In the year 1262, a cauſe was tried between the Londoners and the abbot of Weſtminſter, when it appeared by the verdict of the jury, which conſiſted of twelve knights of the county of Middleſex, that the ſheriff of London had a right to enter the town of Weſtminſter, and all the houſes in Middleſex belonging to the abbot, and to diſtrain his tenants in caſe of non-appearance on a proper ſummons.

Prince Edward returning from Wales in the year 1263, repaired to the temple of the knights templars, which he broke open, and took from their treaſury the ſum of ten thouſand pounds; at which the citizens were ſo highly irritated, that they inſtantly took to their arms, and aſſaulted and plundered the houſes of lord Gray and divers other courtiers, and unanimouſly reſolved to join the barons, who, being informed, that the king had violated his oath made to them at Oxford, were raiſing a powerful army.

A meſſenger arriving, at the ſame time, from the barons, to know if the Londoners would join them, the mayor, Thomas Fitz Thomas, carried the letter to the king, who then held his court in the Tower of London, and who directly aſked the mayor his opinion, as to the meaſures proper to be taken. The mayor deſired he might be permitted to conſult his brother citizens, which requeſt not being complied with, he told the king, "that he and his brethren, the aldermen and commonalty of London had been frequently ſworn "to obey all ſuch ordinances as had been made to "the honour of God, the intereſt of the king, and "the good of the kingdom; which oaths they "thought themſelves obliged in conſcience to "keep; and that to prevent any further miſunderſtanding between him and his nobility, on "account of foreigners reſiding in London, they "had taken a reſolution to expel all aliens from "the city."

To this the king made no reply, conſcious that the preſent period was a very improper one to ſhew any kind of reſentment; and the mayor, on his return, gave the barons a particular account of the whole tranſaction.

While theſe affairs were in agitation, it was thought a point of prudence that the city ſhould be well guarded; upon which a ſtrong guard was appointed in the day time, and in the night time there was a regular patrol of horſe and foot guards.

A ſet of thieves, taking advantage of this circumſtance, pretended to be a part of the foot guard, and entering the houſes of many of the citizens, with the plea of ſearching for ſtrangers, committed a great number of robberies. To prevent theſe practices, a regular watch was appointed in every ward; and the barons were admitted into the city ſoon afterwards.

Hereupon the king concluded a treaty with the barons and citizens, in which he engaged to abide by the ſtatutes made at Oxford; ſoon after which he removed from the Tower to Weſtminſter, and ſent a meſſage to the mayor and citizens of London, in which he enjoined them to preſerve the peace of the metropolis.

But the barons, with a view to ingratiate themſelves ſtill farther, into the good opinion of the Londoners, undertook to procure the king's charter to confirm all their ancient liberties, and to grant them ſuch farther privileges, as they thought might contribute to the proſperity of the city.

In this, however, the barons engaged for more than they could perform; for Henry had no other view in making his laſt conceſſions, than to gain time to ſtrengthen his party, which he ſoon effected, by prevailing with ſome of the barons to eſpouſe his cauſe.

Affairs were in this ſituation, when the citizens, reſolved to ſubmit no longer to the arbitrary will of ſo deſpotic a monarch, marched into Lambeth Fields to give him battle: but it was there agreed by both parties, that Lewis, king of France, ſhould arbitrate the matters in diſpute between them.

During the interval in which they waited for the determination of the French monarch, it happened, in the week preceding Eaſter, in the year 1264, that a jew having demanded more than than legal intereſt for the loan of twenty ſhillings for a week, the populace aſſembled in all parts of the city, attacked the jews with ſo diabolical a rage, that above five hundred of them were moſt inhumanly murdered, their ſynagogue and their houſes deſtroyed, and thoſe who eſcaped through the humanity of particular perſons, were ſecured in the Tower of London from farther inſult.

The French king having given his award in favour of Henry, the barons accuſed Lewis of partiality, had immediate recourſe to arms, and eaſily engaged the populace of London to embark in the ſame cauſe; and theſe imagining that ſome of the aldermen and principal citizens were in the intereſt of the king, they uſurped the government of the city, re-choſe Thomas Fitz-Thomas for mayor, and engaged to take up arms on a ſignal given by the tolling of the great bell of St. Paul's.

The conſtable of the Tower, with a body of men under his command, having joined the citizens, they marched to Iſleſworth, where they deſtroyed the palace of the king of the Romans; and on their return pulled down the king's ſummer houſe in the neighbourhood of Weſtminſter.

Theſe feats being atchieved, they returned in triumph to the city, joined the earl of Leiceſter, and marched, under his command, to give battle to the king: but his majeſty retreated into Kent, where he prevailed upon the cinque ports to ſend a number of ſhips to block up the river Thames, ſo as to prevent the port of London from receiving a ſupply of proviſions or merchandize.

The forces under the command of the earl of Leiceſter, together with a great body of Londoners, immediately marched in purſuit of the king; and encamping at a place called Flexenwith, in Suſſex, within five miles of the royal army, diſpatched the biſhops of London and Worceſter, to propoſe terms of accommodation.

Henry rejecting their propoſals with diſdain, a battle enſued, in which prince Edward, with the troops under his command, attacked that wing of the army which conſiſted of Londoners, who being altogether undiſciplined, were ſoon put to flight.

Prince Edward purſued them four miles, making a terrible ſlaughter; but this injudicious conduct occaſioned the royal army to be totally routed; and the earl of Leiceſter took the king of England, the king of the Romans, and prince Edward priſoners.

Leiceſter now preſuming to uſurp the government into his own hands, his party were ſo greatly diſguſted that many of them joined that of the king; and prince Edward making his eſcape from impriſonment, marched againſt Leiceſter, and gave him battle, in which the earl and one of his ſons were killed.

About Chriſtmas the king ſummoned a parliament to meet at Weſtminſter, who were ſo extremely ſubſervient to the will of his majeſty, that they made a law, ordaining, "that the city "of London, for its late rebellion, ſhould be "diveſted of its liberties, its poſts and chains "taken away, and its principal citizens impri-"ſoned, and left to the mercy of the king."

Notwithſtanding the paſſing of this law, ſome of the citizens were for defending themſelves to the laſt extremity; but the fears of the majority prevailing over their courage, it was finally reſolved to ſubmit themſelves to the king's clemency.

In conſequence of this reſolution, an inſtrument in writing was drawn up, to which the ſeal of the city was affixed, and after great application had been made, the king determined to accept their ſubmiſſion, and gave his ſafe-conduct to the mayor, aldermen, and forty of the principal citizens, to attend him at Windſor.

The citizens, conſidering this ſafe-conduct as a full ſecurity to their perſons, repaired to Windſor, where they were treated with great indignity, and committed to the care of the conſtable of the caſtle, who confined them in a large tower, where they were very meanly accommodated.

On the evening of the following day they were all removed to lodgings prepared for them, except Fitz-Thomas, the mayor, Michael Tony, Stephen Buckerell, Thomas Pywelldon, and John Fleet, who being conſidered as ringleaders in the late rebellion, were, notwithſtanding their ſafe-conduct, delivered to prince Edward, to be dealt with as he ſhould think proper; and by his orders they were cloſely confined in priſon, till they paid what was demanded for their ranſom.

His majeſty having diſmiſſed the city magiſtrates from their offices, appointed Humphrey de Bohun, earl of Hertford, John de Baliol, Roger de Leyburn, and Roger de Walerand, guardians of this city; and iſſued a writ to them, in which he recited, that "Whereas the mayor, ci-"tizens, and whole community of London, had "ſubmitted themſelves, both as to their lives "and limbs, together with their lands, tenements, "and eſtates to the king's mercy, they were to "cauſe proclamation to be made, that his peace "ſhould be kept in the city and parts adjacent. "Given at Windſor the ſixth of October."

Not content with this, his majeſty ſeized on the eſtates of many of the chief citizens, and gave to his domeſtics their houſes, moveable effects, lands and chattels. He likewiſe cauſed the ſons of other citizens to be impriſoned in the Tower, as a ſecurity of the good behaviour of their parents; and he detained four of the richeſt citizens, among whom was Thomas Fitz-Thomas, priſoners at Windſor, till they purchaſed their liberty at a moſt exorbitant price.

The unfortunate citizens, wearied out with theſe continual oppreſſions, and dreading ſtill greater and more accumulated miſeries, moſt humbly addreſſed themſelves to the king, and beſought him to name a ſum which he would accept, as a full token of his reconciliation, and a remiſſion of all paſt offences.

The tyrant demanded ſixty thouſand marks; an immenſe ſum at that period of time! but this the Londoners declared themſelves unable to pay, without involving many innocent families in ruin; and therefore intreated the king to lower his demands to ſuch a ſum as they ſhould be able to collect for him.

At length Henry agreed to accept twenty thouſand marks, as a full reſtitution for all offences; and the citizens having given ſecurity for for the payment of this ſum, the king granted them the following charter of remiſſion.

" Henry by the grace of God, king of Eng-
" lord of Ireland, and duke of Guyan, to all
" men greeting.

" Know ye, that in conſideration of twenty
" thouſand marks, paid to us by our citizens
" of London, as an atonement for their great
" crimes and miſdemeanours committed againſt
" us, our royal conſort, our royal brother Ri" chard, king of the Romans, and our dear ſon
" Edward: That we have and do by theſe pre-
" ſents remit, forgive, and acquit, for us and our " heirs, the citizens of London and their heirs,
" of all crimes and treſpaſſes whatſoever; and " that the ſaid citizens, as formerly, ſhall enjoy
" all their rights and liberties; and that from " Chriſtmas laſt they ſhall and may receive the " rents and profits of all their lands and tene-
" ments whatſoever: And alſo, that the ſaid
" citizens ſhall have all the goods and chattels
" of ſuch criminals, as have or ſhall be indicted
" on account of the late rebellion; except the " goods and chattels of the perſons already men" tioned, which we have given to our ſon Ed" ward; and alſo, all the lands and tenements
" that ſhall eſcheat to us, by reaſon of the fore-
" ſaid rebellion. And we likewiſe grant, that " all the citizens confined in our ſeveral priſons
" ſhall be diſcharged; except thoſe given as " pledges to our ſon Edward for his priſoners,
" and thoſe for citizens that are fled. In witneſs
" whereof we have made theſe letters patents.

" Witneſs myſelf at Northampton, the tenth " day of January, in the fiftieth year of
" our reign."

Hereupon the king, on the day following, ſigned a warrant for the diſcharge of all the priſoners not excepted in the pardon above recited; and two ſeneſchals whom his majeſty had appointed to govern the city, being diſmiſſed, the citizens made choice of William Fitz-Richard for mayor, and Thomas le Ford, and Gregory de Rockeſly were choſen ſheriffs.

CHAPTER XI.

The citizens collect the twenty thouſand marks for the king. Conteſted election of a mayor. London ſurprized by the earl of Glouceſter. Matters accommodated between the king and the earl, and an important charter granted to the citizens of London. The ſheriffs or bailiffs account of profits ariſing to the king in the city. A deſperate battle by night, between the Goldſmiths, Merchant-Taylors, and other citizens. A ſevere froſt in 1269, and exceſſive rains in the year following. A dreadful famine. Several perſons killed by the falling of the ſteeple of Bow-church.

THE government of the city being thus ſettled, and affairs beginning to wear a more favourable aſpect than they had done for a conſiderable time paſt, the citizens loſt no time in collecting the twenty thouſand marks which they had engaged to pay to the king: when not only the houſe-holders, but lodgers and ſervants were aſſeſſed towards raiſing this ſum; and many perſons, unable to bear the weight of this tax, were diſfranchiſed.

Not long after this, the king iſſued an order for the payment of three-pence per day to each of the keepers of the ſeven gates of this city.

In the year 1267, the citizens preſented an humble petition to the king, for permiſſion to chuſe two bailiffs, to take the cuſtody of London and the county of Middleſex; which being accepted, his majeſty ordered the barons of the exchequer to admit the ſaid bailiffs, when regularly preſented to them; upon which the Londoners made choice of two of their fellow citizens, who took an oath of fidelity to the king, and to the citizens of London.

In the year abovementioned, there was a violent diſpute between the magiſtrates and the common citizens reſpecting the election of a mayor; when a folkmote being held on the occaſion, the aldermen and the principal citizens were for electing Allen Souche to that office; but the inferior people declared for Thomas Fitz-Thomas, tho' he was not yet diſcharged from his confinement at Windſor.

At length, Souche's party, being ſupported by the court, carried the election by force, and ſeizing many of their opponents, committed them to priſon; whereupon Souche was declared duly elected.

In the ſame year likewiſe, Gilbert de Clare, earl of Glouceſter, together with many of the barons, having raiſed a numerous army, under pretence of aſſiſting the king in a war againſt France, but in reality favouring the deſigns of a number of rebels in the Iſle of Ely; the earl procured the regent's permiſſion to quarter a part of his forces in the city of London.

The forces had been thus ſtationed but a ſhort time, before the earl began to diſcover his real intentions, and a ſtrong party of the rebels arriving in Southwark, he then threw off the maſk at once.

Hereupon the magiſtrates drew up the drawbridge, and ſhut the gates of the city: but the earl took the keys from the mayor, and delivered them to perſons attached to his cauſe; ſo that the rebels had free admiſſion into the city, and the citizens were ſo alarmed that many of them abſconded; whereupon the earl immediately ſeized their effects, and began to ſecure the city by additional fortifications.

The populace now ſecured the perſons of ſuch of the aldermen as were known to be in the intereſt of the king, committed them to priſon, and divided their effects among themſelves. They likewiſe degraded the mayor and ſheriffs, and choſe others in their ſtead.

Matters were in this ſituation when the earl of Glouceſter inveſted the Tower of London; but he was vigorouſly oppoſed by the pope's legate, and a great number of jews who had retired thither for ſecurity.

This oppoſition gave time to the king, who was then at Cambridge, to march to the relief of the Tower, with an army of thirty thouſand French and Scots, which his ſon Edward had raiſed.

The king taking Windſor in his way to London, halted at that place; when the idea of his majeſty's near approach ſo terrified the earl of Glouceſter that he made propoſals of accommodation. Theſe, however, the king rejected with diſdain; upon which a day was appointed to decide the affair by a battle on Hounſlow Heath.

The king and his army attended at the appointed place; but their opponents not making their appearance, his majeſty marched towards London, and wheeling to the eaſt, encamped near Stratford, from whence he attempted to aſſault the city, at ſeveral different times, for the ſpace of two months, but without effect.

In the interim, Glouceſter diſpatched different parties to ravage and lay waſte the counties of Kent and Surry, where they met with no oppoſition, and returned laden with booty.

They now repaired to Weſtminſter, where they did great damage to the abbey, broke the doors and windows of the king's palace, and ſeized upon his wine and the richeſt of his furniture.

Four of theſe banditti being taken, were diſcovered to be ſervants of the earl of Derby; upon which that nobleman ordered them to be tied up in ſacks, and thrown into the Thames, which ſentence was accordingly executed.

By this time the earl of Glouceſter was reduced to great extremities, his army being abſolutely in want of proviſions; ſo that he made a virtue of neceſſity, and by the interpoſition of the king of the Romans, at length accommodated all matters in diſpute between him and Henry, and the citizens of London were included in this accommodation.

Though Henry granted the Londoners a full pardon, yet he inſiſted upon their paying a thouſand marks to the king of the Romans, for the damage they had heretofore done to his palace at Iſleſworth.

The behaviour of the citizens in the late tranſactions being eſteemed rather the effect of compulſion than choice, his majeſty in the year 1268 granted them the following charter.

" Henry, by the grace of God, king of Eng" land, lord of Ireland, duke of Aquitain; to " his archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, priors, earls,
" barons, ſheriffs, juſtices, rulers, miniſters, and
" all bailiffs, and his faithful ſubjects, greeting.

" Know ye, that we have granted to our ci" tizens of London, for us and our heirs, whom
" of late we have received again into our grace
" and favour, after divers treſpaſſes and for-
" feitures of them and their commonalty to us
" made, for the which, both for life and mem" ber, and all other things belonging to the " ſaid city, they have ſubmitted themſelves to
" our will; that none of them be compelled to " plead out of the walls of the ſaid city, for " any thing except foreign tenures, and except
" our monyers and officers, and except thoſe
" things which ſhall happen to be done againſt
" our peace, which, according to the common " law of our realm, are wont to be determined
" in the parts where thoſe treſpaſſes were done;
" and except pleas concerning merchandizes,
" which are wont to be determined according to
" the law-merchant in boroughs and fairs, ſo
" yet notwithſtanding that thoſe plaints be de" termined in the boroughs and fairs, by four " or five of the ſaid citizens of London, who
" ſhall be there preſent; ſaving to us the amer-

His majeſty, by the above-recited charter, grants a remiſſion of all paſt offences, confirms all their ancient privileges except the chuſing of their magiſtrates, and prohibits the foreſtalling of the markets, under ſevere penalties.

Soon after this, his majeſty iſſued his precept to Allen Souche the mayor, to preſent to him ſix perſons eligible to the office of ſheriff, two of whom, viz. Walter Harvey and William de Durham, were appointed to that office by the name of bailiffs.

The ſaid bailiffs having delivered to the king an account of the profits ariſing to his majeſty in the city for the ſpace of half a year, we ſhall ſubjoin it as a curioſity, as we find it in Madox's Hiſtory of the Exchequer.

In the ſame year, 1268, a violent diſpute ariſing between the company of Goldſmiths and that of the Merchant-Taylors; and ſeveral other companies taking part with one or the other, their paſſions were at length ſo inflamed, that more than five hundred people, completely armed, aſſembled in the night, and engaged with ſuch fury, that many perſons were killed and wounded of both parties: nor did the battle ceaſe, till the ſheriffs, having raiſed a conſiderable body of the citizens, ſeized ſeveral of the combatants; thirteen of whom being tried and convicted, received ſentence of death, and ſuffered accordingly.

The year 1269 is remarkable for an uncommon ſevere froſt, which beginning in the month of November, continued till the month of February, during almoſt all which time the navigation was ſo totally obſtructed, that no ſhips could ſail up the Thames, and foreign merchandize was brought to London by land, from the ſeveral ſea-ports.

In the year 1270 the rains were ſo exceſſive that the fruits of the earth were in a great meaſure deſtroyed, and the river Thames breaking down and overflowing its banks in many places, did inconceivable damage both to houſes and land.

The conſequence of theſe inundations were ſeverely felt; for wheat raiſed to the enormous price of ſix pounds eight ſhillings the quarter,* and the famine at length raged to ſuch an aſtoniſhing degree, that, if the authority of ancient writers may be relied on, many of the poorer people were reduced to the dreadful neceſſity of eating their own children.

At the latter end of this year many people unfortunately loſt their lives, by the ſudden falling of the ſteeple of the church of St. Mary le Bow, in Cheapſide.

PRINCE Edward having undertaken an expedition to the holy land, he there received advice of the death of his father, Henry the third, who departed this life at Weſtminſter, on the twentieth of November 1272, after an oppreſſive and inglorious reign of more than fifty-ſix years.

On being made acquainted with the death of Henry, the young king immediately diſpatched letters to the mayor, ſheriffs, and citizens of London, in which he recited many injuries his ſubjects had ſuſtained from the Flemiſh; he therefore ordered proclamation to be made that no Fleming ſhould be permitted to reſide in London, on the penalty of forfeiting his whole effects.

His majeſty likewiſe directed the magiſtrates carefully to preſerve the peace of the city during his abſence, which he promiſed to make as ſhort as poſſible; and not having the ſeal of England with him, that of the king of Sicily was affixed to theſe diſpatches.

The citizens were ſo pleaſed with having been honoured with theſe letters from their ſovereign, that on his majeſty's return to England, he was received into London with the utmoſt pomp and magnificence; the fronts of the houſes being adorned with the richeſt tapeſtry and ſilks; the wealthy citizens ſcattered gold and ſilver among the populace, and the conduits were ſupplied with a variety of the moſt delicious wines.

From ſuch appearances the public entertained hopes of enjoying great eaſe and happineſs under their new ſovereign: but their pleaſing dream was ſoon at an end; for on the choice of the next mayor, there aroſe ſuch a diſſention among them, as might have had the moſt fatal conſequences, if they had been ruled by a monarch more diſpoſed to arbitrary meaſures than Edward appears to have been.

In this caſe, however, the king only interpoſed ſo far as to appoint a cuſtos of the city, till the paſſions of the contending parties ſhould ſubſide.

By this appointment the citizens began to ſee the ill conſequences that might ariſe from their civil diſſentions, as they might at any time furniſh the king with a plauſible pretence for interfering in the government of the city.

* This ſum is equal to above ſixty pounds for a quarter of wheat at this time!

They

They therefore unanimouſly made choice of Walter Harvey for mayor, who was the very man that the populace had propoſed at firſt: but ſoon finding that Harvey was a man of bad character, they, in the year following, degraded him from the office of alderman, declared him incapable of being a member of the city council, and obliged him to give ſecurity for his good behaviour during life.

The iniquitous practices of engroſſing and foreſtalling, being now carried to the moſt enormous height, it became neceſſary to provide laws againſt all who ſhould be found guilty; and in particular againſt the bakers who accuſtomed themſelves to make bread ſhort of weight, and the millers who ſold their meal by a ſhort meaſure.

The legiſlator having paſſed laws for the redreſs of theſe grievances, the king iſſued his orders for the mayor and ſheriffs of London to enforce them, and to regulate the prices of the various kinds of proviſions, and particularly of poultry and fiſh, which were the articles that were chiefly engroſſed.

By theſe laws the baker was to forfeit his bread for the firſt offence, to ſuffer impriſonment for the ſecond, and to be impilloried for the third.

The puniſhment ordained for the miller who ſhould be convicted of offending againſt the ſtatute, was to be carried through certain ſtreets of the city, in a tumbrel or duſt cart, expoſed to the contempt of the people.

In obedience to theſe laws, the magiſtrates of the city publiſhed an ordinance to the following purpoſe. "By the command of the lord the king, "and with the aſſent and conſent of the gentlemen of the kingdom, and citizens aforeſaid, "it is ordained that no huckſter of fowl (or "poulterer) go out of the city to meet them "that bring poultry into the city, to make any "buying from them; but buy in the city, after "the buyers of the lord the king, of the barons, "and of the citizens, have bought and had what "ſhall be needful for them, namely, after three "o'clock, and not before."

After this hour the following proviſions were to be ſold at the undermentioned prices:

In the year 1275, it was ordained by act of parliament, that no jews ſhould follow the practice of uſury, and that for the future all uſurers ſhould wear a badge on their breaſt, or immediately quit the kingdom.

In the ſame year the mayor of London being appointed the king's ambaſſador beyond the ſeas, his majeſty entruſted the government of London to four perſons of eminence who were recommended by their brother citizens.

About this time a moſt terrible earthquake happened, which threw down many houſes and churches in London, damaged many others, and extended its dreadful effects to many other parts of the kingdom.

In this ſame year, 1275, Robert Kilwarby, archbiſhop of Canterbury, by licence from the crown, founded the convent of preaching friars, commonly called Black-friars, which was erected partly out of the ruins of a part of the city wall taken down on that occaſion, and partly out of the ſtones of the tower of Mount-Fitchet, which was likewiſe pulled down to make way for the building the ſaid convent.

The king likewiſe commanded the citizens to erect a new wall, to run weſtward from Ludgate, behind the houſes to Fleet-ditch, and then ſouth as far as the Thames; and at the head of this wall to erect a tower for his majeſty's reception.

Towards the expence of completing this work, king Edward granted the city a duty to be raiſed on ſeveral kinds of merchandize for the ſpace of three years; and ſent them the following letter ſoon afterwards.

" Whereas we have granted you, for aid of " the work of the walls of our city, and the " cloſure of the ſame, divers cuſtoms of vend- " ible things, coming to the ſaid city, to be " taken for a certain time; we command you, " that you cauſe to be finiſhed the wall of the " ſaid city, now begun near the manſion of the " friars preachers, and a certain good and " comely tower at the head of the ſaid wall, " within the water of the Thames there, wherein " we may be received and tarry with honour, " to our eaſe and ſatisfaction in our comings " there, out of the pence taken and to be taken " of the ſaid cuſtoms, &c.

" Witneſs myſelf at Weſtminſter, the eighth " day of July, in the fourth year of my " reign."

It was ordained in the fifth year of this king's reign, that no market ſhould be held on London bridge, or in any other place, except ſuch as ſhould be by a common-council appointed. It was alſo ordered that no perſon ſhould go to Southwark to buy wares, which might be purchaſed in the city. This is the firſt ordinance of common-council relative to the order of holding of markets in the city of London.

In the year 1278, a great number of jews being convicted of clipping and diminiſhing the king's coin, the jews throughout England were ſeized and impriſoned in one day; and of thoſe apprehended in London, two hundred and eighty of both ſexes were executed.

London-bridge being in a very ruinous condition, the citizens, in the year 1281, procured letters patent of the king, empowering the bridge keeper to receive a toll of all ſuch perſons as ſhould paſs over it.

In the year 1282 the Anſeatic company of merchants were called upon to fulfil their engagements with reſpect to repairing Biſhopſgate, which was in a very ruinous ſituation; which demand of the city being rejected by the company, the affair was carried by writ into the exchequer, and the company were obliged to perform their agreement.

In the ſame year, upon the citizens paying to the king a conſiderable ſum of money, he granted them a pardon for every infringement they had made, contrary to their charters, to that time; and in the following year he granted letters patent for the repairing and incloſing the city.

This year, 1283, Llewellyn, the laſt Welſh prince who reigned in Wales, having loſt a battle, fled for ſafety to Bluith caſtle, where he was betrayed into the hands of Roger le Strange, who, taking him when he was not in the leaſt apprehenſion of danger, with a ſtroke of his broad ſword took off his head, at the moment he was railing againſt the Engliſh.

The head being directly ſent to Edward, he ordered it to be carried to London, and the citizens met the meſſenger who brought it, and conducted him into the city with drums and trumpets, and proceeded in grand cavalcade through Cheapſide, with the head fixed upon a lance with a chaplet or circle of ſilver; * it was then fixed for the remainder of the day upon the pillory in Cheapſide, and afterwards upon the tower of London, crowned with a wreath of ivy.

A moſt intenſe froſt happened the winter fol-

* According to an antient author, this was done by way of ſneer, the prince having been told by a Welſh fortune-teller, that his head ſhould one day paſs through Cheapſide adorned with a ſilver coronet.

lowing

lowing, at the breaking of which five arches of London-bridge were carried away.

In the year 1284, a goldſmith, named Lawrence Ducket, having wounded Ralph Crepin in Weſtcheap, (now Cheapſide) he fled for ſafety to Bow church, and concealed himſelf in the ſteeple; he was, however, ſurprized in the night by Crepin's friends, who hung him up in one of the windows in ſuch a poſition, that upon an inqueſt being taken on the body, the jury brought in their verdict Felo de ſe, and he was accordingly buried in a ditch; however, the murderers were at laſt informed againſt by a boy who had concealed himſelf in the church during the ſhocking tranſaction, and ſixteen men were hanged, and a woman, the perpetrator of it, was burnt alive: The body was dug up, put into a coffin, and decently buried.

In the year following the conduit in Cheapſide was built; and it was ordered that only an halfpenny ſhould be paid for grinding a quarter of wheat.

The ſame year the jewiſh ſynagogues in London were deſtroyed by command of John Peckham, archbiſhop of Canterbury.

At a time when the affairs of the city ſeemed to wear a moſt favourable aſpect, a diſguſt was unfortunately given to the lord treaſurer by the mayor, who refuſed to attend to give an account of the meaſures taken by him and the aldermen for the preſervation of the peace; and upon their attendance being inſiſted on, the mayor went to Barking church, where he delivered the city ſeal and the enſigns of mayoralty to Stephen Aſwy, and retired to the tower.

The treaſurer was ſo highly incenſed at this behaviour, that he ordered the mayor, together with many of the principal citizens to be taken into cuſtody, and committed to priſon; and Stephen Sandwich was by the king appointed cuſtos of London, in which office he remained only till the February following, when another perſon was appointed.

The pretence for degrading the mayor was, that he had connived at the unlawful practices of the bakers; and under colour of puniſhing them for offences, which every citizen knew had never been committed, for twelve years the city of London was without a mayor.

The city ſoon felt the ill effects of being deprived of its firſt magiſtrate; robberies, and even murders became frequent throughout the city and ſuburbs; which occaſioned the following regulations to be made. "That no ſtranger ſhould "wear a weapon nor be ſeen abroad after the "ringing of the corfeu-bell; that all taverns "and victualling-houſes ſhould be ſhut up after "the ringing of the ſaid bell; that no fencing-"ſchool ſhould be kept in the city; that the al-"dermen in their reſpective wards ſhould make "diligent ſearch for ſuch offenders, in order to "bring them to juſtice; that no perſon not free "of the city ſhould be ſuffered to reſide therein; "and that ſuch freemen as were ſuſpected, ſhould "give ſecurity for their good behaviour:" amongſt whom were Thomas Pywelldon and fifty-ſeven others, who were exiled for life.

A great number of foreign merchants were about this time permitted to ſettle in London, and obtained leave ſoon after to diſpoſe of their goods without employing a broker, which was as advantageous to them as diſadvantageous to the citizens; for before this time, they were obliged to keep in their lodgings, and their landlords, who were citizens, officiating as brokers, were very great gainers.

The foreigners, however, making uſe of many villainous practices, by which the fair traders were conſiderably hurt, many of them were apprehended and carried to priſon, and were obliged to pay large ſums for their enlargement.

In the fifteenth year of his reign, Edward commanded the court of exchequer to be removed to Guildhall, at which time it appeared, that the citizens were five hundred and thirty-eight pounds, ſix ſhillings and eight-pence, indebted to the king.

One of the ſheriffs of London carrying a priſoner to gaol in the year 1293, the mob ſeized on the priſoner and conveyed him away; for which offence, three perſons ſoon after had their hands cut off, at the ſtandard in Cheapſide, by the common hangman.

In the year 1295 Ralph Sandwich was again appointed cuſtos of the city, and a diſpute ariſing between him and the prior of St. Bartholomew's, relative to the profits ariſing from the fair of that name held in Smithfield, the cuſtos inſiſting that as the privileges of the city were forfeited, all the benefits ariſing therefrom muſt of courſe belong to the king: the affair coming to the knowledge of Edward, who was then at Durham, he ordered that the controverſy ſhould be determined by the barons, and his treaſurer, and the following brief was diſpatched to the cuſtos and ſheriffs of London, for that purpoſe:

"The lord the king hath commanded the "cuſtos and ſheriffs in theſe words: Edward, "by the grace of God, to the cuſtos and ſhe-"riffs of London, greeting: Whereas the prior "of St. Bartholomew in Smithfield, in the ſu-"burbs of London, by the charter of our pro-"genitors, kings of England, and our confir-"mation, claimeth to have a certain fair there "every year, during three days, viz. on the "eve, on the day, and on the morrow of St. "Bartholomew the Apoſtle, with all liberties "and free cuſtoms belonging to the fair; a con-"tention hath ariſen between the ſaid prior and "you the ſaid cuſtos, which ſue for us, concern-"ing the uſe of the liberties of the ſaid fair, "and the free cuſtoms belonging to it: And "hindrance being made to the ſaid prior by you "the ſaid cuſtos, as the ſame prior aſſerteth, to "wit, concerning a moiety of the ſaid eve, and "of the whole morrow beforeſaid; concerning "which, we will, as well for us, as for the "foreſaid prior, that juſtice be done, as is fit, "before our treaſurer and barons of the exche-"quer, from the day of St. Michael next, for "one month. We command you, that ſufficient "ſecurity be taken of the ſaid prior, of reſtoring "to us the ſaid day the iſſues of the aforeſaid "fair, coming from the moiety of the aforeſaid "eve, and of the whole morrow, if the ſaid "prior cannot then ſhew ſomething for himſelf, "why the ſaid iſſues ought not to belong to us.

We

" We command you, that ye permit the ſame " prior, in the mean time, to receive the foreſaid " iſſues, in form aforeſaid. And you have there- " fore this brief.

" Witneſs myſelf at Dunelm, the ninth day " of Auguſt, in the twentieth year of our " reign."

Edward having been informed, that ſeveral of the clergy had been committed by the laity to the Tun, a priſon ſo called in Cornhill, on pretence of their having committed crimes of which they were entirely innocent, he ſhewed his diſapprobation of ſuch meaſures, by directing the following writ to the mayor and citizens.

" Edward, by the grace of God, &c. Where- " as Richard Graveſend, biſhop of London, " hath ſhewed unto us, that by the great charter " of England, the church hath a privilege, that no " clerk ſhall be impriſoned by a layman, without " our commandment and breach of peace; which " notwithſtanding, ſome citizens of London, " upon mere ſpite, do enter in their watches into " clerk's chambers, and, like felons, do carry " them to the Tunney, which Henry de Walleys, " ſome time mayor, built for night-walkers. " Wherefore, we will that this our command- " ment be proclaimed in full huſtings; and that " no watch hereafter enter into any clerk's cham- " ber, under the forfeit of 20l. Dated at Car- " liſle, the 18th of March, in the 25th year of " our reign."

The citizens being highly offended at this mandate, a number of them aſſembled, broke open the tun, and ſuffered ſeveral of the priſoners to eſcape; for which behaviour they were peſonally puniſhed, and the city was fined twenty thouſand marks, which ſums the citizens were obliged to pay, together with three thouſand marks more, for which they obtained full confirmation of their ancient rights and privileges; for the king returning victorious from Scotland, and the citizens teſtifying their joy on the occaſion, he ordered the aldermen, together with the principal magiſtrates, to attend him on Eaſter Wedneſday at Weſtminſter, at which time and place he reſtored them the power of electing a mayor; and Henry Walleys being choſen into that office the Friday after, was preſented to the king at Fulham, the Wedneſday following, when he was very graciouſly received, and next day ſworn in before the barons of the exchequer.

A charter of confirmation of the rights and privileges of the citizens immediately followed the above act of royal favour, in which charter, among other things it is enacted.

" That whereas our ſaid citizens, by the char- " ters of our ſaid progenitors, have been ac- " cuſtomed hitherto to preſent every mayor, " whom they have choſen in the ſaid city yearly, " before the barons of the exchequer, (our pro- " genitor, or we not being at Weſtminſter) that " he may be admitted by the ſaid barons as mayor " for us, notwithſtanding that, at the next com- " ing of our progenitor or of us unto Weſtmin- " ſter or London, he may be preſented to our " progenitors, or to us, and ſo admitted mayor. " We, willing to ſhew more ample favour to the " ſaid citizens in that behalf, do grant to them " for us and our heirs, the mayor of the ſaid " city, when he ſhall be choſen by the ſaid citi- " zens, we, and our heirs, and our barons, not " being at Weſtminſter or at London, they may " or ſhall be preſented or admitted to and by the " conſtable of our Tower of London, yearly, " in ſuch ſort as before they were wont to be " preſented and admitted; ſo as nevertheleſs, " that, at the next coming of us or our heirs to " Weſtminſter or London, the ſaid mayor be " preſented to us or our heirs, and admitted for " mayor.

" And alſo, we have granted for us and our " heirs, to our ſaid citizens, that they and their " ſucceſſors, citizens of the ſaid city, be for " ever quit and free of pannage, pontage and " murage throughout all the realm, and all our " dominions: and that the ſheriffs of the ſaid " city, as often as it ſhall happen them to be " amerced in our court for any offence, they " ſhall be amerced according to the meaſure and " quantity of the offence, as other the ſheriffs of " our ſaid realm have been amerced for the like " offence.

" Wherefore we will, and ſtreightly charge and " command, for us and our heirs, that the ſaid " citizens and their ſucceſſors have all the liber- " ties, freedoms, quittals and free cuſtoms afore- " ſaid, and then may or ſhall uſe according to " our confirmation, renovation, and grants a- " foreſaid, for ever; as by the aforeſaid char- " ter (amongſt other things) more fully appear- " eth."

All which the king certified by the following brief to his officers of his exchequer:

" Edward, by the grace of God, &c. to his " treaſurers and barons of the exchequer, greet- " ing. Whereas, for the good ſervice that our " beloved citizens of London have hitherto done " us, by our letters patent we have rendered and " reſtored to the ſame our foreſaid city, together " with the mayoralty, all their liberties (which " city, mayoralty and liberties we have long " ſince cauſed to be taken into our hands) to be " had and held to the ſame citizens, according to " their will, as freely and intirely as they had and " held them on the day of the ſaid taking them " away, as is contained more fully in our ſaid " letters: we command you, that ye permit the " ſame citizens to uſe and enjoy the liberties " which they have reaſonably uſed on the day of " the foreſaid taking, before you in the exche- " quer beforeſaid, according to the tenor of our " foreſaid Letters. Witneſs myſelf at York, " the eight and twentieth day of May, in the ſix " and twentieth year of our reign."

The additional privileges granted in this charter are 1. The mayor elect is to be preſented and admitted by the conſtable of the Tower of London, in in the abſence of the king and the barons. 2. To be free and quit from pannage. * 3. To be likewiſe free from pontage. † 4. And to pay no murage. ‡

An order to the mayor and ſheriffs at London accompanied this brief, commanding them to puniſh perſonally ſuch bakers, brewers, and millers, as ſhould be found guilty of bad practices, and all malefactors, who were detected in carrying fire-arms about with them in the night; and to oblige millers to return flour according to the weight of grain given to them to be ground.

In the twenty-ſeventh year of this reign, on the feaſt of St. Simon and Jude, Elias Ruſſel was unanimouſly choſen, by the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of London, into the office of mayor of this city, and was ſworn, accordingly, and received by the conſtable of the Tower, (by the king's writ, directed for that purpoſe,) without the Tower gate.

An act of common-council was paſſed during this mayoralty, by conſent of the king and nobility, for regulating the prices of proviſions ſold in London, the butchers, poulterers, &c. having by fixing exorbitant prices upon their different commodities, greatly diſtreſſed the poorer ſort of the citizens: the following is the table of the prices the different ſorts of poultry were fixed at

	s.	d.	qrs.
A fat cock, at	0	1	2

In the year 1304, Geoffrey de Hartilepole, alderman, was elected recorder of this city, which is the firſt account of a recorder of London we meet with in hiſtory.

The year following, the celebrated Scotch champion, Sir William Wallace, being taken priſoner, was, contrary to the laws of nature and of nations, put to an ignominious death in Smithfield for no other crime than defending his native land againſt the attempts of an inveterate enemy.

In the year 1306 the king conferred the order of knighthood on the young prince of Wales, on which occaſion the mayor, aldermen, and citizens of London, preſented his majeſty with the ſum of two thouſand pounds.

In the ſame year the brewers and dyers of London, and others whoſe profeſſions required the uſe of great quantities of ſea coals, burning great quantities of that article, the air was ſo infected by the ſmoke ariſing therefrom, that the health of the inhabitants was thought to be in danger; whereupon, at the requeſt of the nobility and gentry, the king iſſued a proclamation, ſtrictly forbidding the uſe of ſea-coals: but little regard being paid to this proclamation, a commiſſion of oyer and terminer was appointed, to puniſh the delinquents, who were fined for the firſt offence, and had their furnaces and kilns deſtroyed for the ſecond.

* Pannage ſignifies a certain duty payable to the king, for the liberty of ſending ſwine or cattle to feed in any of his foreſts.

† Pontage was a duty paid for liberty to paſs over bridges with horſes, carts, or other carriages; or under them with barges, boats, &c. which duty was applied and put to the uſe of repairing the ſaid bridges.

‡ The term murage ſignifies a duty paid towards repairing or building the walls of the cities and towns throughout England.

CHAPTER XIII.

Edward II. makes his public entry into London. Royal Mandate reſpecting the finiſhing the wall and tower near Ludgate. The king's debts diſcharged by the citizens. London exempted from being taxed as a royal demeſne, on lending the king a thouſand pound. Prices of proviſions regulated by parliament. Proclamation concerning the election of mayor and ſheriffs. The making of wheat into malt forbidden. Dreadful famine and peſtilence. The king's brief for revoking the regulation reſpecting the prices of proviſions. The citizens fined a thouſand marks for pulling down a mud wall. The city ſends repreſentatives to a parliament held at York. A ſtrong watch kept night and day in London. The two Spencers, favourites of the king, baniſhed. A charter exempting the citizens from ſerving the king in a military capacity out of the city. Two thouſand marks extorted from the city. The Londoners join the queen's party, which being ſucceſsful, the king is taken priſoner, and obliged to reſign the crown to his ſon.

HAVING in the preceding chapter faithfully recorded every material tranſaction reſpecting this city, during the reign of Edward I. we now proceed to that of his ſon Edward II. who having married the princeſs Iſabella, daughter to the king of France, made a ſolemn entry into London, in the year 1308, and was received by the citizens with a degree of ſplendor and elegance, that ſufficiently teſtified their loyalty.

His majeſty being informed that part of the new city wall near Ludgate, and the Tower, which his father had ordered to be built at the extremity of the ſaid wall, were not finiſhed; a royal mandate was immediately iſſued to the mayor and citizens of London, enjoining them to loſe no time in compleating the ſaid buildings.

At the ſame time his majeſty granted the following charter, which will ſufficiently explain itſelf.

" Edward, the ſon of king Edward, &c. To " all, &c. Whereas Gregory de Rockeſley, our " mayor of London, and the other barons of the " ſaid city, at our inſtance, have commonly and " unanimouſly granted to the venerable father " Robert, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and his " aſſigns, two lanes, contiguous to his place of " caſtle baynard and the tower of Mountfichet, " to be ſtopped up for the enlarging of the fore- " ſaid place, and to encloſe them; while yet he " ſhall aſſign a like way to them, and as conve- " nient for the commonalty of the ſaid city. " And we, underſtanding from the foreſaid " mayor and barons of the ſaid city, that the " ſaid archbiſhop hath already prepared a better " way, and more convenient for the ſaid com- " monalty, than the foreſaid lanes were: we " to the ſaid archbiſhop and his aſſigns, for us " and our heirs, as much as in us is, do grant, " ratify, and confirm the foreſaid grant. So that " our ſaid barons of London, by occaſion of their " foreſaid grant, nor the archbiſhop, nor his " aſſigns, on account of the ſaid changing of " the ways, be accuſed or moleſted for time to " come before our juſtices itenerants at the Tower " of London, upon cauſe of perpreſture made of " the foreſaid lanes. In teſtimony whereof, &c. " Witneſs myſelf at Weſtminſter, the tenth day " of June, in the fourth year of our reign."

In the year 1311, the mayor and aldermen of London undertook to pay ſeveral debts which the king had contracted with the merchants in London, and others, for neceſſaries for the royal wardrobe and houſhold, amounting to about ſeventeen hundred pounds, and the king, in return, aſſigned to them, the farm of the city, together with other iſſues ariſing by aids, tallages, &c. to the amount of that ſum.

In the ſame year the mayor and aldermen of London were made acquainted with the king's intention to tax his ſeveral demeſnes; and the city of London being included under that appellation, the magiſtrates were ſent for by the privy council then ſitting at Whitefryars in Fleet-ſtreet, and aſked if they would fine for their tallage, or raiſe the ſum required by a pole-tax, and an aſſeſſment on their eſtates.

The mayor and his brethren deſired they might be permitted to conſult the commonalty; which requeſt being complied with, they gave for anſwer, that the king's demeſnes were liable to taxation whenever his majeſty ſhould think it neceſſary; but that the city of London was undoubtedly free from ſuch tallage, not only by the rights, privileges, and immunities, granted to them by magna charta, and ſo often confirmed by other charters, but by their paying the king a ſum of money annually for the fee-farm of the city: they therefore ſollicited the deferring of the ſaid tallage till the parliament ſhould meet, as they ſhould then have an opportunity of conferring with many of the nobility who were proprietors of lands and tenements in the city.

They were told that if they would lend two thouſand marks to the king, the tax ſhould be deferred, agreeable to their requeſt. The citizens refuſed to agree to this propoſal; whereupon commiſſioners were appointed to aſſemble at Guildhall to aſſeſs the ſaid tallage.

This circumſtance alarmed the mayor and citizens to ſuch a degree, that they offered to lend the the king a thouſand pounds, on condition that the aſſeſſment might not be permitted to take place till after the meeting of the parliament.

This propoſal being acceded to, his majeſty granted letters patent to the citizens in the following form:

" Edward, by the grace of God, &c. To all " to whom the preſent letters ſhall come, greeting. Know ye, that whereas our beloved the " mayor and aldermen, and the reſt of the citizens of our city of London, have lately cauſed " to be lent to us a thouſand pounds ſterling; " we, willing to ſatisfy them, the mayor, aldermen, and citizens, of the ſame ſum of money, " as we are bound, have granted unto them, that " in the next aid to be granted unto us in our " foreſaid city, or in the county of Middleſex, " or in levying money in the ſaid city and county " for our need, for whatever cauſe next to be " levied, we will cauſe the foreſaid thouſand " pounds to be allowed them.

" We have granted alſo to the ſame mayor, " aldermen, and citizens, that we will by no " means cauſe to be aſſeſſed any tallage ſingly " by poll, or in common upon them, their " goods, chattels, lands and tenements, or " rents in the ſaid city, or ſuburbs of the ſame, " before our next parliament, or to be levied " upon them; ſaving always to the mayor, aldermen, and citizens of the ſaid city, the " aſſignments made before by us to them for " debt, concerning which they undertook to " ſatisfy us; as in our letters patent made to them " thereupon more fully is contained: In witneſs " whereof we have cauſed theſe our letters to be " made patents. Witneſs myſelf at Windſor, " the thirteenth day of February, in the ſixth " year of our reign."

On the ſame day that theſe letters patent were granted, the king iſſued an order, commanding that the aſſeſſors of the county of Oxford ſhould not aſſeſs the citizens of London trading to Henley, and not being inhabitants of the ſaid town, and paying ſcot and lot.

In the year 1314, proviſions of all kinds were ſo greatly advanced in price, that the diſtreſſes of the poor were almoſt inſupportable; upon which the parliament interpoſed its authority, and fixed prices of the ſeveral articles here undermentioned:

The beſt graſs fed ox, alive, at	0	16	0
The beſt grain fed ox, at ——	1	4	0
The beſt cow, at —— —	0	12	0
The beſt hog of two years old, at	0	3	4
The beſt ſhorn mutton, at ——	0	1	4
The beſt gooſe, at ——	0	0	3
The beſt capon, at — ——	0	0	2½
The beſt hen, at ——	0	0	1½
The beſt chickens, 2 for ——	0	0	1½
The beſt young pidgeons, three for	0	0	1
Twenty eggs, at ——	0	0	1

It was enacted, by the authority of the king and parliament, that if any perſon refuſed to ſell the articles abovementioned at the fixed prices, they ſhould be forfeited to the king.

For ſeveral years paſt it having been a common practice with the populace to diſturb and interrupt the regular election of the mayor and ſheriffs of this city; the king, to prevent the like irregularities for the future, iſſued the following letter by way of proclamation,

" Edward, by the grace of God, &c. to the " mayor and ſheriffs of London, greeting. " Whereas by the charters of our progenitors, " kings of England, it was granted to our citizens of our city aforeſaid, that they ſhould " chuſe a mayor and ſheriffs from themſelves, " when they would, and preſent them, we not " being at Weſtminſter, to the treaſurer and " barons of our exchequer, and there to be " admitted according to cuſtom; and ſuch " election by the mayor and aldermen, and " more diſcreet perſons of the ſaid city, eſpecially ſummoned and warned for this purpoſe, " hath been accuſtomed in former times: and " now we have underſtood, that ſome of the " popular and plebian ſort, making a conſpiracy among themſelves, cauſing contentions, " differences, and innumerable miſchiefs, day " and night, in the ſaid city, and making " among them clandeſtine conventicles in private places, and being not called nor ſummoned, do thruſt and mingle themſelves of " their own accord into ſuch elections; and by " threatenings and clamours hindering the due " making of ſuch elections, endeavour to chuſe " ſuch as for time to come may favour their errors; that their wickedneſs, by defect of con- " grous government, may paſs unpuniſhed under diſſimulation, by ſuch perſons ſo elected, " to the hurt of our crown and dignity, and the " ſubverſion of the ſtate of the foreſaid city, and " the manifeſt oppreſſion of our citizens abiding " in it: we willing to provide for the quiet and " tranquillity of the people under us, as we are " bound, and to meet with ſuch malice, command, firmly enjoining you, that, before the " time of the election of the mayor and ſheriffs " next to be choſen, ye cauſe it be publickly " proclaimed through the whole city, and firmly " to be forbid, that none, unleſs he ſhall be to " this eſpecially called or ſummoned, or is " bound thereto, come thither at the time, nor " intrude himſelf in making the election, nor " hinder it any way, under pain of impriſonment; from which he may not eſcape without " our ſpecial command: and that the foreſaid " election be made by the aldermen, and the " other more diſcreet and powerful citizens of the " ſaid city, as in the ſame it hath been anciently " accuſtomed to be done: taking notice for the " future, that, if ye ſhall preſent any election, " otherwiſe than is mentioned before, to the " treaſurer and barons of our exchequer aforeſaid, we will by no means admit them. Witneſs myſelf at Weſtminſter, the fourth day of " July, in the eighth year of our reign."

Proper application to parliament having been neglected to be made on the part of the citizens, citizens, to prevent their being tallaged at the pleaſure of the king; his majeſty's want of money impelled him to take advantage of this circumſtance, whereupon he appointed commiſſioners to tax the citizens, of which he informed the ſheriffs by two precepts, iſſued in the months of October and November 1314.

The citizens, to prevent this tax being levied, granted the king a loan of ſix hundred marks; upon which the tallage was again reſpited.

In the year 1316 there was an exceſſive ſcarcity of corn in London, which being thought to ariſe from the vaſt quantities of wheat made into malt, an act of parliament was paſſed, ordaining that from that time forward no wheat ſhould be made into malt.

The mayor and aldermen publiſhed an order for carrying this act into execution; and another for regulating the prices of ale, by which the ſtronger ſort was to be ſold for three halfpence the gallon, and the ſmaller at a penny.

The price of wheat ſtill continued to advance, till it was ſold at four pounds the quarter; which produced ſuch a ſcene of miſery and diſtreſs, that, if the ancient hiſtorians may be credited, ſeveral parents, attacked with the intolerable pains of exceſſive hunger, devoured even their own children, and the malefactors in priſon preyed upon each other: and this calamity was ſucceeded by ſuch a raging peſtilential diſorder, that thoſe who eſcaped the contagion were ſcarcely numerous enough to bury thoſe who died of it.

About this time it was repreſented to the king, that the ordinance of the preceding year, reſpecting the prices of proviſions, was found to be very prejudicial, as it prevented the country people from ſupplying the city markets; his majeſty therefore revoked the ſaid ordinance by a brief, of which the following is a copy.

"The king to the ſheriffs of London, greeting.
"Although we lately commanded you, that in "each place in the foreſaid city, where it ſhould
"ſeem to you to be the beſt expedient, ye ſhall
"cauſe it to be publickly proclaimed, that oxen,
"cows, hogs, ſheep, geeſe, capons, hens, chick-
"ens, pigeons and eggs, ſhould be ſold at a cer"tain price; becauſe nevertheleſs we have un-
"derſtood, that ſuch a proclamation, which at "that time we believed would be for the profit
"of the people of our realm, redounds to their "greater damage than profit; we command
"you, that in the ſaid ſeveral places ye cauſe
"publickly to be proclaimed, that oxen, cows,
"hogs, ſheep, geeſe, capons, hens, chickens,
"young pigeons and eggs, be ſold for a reaſon-
"able price, as was accuſtomed to be done, be"fore the ſaid former proclamation; certifying
"all and ſingular, that the former proclamation
"was not made by virtue of the ordinances late
"made by the prelates, earls, and barons, and
"nobles of the ſame realm, and by us accepted,
"nor was contained in them. Witneſs myſelf at "Lincoln, the twentieth of February, in the "ninth year of our reign.

A mud wall having been erected by the order of king Henry III. without the tower of London, and within the wall of the city, the Londoners looking upon it as an unreaſonable encroachment, aſſembled in the year 1316, and pulled down the ſaid wall: but they ſuffered for their indiſcretion; for the king made this a pretence to extort a thouſand marks, which he compelled them to pay in the year following.

About the year 1318 the magiſtrates of the city of London were ſo greatly favoured by the courtiers, and were ſo entirely attached to that party, that, indifferent about the ſentiments of their fellow citizens, they arrogantly aſſumed the ſole right of appointing officers, and of continuing them in office as long as they pleaſed.

They likewiſe impoſed arbitrary taxes, in which they favoured themſelves, while they greatly oppreſſed the lower orders of the people.

The freemen having made frequent complaints to the judges itinerant at the tower, for a redreſs of theſe grievances, but without effect, they at length determined to ſubmit no longer to the yoke; but compelled the magiſtrates to ſubmit to the following conſtitutions, from a full conviction that the city would otherwiſe have again fallen a prey to the crown.

For the citizens of London concerning new articles then made to be obſerved.

"The king, to all whom, &c. greeting.
"Know ye, that whereas our beloved and "faithful the mayor and aldermen, and other "citizens of our city of London, had lately or"dained and appointed among themſelves, for
"the bettering of the ſame city, and for the "common benefit of ſuch as dwell in that city,
"and reſort to the ſame, certain things to be in
"the ſame city perpetually obſerved and had,
"inſtantly beſeeched, that we would take care
"to accept and confirm the ſame.
"We having ſeen certain letters, patentwiſe,
"ſigned with the common ſeal of that city, and
"the ſeal of the office of the mayoralty of that "city, upon the premiſes, and to us exhibited,
"have cauſed certain articles to be choſen out
"of the foreſaid letters, and cauſed them in
"ſome things to be corrected, as they are under"neath inſerted, viz.
"1. That the mayor and ſheriffs of the ſame
"city be elected by the citizens of the ſaid
"city, according to the tenor of the charters
"of our progenitors, heretofore kings of Eng"land, made to them thence, and no other-
"wiſe.
"2. That the mayor remain only one year
"together in his mayoralty.
"3. That the ſheriffs have but two clerks "and two ſerjeants; and that they take ſuch
"for which they will anſwer.
"That the mayor have no other office belong-
"ing to the city, but the office of mayoralty;
"nor to draw to himſelf the ſheriffs plea in
"the chamber of London, nor hold other
"pleas than thoſe the mayor, according to an-
"tient cuſtom, ought to hold.
"5. That the aldermen be removed from "year to year, on St. Gregory's day, and not "re-elected; and others choſen by the ſame
"wards.
"6. That tallages or aids henceforth to be aſ-
"ſeſſed for the king's buſineſs, or for the ſtate and benefit

" benefit of the city, after they ſhall be aſſeſſed " by the men of the wards elected and deputed " for this, be not increaſed or heightened but by " the common conſent of the mayor and com- " monalty. And that the money coming from " theſe tallages and aids be delivered into the " cuſtody of four honeſt men, commoners of the " city, to be choſen by the commonalty, to be " further delivered by the teſtimony of the ſaid " four men; ſo that they may inform the com- " monalty to what profit, and for what uſes, thoſe " monies go.

" 7. That no ſtranger be admitted into the " freedom of the city in the huſting; and that " no inhabitant, and eſpecially Engliſh merchant, " of ſome myſtery or trade, be admitted into " the freedom of the city, unleſs by ſurety of ſix " honeſt and ſufficient men of that myſtery or " trade he ſhall be of, who is ſo to be admitted " into the freedom; which ſix men may under- " take for him, of keeping the city indemni- " fied in that behalf. And that the ſame form " of ſurety be obſerved of ſtrangers to be ad- " mitted into the freedom in the huſting, if " they be of any certain myſtery or trade. And " if they are not of ſome certain myſtery, then " that they be not admitted into the freedom, " without the aſſent of the commonalty. And " that they who have been taken into the free- " dom of the city (ſince we undertook the go- " vernment of our realm) contrary to the forms " preſcribed; and they who have gone contrary " to their oath in this behalf, or contrary to " the ſtate of the city, and are thereof lawfully " convicted, loſe the freedom of the ſaid city.

" Saving always, that concerning apprentices " the antient manner and form of the ſaid city " be obſerved.

" 8. That each year in the ſame city, as often " as need ſhall be, inquiry be made, if any of " the freedom of the ſame city exerciſe mer- " chandizes in the city, of the goods of others " not of the ſame freedom, by calling thoſe " goods their own, contrary to their oath, and " contrary to the freedom of the ſaid city; and " they that are lawfully convicted thereof, to " loſe the freedom of the ſaid city.

" 9. That all and every one being in the li- " berty of the ſaid city, and that would enjoy " the liberties and free cuſtoms of the ſaid " city be in lot and ſcot, and partake of all " burthens for maintaining the ſtate of the ſaid " city, and the freedom thereof, according to " the oath they have taken, when they were ad- " mitted into their freedom; and whoſo will not, " to loſe his freedom.

" 10. And that all and every one, being of " the freedom of the city, and living without " the city, and that either by themſelves, or by " their ſervants, exerciſe their merchandizes " within the city, be in lot and ſcot with the " commoners of the ſaid city, for their mer- " chandizes, or elſe to be removed from their " freedom.

And that the giving of " judgments in the courts of the city, and eſpe- " cially after the verdicts of inquiſition taken, " in caſes where inquiſitions have been taken, " be not deferred, unleſs difficulty intervene. " And if difficulty intervene by reaſon of this, " giving judgment ſhall not be put off beyond " the third court.

" 12. That weights and ſcales of merchan- " dizes to be weighed between merchants and " merchants, the iſſues coming of which belong " to the commonalty of the ſaid city, remain " in the cuſtody of honeſt and ſufficient men; " of the ſame city, expert in that office, and " as yet to be choſen by the commonalty, to be " kept at the will of the ſame commonalty; and " that they be by no means committed to others " than thoſe ſo to be choſen.

" 13. That the ſheriffs for the time being " commit toll, and other cuſtoms belonging to " their farm, and other publick offices belong- " ing to them, and to be exerciſed by others, " to ſufficient men, for whom they will anſwer, " and not commit them to others. " Witneſs the king at York, the eighth day " of June."

It is worthy of remark, that the articles above recited were afterwards added to the charters of the city, and confirmed by the parliament, in the ſeventh year of the reign of Richard II.

In this ſame year, 1318, the king ſummoned a parliament to aſſemble at York, and iſſued his writ to the ſheriffs of London to chuſe two of the citizens to repreſent the ſaid city: but inſtead of two, they made choice of three repreſentatives, to whom, or to two of them, they delegated the power of acting for the public good in the ſaid parliament.

The populouſneſs and riches of London at this period may be judged of from the following circumſtance; for in this parliament it was enacted that this city ſhould provide and furniſh two hundred men, to march againſt the Scots; which is five times the number that was ſupplied by any other city in the kingdom.

In the year 1321, complaint was made to the juſtices itinerant at the Tower, that the mayor and aldermen had preſumed to turn out ſome members of the common-council at their pleaſure; which was particularly inſtanced in the caſe of Walter Henry, who was ejected from the common-council becauſe he would not permit the rich to tax the poor, till they themſelves had diſcharged their arrears of former tallages.

Hereupon Sir John Giſors, a former lord-mayor, and ſeveral other perſons of conſequence, were ſummoned to attend the ſaid juſtices; but conſcious of their guilt, they fled, and concealed themſelves till the affair was dropt.

The two Spencers, favourites of the king, having at this period ſo entirely engroſſed his majeſty's confidence, that he reſigned the whole management of public affairs to their guidance, the barons highly reſented this unmanly conduct of their ſovereign; and this occaſioned the ſummoning of a parliament to meet at London, to which the nobility repaired with a prodigious number of armed attendants, who quartered themſelves in the ſuburbs.

Hereupon the magiſtrates thought it prudent to guard againſt any unexpected attack, by appointing a guard of a thouſand citizens, who being completely armed, watched the gates and walls of the city from four o'clock in the morning till ſix in the evening, when they were relieved by the ſame number, who kept watch during the night.

Beſides theſe, two aldermen, with a proper number of attendants, patrolled the ſtreets during the whole night, to keep the watch to their duty; and the gates of the city, which were ſhut at nine o'clock at night, were not opened till the next morning at ſeven.

By this good conduct the peace of the city was preſerved, till the king gave permiſſion to the Londoners to receive the barons and their army within the walls: and in a ſhort time afterwards an act of parliament was paſſed, and ſigned by the king, by which the Spencers were doomed to perpetual baniſhment. *

This careful defence of the city gave the king a great opinion of the fidelity of his citizens of London; and he had ſoon afterwards occaſion to put their loyalty ſtill farther to the trial; for the governor of the caſtle of Leeds in Kent, having refuſed the queen a lodging in that caſtle, the king raiſed an army conſiſting chiefly of Lon-

* The ſentence of baniſhment againſt the Spencers was ſoon reverſed; whereupon they preſented a petition to the king, ſetting forth the damages they had ſuſtained; and by this petition it appeared that the real eſtate of the elder Spencer (if the authority of our ancient writers may be relied on) conſiſted of " Sixty-three manors, and his per- " ſonal of two crops of corn, one in barns, and the other " upon the ground; in caſh, jewels, ſilver and golden uten- " ſils, &c. ten thoaſand pounds; armour for 200 men, war- " like engines, and the deſtruction of his houſes, 30,000 " pounds; the furniture of his chapel and wardrobe, 5,000 " pounds; 28,000 ſheep; 1000 oxen and heifers; 1200 " cows, with their calves for two years; forty mares, with " their foals for two years; 560 cart-horſes; 2000 hogs; " 400 kids; 40 tons of wine; 600 bacons; 80 carcaſes of " beef; 600 muttons in larder; ten tons of cyder, and " thirty-ſix ſacks of wool; with a library of books."

doners;

doners, with whom he marched and ſummoned the caſtle to ſurrender: but the governor being reſolved to defend it, his majeſty beſieged it in form, and compelled it to ſurrender at diſcretion.

In return for this ſervice, the king granted the following charter to his faithful citizens of London:

" Edward, by the grace of God, king of Eng-
" land, lord of Ireland, and duke of Aquitain;
" to all to whom theſe preſent letters ſhall come,
" greeting.

" Know ye, that whereas the mayor and the " good men of the city of London have, of " late, thankfully done us aid of armed footmen
" at our caſtle of Leeds in the county of Kent;
" and alſo aid of like armed men now going with " us through divers parts of our realm for divers
" cauſes: we, willing to provide for the indem-
" nity of the ſaid mayor and good men of our city
" of London in this behalf, have granted to them,
" for us and our heirs, that the ſaid aids, to us ſo
" thankfully done, ſhall not be prejudicial to the " ſaid mayor and the good men, their heirs and
" ſucceſſors; nor ſhall they be drawn into con-
" ſequent for time to come. In witneſs whereof
" we have cauſed theſe our letters to be made
" patents. Witneſs myſelf at Aldermanſton, the " twelfth of December."

Soon after the granting of this charter the citizens made the king a preſent of two thouſand marks, towards defraying the expences of a war againſt the Scots; and it is not improbable that this ſum was given in conſequence of receiving the charter.

But this friendſhip between the king and the citizens of London does not appear to have been of any long continuance; for the king having been ſucceſsful againſt the barons, and cauſed the earl of Lancaſter to be beheaded; he took advantage of ſome diſſentions which were ſtill ſubſiſting between the citizens, on account of the laſt preſentment to the juſtices itinerant, and made this pretext for ſeizing the liberties of the city, by which he extorted two thouſand marks for their redemption, which was paid him in the year 1322.

The Spencers being re-eſtabliſhed in the king's favour, the queen was ſo diſguſted with the aſcendancy they had gained over her huſband, that ſhe prevailed on him to permit her and her ſon to viſit her brother the king of France; but her real intention was to ſollicit aid to compel the Spencers to fly the kingdom.

Her majeſty was ſo ſucceſsful as to conclude a treaty with the earl of Hainault, in order to invade England; of which Edward receiving advice, demanded a ſupply of men and money of the citizens of London.

To this demand the Londoners replied, " That " they would at all times revere their ſovereign
" lord the king, the queen, and the prince their
" ſon, the indubitable heir of the crown; and
" ſhut their gates againſt, and to the utmoſt of " their power, reſiſt all foreigners and traitors;
" but that they were not willing to march out to " fight, unleſs, according to their ancient privi-
" leges, they could return home the ſame day
" before ſun-ſet."

" The king, being greatly diſguſted with this reply, appointed Walter Stapleton, biſhop of Exeter, cuſtos of the city; he alſo furniſhed the Tower of London with military ſtores, and having placed therein his ſon, John of Eltham, he went into the weſtern counties of England to raiſe an army.

Soon after the departure of the king, the mayor and citizens received a pathetic letter from the queen, entreating their ſpeedy and effectual aſſiſtance in the great cauſe of liberty and their country.

This letter from the queen being ſtuck upon the croſs in Cheapſide, many copies were taken from it, and fixed in other parts of the city; whereupon the biſhop of Exeter demanded the keys from the mayor; but the populace, determined to prevent the keys being delivered up, ſeized the mayor, and would have put him to death, if he had not ſworn an implicit obedience to their orders. They likewiſe entered into a ſolemn agreement to deſtroy the enemies of the queen, of all ranks and degrees, wherever they could lay hold of them.

The firſt victim to their fury was John Marſhall, a ſervant to the younger Spencer, whoſe head they cut off without ceremony; and then attacking the palace of the biſhop of Exeter, they ſet his gates on fire, carried off his houſhold goods, jewels and plate; and purſuing the prelate, who was going to take ſanctuary in St. Paul's, they overtook him at the north door of the cathedral, where they beat him in a terrible manner, then dragged him into Cheapſide, where they declared him a traitor, and having cut off his head, and the heads of two of his domeſtics, they buried their bodies among the rubbiſh of a tower which the biſhop was building on the banks of the Thames.

On the day following, the mob happening to meet Sir John de Weſton, conſtable of the Tower of London, they compelled him to deliver up the keys; and taking immediate poſſeſſion of that fortreſs, they diſcharged all the king's officers, ſet the priſoners at liberty, and appointed John of Eltham, the king's ſecond ſon, guardian of the city and kingdom.

In a ſhort time after this tranſaction, Robert Baldock, the chancellor, was brought from Hereford, a priſoner, and committed to the biſhop's priſon: but this perſon being the real or ſuppoſed author of moſt of the miſeries in which the kingdom was involved, the populace dragged him from thence, and lodged him in Newgate; but in the way thither they beat him in ſuch an unmerciful manner, that he ſoon died of the wounds.

By this time the queen's party was become ſo powerful, that the king was obliged to retreat into Wales to conceal himſelf; but he was ſoon diſcovered and made priſoner; and the queen and her ſon Edward being received into London with every demonſtration of joy, the parliament ſpeedily aſſembled, and compelled Edward to reſign the crown to the young prince.

His majesty's orders respecting the punishment of regrators. Provisions sold at very low prices. King Edward's third charter confirming the city liberties.*

IN a short time after Edward III. had assumed the reigns of government, he, by the consent of his parliament, granted the following charter to the citizens of London.

" Edward, by the grace of God, king of " England, lord of Ireland, and duke of Aqui- " tain; to his archbishops, bishops, abbots, " priors, earls, barons, justices, sheriffs, rulers, " ministers, and other his bailiffs and faithful " subjects greeting.

" Know ye, that we for the bettering of our " city of London, and for the good and laudable " service which our beloved mayor, aldermen " and commonalty of the said city heretofore " have often done to us and our progenitors, " with the assent of the aforesaid earls, barons, " and all the commonalty of our realm, being " called to this our present parliament at West- " minster, have granted, and by this our charter, " for us and our heirs, confirmed to the citizens " of the aforesaid city, the liberties here under- " written, to have and to hold to them and their " heirs and successors for ever.

" First, whereas in the great charter of the " liberties of England it is contained, that the " city of London have all their ancient liberties " and customs; and the same citizens, at the " time of the making of the charter, from the " time of St. Edward the king and confessor, " and William the conqueror, and of other our " progenitors, had divers liberties and customs, " as well by the charters of those our progeni- " tors, as without charter by ancient custom, " whereupon in divers the circuits, and other " the courts of our said progenitors, as well by " judgments as by statutes, were invaded, and " some of them adjudged; we will and grant, for " us and our heirs, that they may have the li- " berties according to the form of the above-said " great charter; and that impediments and usur- " pations to them in that behalf made shall be " revoked and annulled.

" We have further granted, for us and our " heirs, to the said citizens, their heirs and " successors aforesaid, that the mayor of the " aforesaid city, which for the time shall be one " of the justices to be assigned of the goal-de- " livery of Newgate, and be named in every " commission thereof to be made; and that the " said citizens may have infangtheft and outfang- " theft, and chattels of felons, of all those " which shall be adjudged before them within the " liberties of the same city, and of all being of " the liberty aforesaid, at the aforesaid goal to " be adjudged.

" And whereas also, by the charters of our " progenitors, it was granted to the same citi- " zens, that they should hold the sheriffwicks of " London and Middlesex, for three hundred " pounds yearly, to be paid at our exchequer, " and they are charged with the payment of four " hundred pounds yearly, every year to be paid " at our exchequer, for the sheriffwicks, contrary " to the form of the said charters;

" We will and grant, for us and our heirs, that " the said citizens, their heirs and successors, " may henceforth the aforesaid sheriffwicks hold " for three hundred pounds yearly, to be yearly " paid at our exchequer, according to the tenor " of the aforesaid charters; and that they may " be from henceforth acquitted of the said hun- " dred pounds.

" Furthermore, we have granted, for us and " our heirs, to the said citizens, that their heirs " and successors may bequeath their tenements " within the liberties of the aforesaid city, as " well in Mortmain as in other manner, as of " ancient time they have been accustomed to " do.

" And whereas in a certain charter of the lord " Edward, late king of England, our father to " the said citizens made (amongst other things) " it is contained, that the sheriffs of the said city, " as often as they shall happen to be amerced for " any offence in the court, shall be amerced ac- " cording to the measure and quantity of their " offence, as other the sheriffs of our realm were " wont to be amerced for like offences; and the " sheriffs of the aforesaid city, after the making " of that charter, were otherwise amerced for the " escape of thieves, than other sheriffs were on " this side Trent, for such-like escapes are " amerced only, as it is said, one hundred shil- " lings.

" We will and grant, for us and our heirs, that " the sheriffs of the same city, which for the " time shall be in no ways amerced or charged " for the escape of thieves in any otherwise " than as other the sheriffs on this side Trent; " and that the aforesaid citizens shall not be " charged for the custody of those that fly to the " churches within the aforesaid liberty, for to " have immunities, otherwise than of old hath " been accustomed to be charged; any thing in " the last circuit at the Tower of London made " or adjudged notwithstanding.

" And that the said citizens may remove and " take

" take away all the wears in the waters of Thames " and Medway, and may have the puniſhments " thereof to us belonging.

" Alſo we will and command ſtreightly, that " all merchant ſtrangers, coming to England, " ſhall ſell their wares and merchandizes within " forty days after their coming thither; and " ſhall continue and board with free hoſts of the " ſaid city, and other cities and towns in Eng- " land, without any houſholds or ſocieties by " them to be kept.

" And alſo we will and grant, for us and our " heirs, that the marſhal, ſteward or clerk of " the market of our houſhold, may not ſit from " henceforth within the liberty of the aforeſaid " city, nor exerciſe any offence there, nor any " way draw any citizen of the ſaid city to plead " without the liberties of the ſaid city, of any " thing that happen within the liberties of the " ſame; and that no eſcheator, or other officers, " may, from henceforth, exerciſe the office of " the eſcheator within the liberties of the ſaid " city: but that the mayor of the ſaid city for " the time being may do the office of the " eſcheator within the ſaid liberty; ſo as always " he take his oath that he exerciſe the ſaid office, " and that he anſwer thereof to us and our heirs, " as he ought to do. And that the ſaid citizens, " from henceforth, ſhall not be compelled to go " or ſend to war out of the ſaid city. And that " the conſtable of the Tower of London for the " time being, ſhall not make any prizes, by land " or by water, of any victuals, or other thing " whatſoever, of the men of the ſaid city, or " going thence: neither ſhall or may arreſt, or " cauſe to be arreſted, the ſhips or boats bring- " ing victuals or other like goods to or from the " ſaid city.

" And foraſmuch as the citizens, in all good " fairs of England, were wont to have among " themſelves keepers to hold the pleas touching " the citizens of the ſaid city, aſſembling them- " ſelves at the ſaid fairs: we will and grant, as " much as in us is, that the ſaid citizens may have " ſuch like keepers, to hold ſuch pleas of their " covenants, as of ancient time they had, (ex- " cept the pleas of the land and of the crown).

" Furthermore, we grant, for us and our heirs, " That the ſheriffs of the ſaid city, for the time " being, ſhall not be compelled to take any oath " at our exchequer, but upon yielding up of " their accounts.

" And whereas the ſaid citizens, in the circuit " of Henry Stanton, and fellow juſtices of the " lord Edward, late king of England, our fa- " ther, laſt circuit at the Tower of London, " were compelled, contrary to their ancient cuſ- " toms, to claim their liberties and free-cuſtoms, " and thereupon did claim divers liberties, by " the charters of our ſaid progenitors, and of " other their liberties and free-cuſtoms of old " uſe and cuſtom; which ſaid claims do as yet " hang before us undecided.

" We will and grant, for us and our heirs, " that the ſame citizens, their heirs and ſucceſ- " ſors, may have the liberties and free-cuſtoms, " and may uſe them as of old time they were " wont; and that they may record their ſaid " liberties and free-cuſtoms, before us, our ju- " ſtices, and other miniſters whatſoever, in ſuch " ſort as they were wont to do before the ſaid " circuit; notwithſtanding that the ſaid citizens " in the ſaid circuit were impeached upon ſome " like record and liberties, and free-cuſtoms, " aforeſaid; and alſo notwithſtanding any ſtatutes " or judgments made or publiſhed to the contra- " ry: and that to the allowance of their charters, " to be had before us in our exchequer, and other " pleas whatſoever, one writ ſhall ſuffice in all " pleas for every king's time: and that no " ſummons, attachment, or executions, be made " by any of the officers of us or our heirs, by " writ or without writ, within the liberty of the " ſaid city, but only by miniſters of the ſaid " city: and that the ſheriffs of the ſame city " (which ſhall be toward the aid of the ſame of " the ſaid city) may lawfully have the forfeiture " of victuals, and other things and merchandizes, " according to the tenor of the charter thereof " made to the ſaid citizens, and ſhall not be de- " barred thereof hereafter, contrary to the tenor " of the ſame charter.

" And that the ſame citizens, in the circuits of " the juſtices, from henceforth ſitting at the " Tower of London, ſhall be guided by the ſame " laws and cuſtoms, whereby they were guided " in the circuits holden in the time of lord John " and Henry, ſometimes kings of England, and " others our progenitors; and if any thing in " the laſt circuit was done or attempted, contrary " to their liberties and free-cuſtoms, we will " they be not prejudicial unto them, but that " they may be guided as of old time they were.

" We have alſo granted, for us and our heirs, " that the ſame citizens from henceforth, in and " towards ſubſidies, grants and contributions " whatſoever to be made to the uſe of us or our " heirs, ſhall be taxed and contributary with the " commonalty of our realm, as common perſons, " and not as men of the city; and that they be " quit of all other tallages; and that the liberty " of the ſaid city ſhall not be taken into the " hands of us or our heirs for any perſonal treſ- " paſs or judgment of any miniſter of the ſaid " city: neither ſhall a keeper in the ſaid city for " that occaſion be deputed, but the ſame miniſter " ſhall be puniſhed according to the quality of " his offence.

" And that no purveyor and taker, officer, and " other miniſter of us and our heirs, or of any " other, ſhall make any prizes in the ſaid city, " or without, of the goods of the citizens of the " ſaid city, contrary to their will and pleaſure; " unleſs immediately they make due payment for " the ſame, or elſe may have reſpite thereof with " the good will of the ſeller: and that no price " be made of the wines of thoſe citizens, by any " the citizens of us or our heirs, or otherwiſe " againſt their wills; that is to ſay, of one ton " before the maſt and behind it: nor by any " other means: but ſhall be quit thereof for " ever.

" Furthermore, we forbid that any officer of " us or our heirs, ſhall merchandize, by himſelf " or others, within the ſaid city, or without, of " any thing touching their offices.

" Alſo we grant, that the lands and tene-
" ments (lying without) of the ſaid citizens,
" which have been, or hereafter ſhall be, mi-
" niſters of the ſaid city, be bound to keep the " ſaid city harmleſs, againſt us and our heirs, of " thoſe things which concern their offices, as their " tenements be within the ſaid city: and that no
" market ſhall be henceforth granted, by us or
" our heirs, to any within ſeven miles in circuit
" of the ſaid city. And that all inquiſitions,
" from henceforth to be taken by our juſtices or
" miniſters of the ſaid city, ſhall be taken in St.
" Martin's [le Grand] in London, and not elſe-
" where; except the inquiſitions to be taken in " the circuits at the Tower of London; and for
" the goal delivery of Newgate: and that none
" of the freemen of the ſaid city, ſhall be im-
" pleaded or troubled at our exchequer, or elſe-
" where, by bill; except it be by thoſe things " which touch us and our heirs. Wherefore we " will and ſtreightly command, for us and our " heirs, that the ſaid citizens, their heirs and
" ſucceſſors, have all their liberties and free-
" cuſtoms, and the ſame may uſe and enjoy for " ever, in form aforeſaid. Given at Weſtminſter,
" the 6th of March, in the firſt year of our
" reign."

By this charter all the antient rights and immunities of the citizens are confirmed, and a grant is made of the following additional privileges; viz. The mayor of London to be one of the judges to ſit on the trial of priſoners confined in Newgate.—The citizens to enjoy the right of infang-theft, that is the privilege of trying a thief or robber, apprehended within the juriſdiction of the city; and of outfang-theft, which is the liberty of reclaiming a citizen taken in any other place, in order to bring him to his trial within the city:—a right to the goods and chattels of all felons convicted within the juriſdiction of the city:—a remiſſion of three hundred pounds a year, which had been formerly illegally extorted from the city for the fee-farm rent of the county of Middleſex, in violation of ancient charters:—the privilege of deviſing lands in mortmain:—the ſheriffs of London and Middleſex to be amerced no otherwiſe than other ſheriffs ſouth of the river Trent:—foreign merchants obliged to ſell their merchandize within forty days, to prevent an advance in the prices:—the citizens not to be chargeable with the cuſtody of ſuch as take ſanctuary:—an exemption from the authority of the king's marſhal, ſteward, and clerk of the houſhold:—the mayor of London made perpetual eſcheator:—permiſſion for the Londoners to hold a court of pye-powder, in all country fairs:—the citizens exempted from all tallages, except being aſſeſſed in common with their fellow ſubjects:—the liberties of the city not to be ſeized for a perſonal offence, or iniquitous judgment of any of its magiſtrates:—none of the king's purveyors to rate any ſort of goods belonging to the citizens, or to deal in any kind of merchandize within the city:—and, laſtly, that no market be held within ſeven miles of London.

The village of Southwark being, about this time, the general rendezvous of thieves and other diſturbers of the public peace, the king, at the time of granting the above-recited charter to the citizens, granted them likewiſe the following:

" Edward, by the grace of God, king of Eng-
" land, lord of Ireland, and duke of Aquitain;
" to all to whom theſe preſent letters ſhall come,
" greeting.

" Know ye, that whereas our well-beloved,
" the citizens of the city of London, by their " petition exhibited before us and our council, in " our preſent parliament at Weſtminſter aſſem-
" bled, have given us to underſtand, that felons,
" thieves, and other malefactors, and diſturbers
" of the peace, who, in the ſaid city and elſe-
" where, have committed manſlaughters, rob-
" beries, and divers other felonies, privily de-
" parting from the ſaid city, after thoſe felonies
" committed, into the village of Southwark,
" where they cannot be attached by the miniſters
" of the ſaid city, and there are openly received:
" and ſo for default of due puniſhment are more
" bold to commit ſuch felonies: and they have " beſeeched us, that, for the confirmation of our " peace within the ſaid city, bridling the naughti-
" neſs of the ſaid malefactors, we would grant
" unto them the ſaid village, to have to them,
" their heirs and ſucceſſors, for ever, for the " farm and rent therefore yearly due to us, to be
" yearly paid at our exchequer: We, having con-
" ſideration to the premiſes, with the aſſent of

" appurtenances, to have and to hold, to them

" our heirs for ever, at the accuſtomed times,
" the farms therefore due and accuſtomed: In " witneſs whereof, we have cauſed theſe our " letters to be made patents. Witneſs myſelf at " Weſtminſter, the ſixth day of March, in the
" firſt year of our reign."

By this charter we find that the village of Southwark is granted to the citizens of London, and their heirs for ever: but it does not appear that it anſwered the end propoſed by the grant; for in the following year there was a very dangerous inſurrection in the city, which being began by a number of people of various profeſſions, they were joined by a crew of execrable villains, who ſtrolled about the ſtreets with ſwords and bucklers, beating and wounding thoſe they met, and ſometimes even perpetrating murder.

Theſe outrages occaſioned the king's iſſuing a writ directed to the mayor and ſheriffs of London, for the apprehending and proſecuting all rioters; but this proving ineffectual, the king ſent a letter to the mayor and ſheriffs, a copy of which is as follows.

" The king to the mayor and ſheriffs of Lon" don, greeting. Whereas it is given us to under" ſtand, that very many evil doers, and diſturb-
" ers of our peace, have made divers riots,
" confederacies, and unlawful conventicles, with-
" in

" in the aforeſaid city, and ſuburbs thereof, ſince " we have taken the government of our realm, " and do wander about and run here and there, " beating, wounding, and miſuſing the people, " and wickedly killing ſome of them, and ſpoil- " ing others of their goods and poſſeſſions; and " taking and impriſoning others; as well of the " city and ſuburbs, as thoſe that come to the " ſaid city and ſuburbs about their buſineſs, and " detaining them in priſon, until they have made " them give fines and redemptions; and com- " mitting other miſdemeanors, and not deſiſting " daily to commit them, to the breach of our " peace, and the terror of our people in thoſe " parts, and manifeſtly tending to commotion: " We, willing to have ſuch malefactors puniſhed, " and the tranquillity of our people inviolably " kept, as we are bound to do by our oath, com- " mand you, that by the oath of honeſt men, in " your bailiffwick, ye diligently enquire of the " names of the aforeſaid malefactors, and of them " that knowingly receive and maintain them, " and find out the truth concerning other articles, " more fully touching the premiſes. And all " thoſe, whom thereupon it ſhall happen to be " judged, and all thoſe whom ye ſhall find doing " ſuch things, as are premiſed, ye cauſe, with- " out delay, to be taken, and to be ſafely kept " in our priſon, until ye ſhall have farther com- " mand from us thereupon: and that ye ſo be- " have yourſelves in this behalf, that the damages " and lewdneſſes aforeſaid, may not happen there " any more: whereby we might take heavily of " you, as of them to whom we have committed " the cuſtody of the ſaid city, under the danger " that is incumbent. In witneſs whereof, &c."

The mayor and ſheriffs of this city, being reſolved to enforce that obedience which the king had by the above-recited writ required, immediately apprehended a conſiderable number of the offenders; in conſequence of which his majeſty ſent the following letter to the judges, mayor, &c. for the ſpeedy proſecution of the delinquents.

" To Oliver de Ingham, John Matravers, " John de Stoner, Robert de Mabbethorpe, and " John de Grantham; to the mayor, &c. For- " aſmuch as our city of London is our chamber; " and, on that account, the men of the ſaid city " of London are more firmly obliged to the de- " fence of our perſon, and conſervation of our " rights; we more heavily bearing the premiſes, " and willing that they be puniſhed, as it is fit, " have commanded you our ſaid mayor and ſheriffs " of London, that ye ſhall enquire diligently " of the premiſes, and ſhould take thoſe whom " ye ſhould find culpable by the ſame inquiſition, " and keep them ſafe, until ye ſhould have ſome " further command thereupon from us. And " becauſe the premiſes do ſpecially touch us, and " the ſtate of our crown, willing to determine " the ſaid inquiſitions, and all other things touch- " ing the premiſes, according to the exigence of " law, we have aſſigned you our juſtices to hear " and determine the inquiſitions and indictments " made by the ſame inquiſitions, &c."

In the year 1329, ſeveral ambaſſadors from foreign courts being arrived in England, the king treated his illuſtrious viſitors with a ſolemn tournament, of thirteen knights on a ſide, which was exhibited between the ends of Queen-ſtreet and Wood-ſtreet in Cheapſide.

On this occaſion, the ſtreet was covered with ſand, to prevent the horſes ſlipping down, and a grand ſcaffold, in the form of a tower, was erected for the accommodation of the queen, and the ladies of her majeſty's train; but during the exhibition this building fell ſuddenly down, though happily, the ladies received no other injury than being dreadfully frightened. His majeſty, however, would have ſeverely puniſhed the builder for his careleſsneſs, had not the queen, with great humanity, interceded in his behalf, and obtained his pardon.

In the year abovementioned, the practice of adulterating wines being carried to ſuch a height as to endanger the health of his majeſty's ſubjects, an order was iſſued to the mayor and ſheriffs, directing them in the king's name, to make public proclamation, that " no perſon ſhould preſume in " any manner to mingle ſuch wines, nor to ſell " any mixed, but good and pure; and to puniſh " the offenders by levying a forfeit upon them " for the uſe of the king."

The meaſures which had been heretofore taken, for the puniſhment of the deſperadoes who wounded, robbed and murdered people in the ſtreets, being found inſufficient to reſtrain the horrid practices of theſe daring offenders, the king iſſued a proclamation, ſtrictly enjoining that " no per- " ſon ſhould preſume to wear any coat of plate, " or any weapon whatever, in the city of Lon- " don, or town of Weſtminſter, or in the ſuburbs " thereof, upon pain of forfeiting all his poſſeſ- " ſions."

In the ſpring of the year 1335, there fell ſuch exceſſive rains, that the corn was rotted in the ground, ſo that the following harveſt was ſo extremely bad as to cauſe a general ſcarcity, which raiſed proviſions to an enormous price.

Beſides this misfortune, the prices were likewiſe greatly advanced by the regrators, and of thoſe who ſold by defective weights and meaſures.

Hereupon the king, with the advice of his council, ſent a ſevere reprimand to the mayor and ſheriffs of London, for having been ſo inattentive to the welfare of the city, as not to provide a proper ſtore of proviſions againſt a time of ſcarcity.

He likewiſe cenſured them for paying ſo little regard to their oaths, as to permit the ſale of bread, wine, beer, and other articles at ſuch high prices, and for not puniſhing thoſe who made uſe of bad weights and meaſures.

His majeſty alſo ſtrictly enjoined the mayor, on the penalty of his whole fortune, immediately to ſummon the aldermen and other citizens, to debate upon and fix the prices of all kinds of proviſions, with proper regard to the prime coſt of the reſpective articles. At the ſame time the king ſent the following charge to the mayor of the city:

" That your oath as mayor remain inviolable, " do you chaſtize and puniſh all from time to " time who act againſt right, and reform all " other

" other things which you ſhall know to be re-
" pugnant to the good government of the ſaid
" city and ſuburbs; that, by your diligence ex" hibited in this behalf, the city may be reduced
" to its due ſtate, and exceſſive regrators wholly
" taken away: and that you publicly proclaim
" all and ſingular the premiſes in the foreſaid
" city and ſuburbs, in the accuſtomed places.
" but if they ſhould not appoint a ſpeedy reme" dy for all theſe exceſſes, that then the grieved
" ſhould complain thereof to him and his coun" cil; and he, in that defect, would cauſe a " remedy to be applied to theſe exceſſes without " delay."

In obedience to the royal command, meaſures were immediately taken to fix the prices of proviſions; and a great ſcarcity of money ariſing from the large ſums which had been levied on occaſion of a war with the Scots, the proviſions undermentioned were ſold at the following low rates:

The beſt ſheep, at —— ——	0	8

Certain privileges having been granted to foreigners reſiding in London, the citizens began to be alarmed for fear their rights and immunities ſhould be invaded; upon which the king, to eaſe their aprehenſions, granted them the following charter:

" Edward, by the grace of God, king of " England, lord of Ireland, and duke of Aquitain,
" to all to whom theſe preſent letters ſhall come,
" greeting.

" Know ye, whereas in our parliament at York

" and ſingular its articles, ſhould be maintained

" amongſt other things it is contained, that the " city of London may have its ancient liberties

" genitors, and yet is, that the ſaid great charter,
" in all the articles thereof, may be ſtill obſerved;

" other, nothing ſhall be done to the prejudice
" or infringmenr of the ſaid charter, or of any

Ordinance aſcertaining what goods a tenant muſt leave on quitting his houſe.

THE parliament, in the year 1339, granted the king a ſubſidy for the ſupport of the war, but money being immediately wanted, the citizens ſupplied him with twenty thouſand marks, which was to be deducted from the ſum they were to raiſe towards the ſubſidy.

This is the firſt general aſſeſſment we remember to have read of; and the following is the table of rates by which each ward was aſſeſſed.

The ſame year, in conſequence of the king's reſolution to croſs the ſeas, a commiſſion was granted to the mayor, aldermen and commonalty of London, whereby they were empowered and commanded to exert themſelves to the utmoſt of their abilities for the preſervation of the public peace; and which likewiſe ordered, that they ſhould cauſe proper and ſpeedy puniſhment to be done upon ſuch malefactors as ſhould be apprehended in the abſence of the king.

A quarrel happening between the Fiſhmongers and Skinners ſoon after the departure of the king, the parties met in the ſtreets, and ſeveral ſkirmiſhes enſuing, many perſons were mortally wounded. In order to ſuppreſs this lawleſs tumult, the mayor, aldermen and ſheriffs, repaired to the place of riot, where they apprehended ſeveral of the rioters, and were conveying them to priſon, when two of the mob, the one named Thomas Haunſart, the other John le Brewere, aſſiſted by ſeveral accomplices, aſſaulted the mayor, and reſcued the priſoners; however, they were ſoon overcome, and carried to Guildhall, where they were tried and convicted, and the ſame day, purſuant to their ſentence, beheaded in Cheapſide, then called Weſtcheap.

The king, on his return, was ſo highly pleaſed with the ſpirited conduct of the firſt magiſtrate, and his brethren the aldermen, and ſheriffs, that on the fourth of June, at which time his majeſty was at the Tower, he ſigned the following patent.

" We, conſidering if ſo great raſhneſs of the " foreſaid Thomas and John had been paſſed over " unpuniſhed, it had yielded boldneſs to others " of doing the like things; and ſo thinking the " ſaid puniſhment very ſeaſonable for the con- " ſervation of our peace, and to be well done; " and willing, by the conſideration aforeſaid, " that the ſaid mayor, ſheriffs, aldermen and " commonalty be ſecure; and to provide that " they may not be troubled, by reaſon hereof, " in future times; what hath been done by the " mayor, ſheriffs, &c. as much as belongs to " us, we approve and confirm. So that they " may not hereafter be ſued, either by ourſelves, " our heirs, ſucceſſors, or our juſtices, on occa- " ſion of theſe deaths. Witneſs the king at the " Tower of London, on the fourth day of June."

Shortly after, the king's itinerant judges were commanded to make inquiſition throughout the kingdom concerning the public conduct of his collectors of duties; but the citizens being convinced that ſuch a ſtep would be contrary to their privileges, would not permit any of them to hold a ſitting in the city. In conſequence of which the king ordered them to appear immediately before him at the Tower, which they likewiſe poſitively refuſed; and the people in general behaving, on this occaſion, with the ſame ſpirit they ever have done when their liberties were invaded, the judges very prudently declared that they would not hold a ſeſſion on that account till after Eaſter.

The king, who was highly diſpleaſed with the behaviour both of his judges and citizens, ordered ſtrict ſearch to be made after all perſons who had behaved themſelves in a tumultuous manner; but, being well aſſured that the citizens had been actuated by no other motive than a fixed reſolution of maintaining their rights, he gave them a general pardon.

In the year 1342, a general inſpection was made into the charters of Henry the third, relative to the mayoralty and ſheriffwick of London and Middleſex, and of the articles made in the reign of Edward the ſecond for the better governing the city, which conclude with the following intereſting clauſe:

"Moreover we, being willing to ſhew more "abundant favour to the citizens of the city "aforeſaid, have granted to them, for us and "for our heirs, and by this our charter have "confirmed, that although they, or their pre-"deceſſors, citizens of the city aforeſaid, have "not hitherto fully uſed, upon any emergent oc-"caſion, any of the liberties, acquittals, articles, "or free-cuſtoms, contained in the ſaid charter "and letters; yet, the ſame citizens, and their "heirs and ſucceſſors, citizens of that city, "may henceforth fully enjoy thoſe liberties, ac-"quittals, articles and free-cuſtoms, and any of "them, for ever. 15 Edward III. June the 3d. "at the tower of London."

In the year 1344, the king, in order to raiſe a ſum of money for carrying on the war with France, determined, as the beſt expedient, to oblige every citizen poſſeſſed of forty pounds a year to take upon him the order of knighthood; and the following writ was ſent to the ſheriffs of London:

"We command, firmly enjoining you, that "in the city aforeſaid, when you ſhall think "convenient, ye cauſe it publickly to be pro-"claimed, that all who have forty pounds of "land or rent, as they have revenue by the "year, and have held them for three whole "years, and are not knights, take upon them "the order of knighthood, about the feaſt of "St. Laurence next, (Auguſt 10) or at moſt on "the feaſt, upon danger, which followeth: And "that ye diligently enquire of the names of "thoſe who have forty pounds per annum of "land or rents in the ſaid city; and that ye cer-"tify us of thoſe names in our chancery before "the foreſaid feaſt: And by no means omit ye "this.

"Witneſs myſelf at Weſtminſter, the thirtieth "day of June, in the year of our reign "over England the eighteenth, but of our "reign over France the fifth."

The ſheriffs returned the following anſwer to this brief.

"We have cauſed to be proclaimed through-"out our whole bailiffwick all the articles con-"tained in the brief, as it is commanded in the "ſame. We have cauſed alſo inquiſition to be "made, by the oath of honeſt and lawful men "of our ſaid bailiffwick, if any have forty "pounds of land or rent, by the year, in our "ſaid bailiffwick, and have held them for three "whole years; and of thoſe that hold a part in "our bailiffwick, and a part elſewhere, of the "ſaid value. By whoſe oath we find, that all "the lands and rents in the ſaid city are held of "the lord the king in capite, as free burgage "in fee-farm. Nor is their any that hath forty "pounds in land or rent in the ſame by the year "certain; becauſe the lands in the ſaid city, "ſome are lett for more, ſome for leſs, and often "ſtand empty, and are not lett, yet frequently "have divers burdens, and require repairs and "amendments. And for thoſe cauſes, and the "burning of houſes, and divers other dangers "happening, the certainty of the true value of "them cannot be known. And as to the lands "or rents, which the citizens have out of the "bailiffwick, the ſworn men ſay, that they know "nothing of the value of them by the year, nor "can enquire."

The ſame year, the king granted Reginald de Conductu, an annuity of twenty-one pounds, ariſing from ſeveral meſſuages in the city belonging to the crown, in conſequence of the ſaid Reginald having, during his mayoralty, in the ninth and tenth years of the reign of Edward the third, expended large ſums of money for the benefit of the citizens in general; and for other reaſons which did him honour both as a man and a magiſtrate.

The year following, it was ordered that in future the new mayor ſhould be choſen by the mayor and aldermen for the time being, and by ſuch of the principal inhabitants of each ward as ſhould be ſummoned to attend. It was at the ſame time reſolved, that if the perſon choſen on St. Edward's day ſhould be abſent at the election, or refuſe to ſerve that office, he ſhould forfeit an hundred marks, to be paid to the perſon elected in his room, on the feaſt of St. Simon and Jude; alſo, that the ſum of twenty pounds ſhould be paid by every alderman abſenting himſelf, without a reaſonable cauſe, from the election of a mayor.

In the year 1346, a bloody battle was fought at Nevill's Croſs, near the city of Durham, between the Engliſh and Scots, when David king of Scotland was, after a gallant reſiſtance, taken priſoner, and conveyed to the Tower of London.

In the year 1347, a proclamation was made by order of the king, that all leprous perſons inhabiting the city ſhould depart from thence within fifteen days; upon which the citizens claimed claimed the right of ſending fourteen perſons afflicted with that diſeaſe to be maintained in St. Giles's Hoſpital, which right they derived from queen Matilda, who was the foundreſs thereof.

In the year following, a great plague, ſaid to have been brought from India, broke out in London, and carried off prodigious numbers of people; by which the conſumption of all ſorts of proviſions was ſo exceedingly leſſened, that,

This ſhocking diſtemper continued to rage ſo violently, that the common burying places were not large enough to receive the dead bodies, and people were obliged to purchaſe ground for the purpoſe; particularly Ralph Stratford, biſhop of London, who bought a piece of ground, incloſed it with a brickwall, and dedicated it to the purpoſe of burying the dead; and it is recorded that Sir Walter Manny purchaſed a piece of ground adjoining to St. Bartholomew's Hoſpital, in which fifty thouſand perſons who died of the plague were buried, and a latin inſcription was afterwards fixed upon a ſtone croſs near the premiſes of which the following is a tranſlation.

"A great plague raging in the year of our "lord 1349, and within the bounds of the pre- "ſent monaſtery, were buried more than fifty "thouſand bodies of the dead, beſides many "others thenceforward to the preſent time; "whoſe ſouls the lord have mercy upon! Amen."

In the year 1354, the following charter was granted by Edward to the citizens of London:

"Edward, by the grace of God, king of "England and France, and lord of Ireland, to "all to whom theſe our letters ſhall come, greet- "ing.

"Know ye, that we being worthily careful "of the conſervation and increaſe of the name "and honour of our city of London, and at the "ſupplication of the mayor, ſheriffs, and com- "monalty of the ſaid city to us humbly made, "will and grant for us and our heirs, that the "ſerjeants appointed to bear the maces in our "ſaid city may lawfully carry them of gold "or ſilver, or ſilvered or garniſhed with the "ſign of our arms, or others, every where in "the ſaid city, and in the ſuburbs of the ſame, "and in the county of Middleſex, and other pla- "ces to the liberties of the ſaid city apper- "taining; and alſo without the ſaid city to "meet with us, our mother, conſort, or the "children of us or our heirs, or other royal "perſons, when we or any of us ſhall come to "the ſaid city, and alſo in going forth with us, "or any of us, when we ſhall depart from the "ſaid city; as alſo in the preſence of us, our "mother, or conſort, or our children, when "the ſaid mayor, or ſheriffs, or aldermen of the "ſaid city, or any of them, ſhall come to us or "our heirs, at or without the command or "warning of us, or any of us; and as often as "it ſhall happen any of the ſaid ſerjeants to be "ſent to foreign places, and without the city, "to do their offices, at the command of us, or "of the mayor and ſheriffs aforeſaid, they may "lawfully carry going and coming publickly, as "our own ſerjeants at arms, attending our pre- "ſence, do carry their maces; any ordinance "or commandment made to the contrary not- "withſtanding.

"In witneſs whereof, we have cauſed theſe "our letters to be made patents. Witneſs my- "ſelf at Weſtminſter, the tenth day of June, in "the twenty-eighth year of our reign of Eng- "land, and of France the fifteenth."

The citizens were highly pleaſed with their monarch for granting the favour of gold or ſilver maces being carried before the mayor, it being a privilege peculiar to the city of London, as every other city and town in the kingdom was expreſsly forbid to uſe any maces that were not made of copper.

As our ancient hiſtorians are ſilent reſpecting the time when the title of lord was conferred on the mayor of London for the time being; it is the concurrent opinion of the more modern writers, that it was beſtowed at this time, when the honour of having maces as grand as thoſe of the king himſelf, was allowed to the chief magiſtrate.

In gratitude for this favour, the citizens preſented his majeſty with twenty-five men at arms, and five hundred archers, all dreſſed in one uniform, in order to aſſiſt in the proſecution of his deſigns on France. The year 1357 is diſtinguiſhed by the grandeſt triumphal entry that ever was made into this, or, perhaps, any other city; of which our readers will be pleaſed with ſeeing a particular account.

Edward, prince of Wales, commonly called the black prince, having routed the French army at Poictiers, and taken John, king of France, priſoner, finding his army inſufficient to improve the advantages he had obtained, agreed on a truce for two years, that he might have an opportunity of conducting his royal captive to England, where he arrived in the beginning of the month of May.

When they came to Southwark they were met by upwards of a thouſand of the citizens of London on horſe-back, dreſſed in a ſuperb manner, and by a prodigious concourſe of people on foot.

The captive monarch was clad in royal apparel, and mounted on a white courſer, remarkable for its ſize and beauty, while the victorious prince rode by his ſide, on a little black horſe, in ordinary trappings.

When they arrived at the foot of London-Bridge, they were received by the mayor, aldermen, ſheriffs, and the ſeveral city companies, dreſſed in their formalities, and attended by ſtately pageants.

In

In this manner they were conducted through the ſtreets of London, which were decorated with the richeſt tapeſtries, while the citizens exhibited to public view their plate, ſilks, and other furniture, as a proof of their riches; and as a teſtimony of their warlike genius, they expoſed, in the balconies and ſhop windows, an incredible number of bows, arrows, helmets, ſhields, croſlets, breaſt and back pieces, coats of mail, gauntlets, vambraces, * ſwords, ſpears, battle-axes, harneſs for horſes, and other military accoutrements.

The cavalcade was ſo numerous, and the concourſe of people aſſembled to behold it ſo prodigious, that it continued from three o'clock in the morning till noon, when the victorious prince preſented the king of France to his father, who received him with the utmoſt politeneſs.

Soon after this affair, a diſpute happened between the citizens, and the ſteward of the king's houſhold, who, notwithſtanding the known privileges of the city, uſed frequently to oblige them to plead out of the city.

Hereupon the citizens determined to apply to the king for the redreſs of this grievance, and his majeſty was pleaſed to give them the following anſwer:

"That the king willeth, that, if a tranſgreſ-
"ſion be made to any of the king's houſhold,
"within the liberty of the city of London, and
"within the verge of the king, the plea of ſuch
"tranſgreſſion be held before the ſteward and "marſhal of the king's houſhold; and, if in-
"quiſition muſt be made, let that inquiſition be "taken within the ſaid city." And his majeſty was pleaſed to confirm the ſaid anſwer in parliament, in the 30th year of his reign, with this additional clauſe.—"And this the lord the king
"granted in favour of the poor workmen of the "ſaid city, who lived of the work of their own "hands, that they want not their food, or be
"more impoveriſhed."

The French having invaded the coaſt of Suſſex, in the year 1360, the city of London, to revenge the depredations they had made, did, in the ſame year, in conjunction with ſome of the ſea-port towns, fit out a fleet of one hundred and ſixty ſail of ſhips, having on board them fourteen thouſand men, who landing on the coaſt of France, ravaged, burnt, and deſtroyed the country wherever they came.

In the year 1361, a dreadful plague broke out in France, and as it was apprehended that it might either be communicated to London, or that this moſt dreadful diſorder might be revived therein, by the putrifying of the blood and entrails of beaſts, which the butchers uſed to throw into the ſtreets, the king iſſued his commands to the mayor and ſheriffs, in a letter to the following effect.

"Becauſe by killing of great beaſts, &c. from
"whoſe putrified blood running down the ſtreets,
"and the bowels caſt into the Thames, the air
"in the city is very much corrupted and infected,
"whence abominable and moſt filthy ſtinks pro"ceed, ſickneſſes and many other evils have "happened to ſuch as have abode in the ſaid
"city, or have reſorted to it; and great dan"gers are feared to fall out for the time to "come, unleſs remedy be preſently made againſt
"it:

"We, willing to prevent ſuch danger, and to "provide as much as in us lies for the honeſty of "the ſaid city, and the ſafety of our people, by
"the conſent of our council in our preſent
"parliament, have ordained, that all bulls,
"oxen, hogs, and other groſs creatures, to be
"ſlain for the ſuſtenance of the ſaid city, be "led as far as the town of Stratford on one part
"of London, and the town of Knightſbridge on "the other; and there, and not on this ſide, be
"ſlain; and that their bowels be there cleanſed,
"to be brought, together with the fleſh, to the
"ſaid city to be ſold: and if any butcher ſhall
"preſume any thing raſhly againſt this ordi"nance, let him incur forfeiture of the fleſh of
"the creatures which he hath cauſed to be ſlain
"on this ſide the ſaid towns, and the puniſh-
"ment of impriſonment for one year. This "ordinance to be publickly proclaimed and "held; and all butchers doing otherwiſe to be
"chaſtized and puniſhed according to the form "of the ordinance aforeſaid. Witneſs the king
"at Weſtminſter, the twenty-fifth day of Fe"bruary."

Notwithſtanding this precautionary care, the peſtilence reached England, where it raged to ſuch an aſtoniſhing degree, that in the city of London only, no leſs than twelve hundred perſons fell a ſacrifice to its inſatiable fury, in the ſpace of two days: a prodigious number indeed, if we conſider the great difference of population between thoſe times and the preſent!

The kings of Scotland, France, and Cyprus, being in England in the year 1363, on a viſit to king Edward, Henry Picard, a late lord mayor of London, had the honour of giving a ſumptuous dinner to the four monarchs, together with the prince of Wales, and moſt of the nobility; and perhaps ſuch an honour never yet fell to the lot of any other private ſubject in the whole world.

In the year 1365 the parliament made an ordinance to aſcertain what things a tenant ſhould be obliged to leave behind him, on his quitting a houſe that he had rented in the city, or within the liberties of London; of which the following is a tranſlation. †

It was ordained, that "if any perſon hire a "tenement, houſe or houſes, in the city of "London, or in the ſuburbs thereof, to hold
"the ſame for the term of life, or for years,
"or only from year to year, or from quarter to "quarter; if the ſaid tenant ſhall make, or
"cauſe to be made, any pentyſes or other eaſe-

" ments in the ſaid tenement, houſe, or houſes, " fixed with nails of iron or wooden pegs to the " premiſes, or to the ſoil thereof; it ſhall not be " lawful for ſuch tenant to remove ſuch pentyſes " or eaſements at the end of the term, or at any " other time to deſtroy them; but they ſhall al- " ways remain to the landlord of the ſaid premiſes, " as a parcel thereof." In conſequence of this ordinance, the mayor and aldermen publiſhed the following confirmation thereof: " Whereas " nowe of late, amonge divers people, was " ſprongen matter of doute upon the moſt olde " cuſtom had and uſed in this cyte of London, " of ſuch thyngys which by tenauntys for terms " of lyſe or yerys, have been affyxed unto houſes, " without ſpecyal lycence of the owner of the " ſoyle, whether they owe to remayne unto the " owner of the ſoyle, as parcel of the ſame; " or ellys whether it ſhall be lawful unto ſuche " tenauntys, on the end of her terme, all ſuche " thyngys affyxed to remove.

" Whereupon, olde bokys ſeen, and many " records, olde proceſſys, and engagementys of " the ſayd cyte, it was declared by the mayor and " aldermen, for an olde preſcrybed cuſtom of the " cyte aforeſayd, that all ſuche eaſementys fyxed " unto houſes, or to ſoyle, by ſuche tenauntys, " without ſpecyal and expreſſe lycence of the " owner of the ſoyle, yf they be affyxed with " nayles of irne or of tree, as pentyſes, glaſſe, " lockys, benchys, or any ſuche other: or elles " if they be affyxed with morter or lyme, or of " erther, or any other morter, as forneys, leedys, " candorous, chemyneys, corbels, pavemettis, " or ſuche other; or elles yf plantys be roetyd " in the ground, as vines, trees, graffe ſtounks, " trees of frut, &c. it ſhall not be lawful unto " ſuche tenauntys, in the end of her terme, or " on any other tyme therein, nor any of them, " to put away, move, or plucke up in any wyſe, " but that they ſhall alway remayne to the owner " of the ſoyle, as parcels of the ſame ſoyle or " tenement."

At this period the citizens of London appear to have diſcontinued the uſe of archery, which had been much practiſed by, and in general eſteem with their anceſtors; whereupon the king ſent the following letter to the ſheriffs of London, to revive and eſtabliſh the practice of ſhooting with arrows.

" The king to the ſheriffs of London, greeting. " Becauſe the people of our realm, as well of " good quality as mean, have commonly in " their ſports before theſe times exerciſed the " ſkill of ſhooting arrows; whence it is well " known, that honour and profit have accrued " to our whole realm, and to us, by the help " of God, no ſmall aſſiſtance in our warlike " acts; and now the ſaid ſkill being, as it " were, wholly laid aſide, the ſame people pleaſe " themſelves in hurling of ſtones and wood and " iron; and ſome in hand-ball, foot-ball, bandy- " ball, and in cambuck, or cock-fighting; and " ſome alſo apply themſelves to other diſhoneſt " games, and leſs profitable or uſeful; whereby " the ſaid realm is likely, in a ſhort time, to be- " come deſtitute of archers.

" We, willing to apply a ſeaſonable remedy " to this, command you, that in places in the " foreſaid city, as well within the liberties as " without, where you ſhall ſee it expedient, you " cauſe publick proclamation to be made, that " every one of the ſaid city, ſtrong in body, at " leiſure times on holidays, uſe in their recrea- " tions bows and arrows, or pellets, or bolts, " and learn and exerciſe the art of ſhooting; " forbidding all and ſingular on our behalf, that " they do not after any manner apply themſelves " to the throwing of ſtones, wood, iron, hand- " ball, foot-ball, bandy-ball, cambuck, or cock- " fighting, nor ſuch other like vain plays, which " have no profit in them, or concern themſelves " therein, under pain of impriſonment. Wit- " neſs the king at Weſtminſter, the twelfth day " of June."

CHAPTER XVI.

A perſon elected mayor fined for not ſerving the office. Plague in London. Citizens petition to the king and parliament for a confirmation of their ancient privileges. Practice of uſury ſuppreſſed. Grand tournament in Smithfield. Two charters granted. Citizens reſtored to their ancient right of ſelling wine. Their petition to chooſe their own coroner rejected. A grand maſquerade at the palace at Kennington. Account of a dangerous riot, and its conſequences. Richard, prince of Wales, invited to reſide in the city. Death of Edward III.

IN the year 1368, Walter Berneye having been elected chief magiſtrate of this city, and not appearing on the feaſt of St. Simon and Jude, to take upon him the ſaid office; Simon de Mordon was elected mayor, and on the day following he was ſworn in before the barons of the exchequer.

Hereupon a warrant of diſtreſs was iſſued, to levy one hundred marks on the effects of the ſaid Walter Berneye, for the uſe of the ſaid Simon de Mordon the mayor, purſuant to an order of the city, made in the year 1345.

The citizens of London were again viſited with the plague, in the year 1369, by which great numbers were deſtroyed; and notwithſtanding the number of inhabitants was thus leſſened, a wet harveſt, in the ſame year, occaſioned ſo great a ſcarcity of corn, that wheat raiſed to the extravagant price of one pound, ſix ſhillings and eight-pence the quarter.

Notwithſtanding the ſeveral charters that had been granted to the citizens of London, they could not but remark that their liberties were ſtill occaſionaly invaded, by foreigners obtaining private grants from the crown; whereupon they made application to the king and parliament, in the following terms.

" To our lord the king, and his noble coun" cil, the citizens of London do ſhew, that they " have nothing to live upon but their induſtry
" and franchiſe, upon which franchiſe the ſaid
" city was founded; and by reaſon of which
" franchiſe, they were wont to travel by land and
" by ſea, in divers countries for their profit; by " which travel they uſed to bring divers merchan-
" dizes, to the great common profit of the " whole realm of England, to the great aid and " maintenance of the ſaid city, ſuſtenance and
" increaſe of the navy of the ſaid land.

" And of late their franchiſes are taken from " them, againſt the grant of our ſaid noble lord
" the king, and his noble progenitors, ſealed
" with their ſeals, and againſt the great charter;
" to the great deſtruction as well of the ſaid city,
" common damage of the land, as alſo of the " navy.

" Whereupon they pray, that the king would " pleaſe to have regard, and take notice that
" the ſaid city was founded upon the ſaid fran-
" chiſes, without which they could not maintain
" the city, nor bear the taxes and other charges,
" as they were wont to do: for which cauſe they " pray they may have their franchiſes, according " to the grant of the king, and his noble pro-
" genitors, and the great charter; and that all
" ſuch grants and confirmations of franchiſes,
" may be made to all other cities and burghs
" of the realm."

In the year 1375, the deſtructive practice of uſury was arrived at ſuch an enormous height, as tended greatly to the injury of trade in general, and the oppreſſion of many perſons in particular; whereupon John Not, the mayor of London, took ſuch meaſures to enforce the laws againſt extortioners, as ſoon ſtopped the growing evil; which proceeding was highly approved by his majeſty and the parliament; and the whole nation was enjoined to follow the example of the mayor of London.

This year, the king, who was very old, became enamoured of Alice Pierce or Perrers, his atachment to whom led him to the commiſſion of many things highly unbecoming his dignity; and this lady gained ſo much the aſcendant, that ſhe prevailed on him to convert to her uſe ſeveral large ſums of money raiſed for the ſervice of the ſtate, at which the nation in general was highly diſpleaſed. The king, however, making it his whole ſtudy to pleaſe his miſtreſs, among many other expenſive diverſions, ordered a tournament to be held in Smithfield, at which lady Alice appeared moſt elegantly dreſſed, in a triumphal chariot; ſhe was on this occaſion dignified with the title of the LADY OF THE SUN, and attended by a great number of ladies, each of whom led a horſe on which a knight was mounted; many of the principal noblemen, richly accoutred, were likewiſe preſent at this tournament, which laſted ſeven days; during which time many gallant feats were performed by the young nobility and gentry.

In the fiftieth year of his reign Edward granted two charters; the firſt, which was to explain the right of chuſing aldermen, runs as follows:

" Edward, by the grace of God, king of " England and France, and lord of Ireland, to " all men to whom we ſend, greeting. Among " other articles which our lord Edward, ſome
" time king of England, our father, the year
" of his reign XII. by his letters patents hath " granted and confirmed to the citizens of the " ſaid city of London, for the amendment and " common profit of them that dwell in the ſame
" city, and of them that repair thereto. In the " ſame letters it is contained, that the aldermen
" of the foreſaid city, that every year they be " removed on the day of St. Gregory, by the " commonalty of the ſaid city, and that they ſo
" removed be not choſen again the next year
" enſuing; but, inſtead of them that have been " removed, others be choſen by the ſame wards
" from which ſuch aldermen were removed, as " in the ſame letters plainly it is contained;
" concerning which, on the part of the com-
" monalty of the foreſaid city, by their petition
" before us in our grear council, now again
" aſked, to us meekly it is beſought, that ſince
" divers opinions and divers ſtrifes have been
" ſprung between the aldermen and the com-
" monalty of the ſaid city, upon the removing of " aldermen, for the wrong interpretation of " words in the foreſaid articles contained, that " is to ſay, that the foreſaid aldermen affirm,
" that by the two words, viz. ſint amobiles per
" communitatem, &c. i. e. let them be removed
" by the commonalty, they ought not to be " removed from the office of aldermanſhip,
" without ſufficient reaſon, or for ſome notorious " offence to be found in them. But others of " the ſaid citizens being of a contrary opinion,
" and willing to aboliſh this article, they have
" beſought us to explain the ſaid article, ſo as to " remove all doubt about the premiſes: We be" ing willing, as much as lieth in us, to contri" bute to the peace and tranquillity of the ſaid
" mayor, aldermen, and commonalty, and their " ſucceſſors, henceforward, concerning the in" terpretation of the ſaid article, do, by and " with the advice of our ſaid council, declare,
" that all and every alderman of the ſaid city,
" every year, for ever, on the feaſt of St. Gre" gory the pope, from the office of an alderman
" utterly and preciſely ſhall ceaſe, and ſhall not " be choſen again; but that, inſtead of thoſe
" removed, other aldermen ſhall be choſen every " year, for ever, out of the diſcreet citizens of " good fame, by the ſaid wards from which " the ſaid aldermen were removed. In witneſs
" whereof we have cauſed theſe our letters to be " made patents. Witneſs myſelf at Weſtminſter,
" the twelfth day of November, the fiftieth year
" of our reign in England, and the thirty-ſixth
" over France."

The

The other charter was in anſwer to the citizens petition againſt private licence being granted to foreigners, and is recited as follows:

" Edward, king of England and France, and " lord of Ireland, to all to whom theſe letters " ſhall come, greeting.

" Know ye, that whereas, amongſt other li- " berties granted to the citizens of our city of " London, by the charters of our progenitors, " ſometime kings of England, which we have " confirmed, and by ours, it hath been granted " unto them, that all merchant ſtrangers coming " into England, ſhall remain at board with the " free hoſts of the city aforeſaid, and of other " cities and towns in England, without keeping " any houſes or ſocieties by themſelves; and that " there ſhould be no brokers of any merchan- " dizes from henceforth, unleſs they were choſen " thereunto by the merchants in the myſteries in " which the ſaid brokers exerciſe their offices, " and thereupon at the leaſt do take their oaths " before the mayor of the ſaid city: and alſo, " that the merchants who are not of the free- " dom of the ſaid city, ſhould not ſell by retail " any wines or other wares within the ſaid city, " or the ſuburbs thereof. And now our well- " beloved ſubjects, the mayor, aldermen, and " other citizens of the ſaid city, have humbly " beſeeched us and our council in the laſt par- " liament by their petition exhibited in theſe " words:

" To our lord the king and his good coun- " cil, your liege ſubjects the mayor, alder- " men, and commonalty of the city of London, " ſhew, that whereas they have often ſued in " divers parliaments to have conſideration how " that they are impoveriſhed and undone, by " reaſon their liberties by him and his proge- " nitors to them granted are reſtrained, and great " part taken away; and now at the laſt parlia- " ment held at Weſtminſter, it was anſwered to " them, that they ſhould declare their griefs " ſpecially, and they ſhould have good remedy " therefore: of which griefs (amongſt divers " others) theſe be; that every ſtranger might " dwell in the ſaid city, and keep a houſe, and " be a broker, and ſell and buy all manner of " merchandizes by retail; and one ſtranger to " ſell to another to ſell again, to the great in- " hancing the prices of merchandizes, and a " cauſe to make them remain there more than " forty days; whereas, in time paſt, no mer- " chant ſtranger might uſe any of theſe points, " contrary to the franchiſes of the ſaid city, " before theſe times had and uſed: by which " grievance the merchants of the ſaid city are " greatly impoveriſhed, and the navy impaired, " and the privities of the land by the ſaid " ſtrangers diſcovered to our enemies by " ſpies and other ſtrangers into theſe houſes re- " ceived.

" May it therefore pleaſe your majeſty and " council to ordain in this parliament, that the " merchant ſtrangers may be reſtrained in the " points aforeſaid, and the mayor, aldermen, " and commons in the ſaid city, may enjoy the " ſaid franchiſes.

" We, for the ſpecial affection we bear to the " ſaid citizens, willing to provide for the tran- " quillity and profit of the ſaid citizens in that " behalf, with the aſſents of our prelates, nobles, " &c. have granted for us and our heirs, to the " ſaid mayor and aldermen, and citizens of the " ſaid city, and their ſucceſſors upon condition " that they put the ſaid city under good govern- " ment, to our honour, and the profit of our " realm of England, and right govern the ſame, " that no ſtrangers ſhall from henceforth ſell any " wares in the ſame city, or ſuburbs thereof, by " retail, nor ſhall keep any houſe, nor be any bro- " ker in the ſaid city or ſuburbs thereof; any " ſtatute or ordinance made to the contrary " notwithſtanding. Saving always to the mer- " chants of High Almaine their liberties by us " and our progenitors to them granted and " confirmed.

" In witneſs whereof we have cauſed theſe our " letters to be made patents. Witneſs myſelf at " Weſtminſter the fourth day of December, in " the fiftieth year of our reign over England, " and of our kingdom of France the thirty- " ſixth."

Upon theſe charters being granted, proſecutions were immediately commenced againſt divers perſons for having obtained unconſtitutional grants from the king; among theſe were John Peach, wine-merchant, and Richard Lyons, merchant, both of London.

The former was charged with having obtained a licence for the ſole privilege of ſelling ſweet wine in London, by which he had acquired prodigious ſums of money; and being convicted, he was committed to priſon till he made ample ſatisfaction to the injured parties.

The latter was accuſed of frauds, extortions, and other illegal acts, in obtaining licences, taking bribes, tampering with the council, &c. and being likewiſe found guilty of the crimes laid to his charge, his eſtates real and perſonal were confiſcated, and himſelf committed to priſon, till he ſhould make the ſufferers amends.

In conſequence of the ſucceſs of theſe proſecutions, the citizens were reſtored to their antient right of ſelling wine, the price of which was always to be regulated by the firſt magiſtrate of the city.

In the year 1377, the houſe of commons petitioned the king that the charter which he had lately granted the citizens might be confirmed by act of parliament; but Edward not being willing to comply with their requeſt, returned for anſwer, that " he would be further informed."

At the ſame time the houſe of commons likewiſe humbly petitioned that, as divers miſchiefs happened in the city, occaſioned by the mayor not being allowed to puniſh the coroner for neglect of duty, his majeſty would be pleaſed to grant them the privilege of chuſing from among themſelves a perſon to act in the above-mentioned capacity; and that they might remove him when they ſhould think proper: however, though the citizens aſked no more than what was allowed to many towns and cities in England, the king rejected their petition.

Shortly

Shortly after this the mayor, aldermen, and citizens addreſſed the king, requeſting him to confirm their liberties with reſpect to puniſhing all miſdemeanours in Southwark, and that the marſhal ſhould not be allowed to intermeddle with that part of Southwark which is guildable; but this petition met with as little ſucceſs as the two preceding; for the king told them, that were he to grant their petition, he ſhould do great wrong to divers of his other ſubjects.

The king's behaviour to the citizens did not leſſen their regard to the royal family; for, in the ſame year, they entertained the princeſs of Wales, her ſon prince Richard, and their attendants at Kennington, with a grand maſquerade on horſeback: The proceſſion, which ſet out from Newgate, marched through the city, over London-bridge, and through the Borough of Southwark, to Kennington, in the following manner:

1. Flambeaux
2. A grand band of muſic.
3. One hundred and thirty citizens, on horſeback, in diviſions; the firſt of which conſiſted of forty eight perſons dreſſed in the habits of eſquires, with red coats, ſay gowns, and wellfancied vizors; the next diviſion conſiſted of the ſame number, apparelled like knights, theſe were followed by a perſon in a moſt elegant habit, and the third diviſion was headed by one reſembling a pope, who was attended by twenty-four others habited like cardinals, after whom came ten men dreſſed like legates, in frightful black vizors, who cloſed the cavalcade.

The princeſs and her ſon were highly pleaſed with this mark of the citizens eſteem, and after ſupper, they had the honour of dancing with the prince and the nobility, after which they returned in the ſame manner to the city.

Shortly after, the lord marſhal, (who had his priſon in London) contrary to the right, and privileges of the city, committed a citizen. In conſequence of which the mayor and common-council aſſembled to conſult on the meaſures to be taken againſt him; but the commonalty, impatient of redreſs, went in great numbers to the Marſhalſea, * which they broke open, and carried off the priſoner; they then went in ſearch of the lord marſhal, and not being able to find him, they wreaked their vengeance on his houſe, which they pulled almoſt down.

Being diſappointed at not meeting with the marſhal, and recollecting that the duke of Lancaſter had endeavoured to retrench the liberties of the city, they ſet forward for his palace in the ſavoy, with an intent to revenge themſelves.

The duke was at that time at dinner at the houſe of John de Ipres, in the city, to which place a knight of the duke's, who had heard of the deſign of the rioters, went to apprize him of the danger; the duke inſtantly aroſe from table, haſtened to the Thames, and took boat for Kennington palace, the reſidence of the princeſs dowager and her ſon.

When the populace had got to the Savoy, they were aſked by a prieſt what they wanted; they anſwered the perſons of the duke and the marſhal, who had unjuſtly detained in priſon Sir Peter de la Mere: the prieſt replied, Sir Peter was a traitor,—which ſo incenſed the mob, that, inſiſting on the prieſt being the marſhal in diſguiſe, they dragged him forth, and knocked him on the head.

During this tumult, the biſhop of London arrived at the Savoy, where in a moſt pathetic ſpeech, he exhorted them to forbearance, urging that it was the holy time of Lent, and promiſing that their grievances ſhould be redreſſed; which ſo gained upon the minds of the populace, that they deſiſted, otherwiſe in all probability they would have razed the duke's palace to the ground.

The citizens, very ſhortly after received a meſſage from the princeſs dowager of Wales, perſuading them to beg pardon of the duke for the outrages they had committed; which they, out of reſpect to her, conſented to, at the ſame time begging ſhe would uſe her influence to have Sir Peter de la Mere brought to a fair and legal trial

The mayor and aldermen being apprehenſive of the king's diſpleaſure, reſolved, if poſſible, to award it; and accordingly, a number of the principal citizens waited on his majeſty, and were, contrary to the inclination of the duke, admitted to an audience, when they declared themſelves innocent of the late inſurrection, proteſting that they had done every thing in their power to ſuppreſs the ſame, though they had unfortunately been unſucceſsful in their endeavours.

They further told the king, that his faithful citizens were in general under great anxiety of mind, having heard that by act of parliament they were to be deprived of what were dearer to them than their lives—their liberties!

The king told them not to be uneaſy on that head, for that ſo far from infringing their liberties he moſt earneſtly deſired on all occaſions to enlarge them.

The citizens, highly pleaſed with the behaviour of their monarch, returned to the city; where they were received by their brethren with every demonſtration of joy, who moſt heartily congratulated them on their good ſucceſs.

Though the mayor had very wiſely taken every precaution to preſerve the public peace, he could not prevent a few ſeditious perſons ſticking up papers in different parts of the city, tending to inflame the minds of the populace againſt the duke of Lancaſter; it therefore was judged neceſſary to prononnce ſentence of excommunication upon ſuch perſons as ſhould, in future, preſume to write or diſperſe any paper derogatory to the duke's character; and this was accordingly done by the biſhop of Bangor, aſſiſted by the mayor and aldermen.

Affairs remained in this ſituation till the diſſolution of the parliament, when the reſentment of the duke of Lancaſter againſt the citizens began to be more apparent than ever; for the mayor and aldermen being ſummoned to attend the king at Shene, near Richmond, they were ſeverely reprimanded, and urged to aſk pardon of the duke: but inſtead of ſo doing, they aſſerted their innocence, and promiſed to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to apprehend the offenders, and compel them to make a retaliation proportioned to their crimes.

This, however, was thought inſufficient; whereupon the mayor and ſeveral of the aldermen were diſcharged from their offices, and others, more attached to the duke of Lancaſter, were appointed in their ſtead, by virtue of a writ which the king iſſued on the occaſion.

The citizens being informed that the king lay at the point of death, they deputed ſeveral of the moſt eminent of their body to wait on prince Richard, who was then with his mother at the palace of Kennington; when John Philpot, in the name of his fellow-citizens, acquainting the prince with the advices they had received of the king's extreme danger, beſought his favour to the inhabitants of London, aſſured him of their readineſs to devote their lives and fortunes to his ſervice, and requeſted that he would come and reſide among them.

On the twenty-ſecond of June, 1377, died Edward the third, one of the moſt accompliſhed princes that ever ſwayed the ſcepter of this kingdom, whether we conſider him as a warrior, a monarch, or a man.*

CHAPTER XVII.

The acceſſion of Richard II. to the throne. Firſt mention of a champion at a coronation. Office of chief butler claimed by the citizens. King Richard's charter of confirmation. The differences between the city and the duke of Lancaſter adjuſted. The young king's grand entry into London. Sir John Philpot's expedition againſt the Scotch privateers. Account of Wat Tyler's inſurrection, with the ſuppreſſion of the inſurgents, in conſequence of the death of their leader.

IMMEDIATELY on the death of king Edward the third, the citizens of London proclaimed Richard, ſon of Edward the black prince, king of England, and having notified the ſame to the young king, they ſollicited his majeſty to exert his influence to adjuſt the differences which had ſubſiſted between the duke of Lancaſter and the citizens.

At this time the young monarch reſided at Kingſton upon Thames, where, having received the compliments and congratulations of the citizens, on his acceſſion to the throne, he was conducted to Weſtminſter-hall, where he was crowned with the uſual magnificence, on the fifteenth day of July, 1377.

It is at this coronation that our hiſtorians make the firſt mention of a champion, who appeared in a compleat ſuit of armour, entered Weſtminſter-hall, where the king dined, and throwing his gauntlet on the ground, challenged any perſon who ſhould preſume to diſpute the king's title to the crown of theſe realms.

It is impoſſible to trace the origin of this cuſtom; but there remains no doubt of its being of a more ancient date than the coronation of Richard II. ſince Sir John Dimmock, who performed the office at that period, was admitted thereto, by virtue of a right annexed to the manor of Scrivelby in Lincolnſhire.

At this coronation the citizens claimed their right to the office of chief butler, which being admitted, was diſcharged in the perſon of the Lord-mayor.

A petition from the city, for a confirmation of their charters, being depending at the death of Edward III. they immediately renewed it to their young ſovereign; and in this application they were ſeconded by the houſe of commons, who preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, humbly requeſting that the citizens of London might enjoy all their ancient rights, privileges, and immunities, as they had been granted and confirmed by his majeſty's royal predeceſſors.

To this reaſonable requeſt the king yielded a ready compliance, as will appear by the following charter of confirmation:

" Whereas the ſaid citizens, by their petition
" exhibited to us in parliament, did ſet forth,
" that although they, for a long time paſt, have
" uſed and enjoyed certain free cuſtoms, until of " late years they have been unjuſtly moleſted;
" which cuſtoms are as followeth, viz. That no
" foreigner do ſell or buy of another foreigner
" any merchandizes within the liberties of the
" ſaid city, upon pain of forfeiting the ſame.
" Nevertheleſs, being deſirous, for the future, to " take away all controverſies about the ſame,
" We do by theſe preſents, with the aſſent afore-
" ſaid, will and grant, and by theſe preſents,
" for us and our heirs, do confirm unto the ſaid
" citizens, and their ſucceſſors, that, for the " future, no foreigner ſell to another foreigner
" any merchandizes within the liberties of the

Soon after the grant of this charter, the king ſent a meſſage by lord Latimer, Sir Richard Adderſbury, Sir Nicholas Bond, and Sir Simon Burley, to acquaint the citizens that his majeſty entertained the ſincereſt regard for the city of London; alſo with his determination to take up his reſidence therein, and of the progreſs he had made towards accommodating the differences which had ſubſiſted between the Londoners and the duke of Lancaſter.

The abovementioned gentlemen likewiſe acquainted the citizens, that the duke of Lancaſter had entirely, on his part, ſubmitted the affair to the king's determination; and it was his majeſty's requeſt that they would do the ſame; in which caſe the king would exert his utmoſt influence to adjuſt the affair to the mutual ſatisfaction of both parties.

The citizens, however, did not receive this meſſage with all the complaiſance that might have been expected; for conſidering that the king was not arrived at years of diſcretion, and being very doubtful of the ſincerity of his majeſty's adviſers, as well as dreading the power and influence of the duke, they heſitated in complying with the king's requeſt.

At length, after conſiderable debates, it was reſolved, that if lord Latimer, and the other three gentlemen, would promiſe upon oath, that the ſubmiſſion of the Londoners to his majeſty's requeſt, ſhould not be of the leaſt prejudice to the city, they would chearfully accede to the royal requiſition.

The deputies having readily taken this oath, ſeveral of the chief citizens accompanied them to Shene, where the king, with his royal mother, and the duke of Lancaſter, attended by many of the nobility, waited their arrival.

They were admitted to an immediate audience of the king, who received them in the moſt gracious manner, and the whole affair being debated in council, ſo perfect a reconciliation was effected, that the duke embraced the citizens reſpectively, in the preſence of the king, and all animoſities immediately ſubſided.

The citizens, highly delighted with the ſucceſs of their journey, returned to London; where, on the day following, public proclamation was made at the uſual places, that the duke of Lancaſter and the citizens were mutually reconciled to each other.

Soon after this happy compromiſe, preparations were made for the king's grand entry into London, which was performed in the following manner.

The young monarch being mounted on a fine horſe, was attended by the duke of Lancaſter, lord high ſteward of the kingdom, lord Piercy, earl marſhal, and many of the nobility.

This pompous cavalcade ſet out from Shene, the king's horſe being led by Sir Nicholas Bond, and the ſword of ſtate carried by Sir Simon Burley; while his majeſty was followed by ſeveral diviſions of the young nobility, (nearly of his own age) each diviſion being preceded by trumpets ſounding.

When they arrived at London, his majeſty was received by the mayor, aldermen, and citizens, and conducted to Cheapſide, where was erected a grand conduit in the form of a caſtle, which ran with wine during the proceſſion.

Four beautiful girls, about the age of the king, ſupplied their ſovereign with a part of this wine in golden cups, and alſo threw gilt flowers on his head, and ſcattered florins, reſembling gold, among the populace.

The duke of Lancaſter particularly diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his polite and affable behaviour, which gained him the love of the citizens in a high degree; while the nobility in general accommodated their behaviour to the pleaſing occaſion in ſo polite and proper a manner, that the day was ſpent in all that delightful order, and elegant decorum, which is the natural conſequence of the whole of a large company, reſolving to be pleaſed with themſelves, and with each other.

The year 1378 is diſtinguiſhed by the remarkable expedition of Sir John Philpot, a worthy citizen of London, againſt one Mercer, a Scotch privateer.

Mercer, having obſerved the declining condition of the Engliſh navy, fitted out ſeveral privateers in Scotland, to cruize againſt the Engliſh merchant ſhips, which he did for ſome time with ſuch conſiderable ſucceſs, that he at length ventured to enter the port of Scarborough, and ſeized all the veſſels in that harbour.

The conſtant depredations made by this pirate, occaſioned many applications to the people in power for redreſs; but theſe proving ineffectual, Sir John Philpot at length determined to do juſtice to his fellow ſubjects; for which purpoſe he fitted out a fleet, at his own expence, which he manned with a thouſand able hands, and went on board himſelf, as commander in chief, with a reſolution to chaſtiſe Mercer, or periſh in the attempt.

It was not long before Sir John fell in with the pirate, whom he found greatly embarraſſed with the number of ſhips he had taken, among which were fifteen Spaniſh veſſels with very valuable cargoes.

Mercer was determined not to give up his acquiſitions, and Sir John was equally determined to compel his ſubmiſſion; on which a deſperate engagement enſued, wherein Mercer was defeated, and moſt of his ſhips taken by the victorious Londoner, who then returned home, and when he ſailed up the Thames in triumph, he was welcomed by the applauding ſhouts of his fellow-citizens.

Notwithſtanding this ſpirited conduct of Sir John, which one would imagine ſhould have gained him the thanks of the whole kingdom, he was, at the inſtigation of a ſet of weak, indolent, and wicked miniſters, ſummoned before the king and council, to anſwer for his conduct, in preſuming to undertake an affair of ſuch high importance, without an authority ſuperior to his own.

Sir John attended in obedience to the ſummons, when he gave ſuch weighty reaſons in defence fence of the part he had acted, and behaved in so modeſt and unaſſuming a manner, that he was honourably acquitted.

In this ſame year 1378, the parliament granted a ſubſidy, by which perſons of all ranks were aſſeſſed according to their reſpective ſtations in life; for hereby all tradeſmen with their wives and children, (being above fourteen years of age) were taxed at four-pence per head; the aldermen of London were rated, equal with the barons at forty ſhillings each; and the Lord-mayor, as an earl, at four pounds; from which circumſtance our hiſtorians are of opinion that the title of Right Honourable was then beſtowed on the mayor of London.

This tax, however, was the occaſion of one of the moſt extraordinary inſurrections that ever happened in this country, of the particulars of which our readers will be glad to be informed.

The king having farmed this tax to ſome of his nobility, they employed a ſet of rapacious collectors, who extorted the money with ſuch rigour as inflamed the minds of the people in a very high degree.

The inhabitants of the county of Eſſex were particularly alarmed, by a report which was induſtriouſly propagated, that the country people were doomed to deſtruction, that their farms would be plundered and their houſes burned to the ground.

While this report was generally believed, ſome of the collectors of the poll-tax going to the houſe of Wat Hilliard, a tyler, of Dartford in Kent, demanded payment of the tax for his daughter; which he refuſed to pay, alledging that ſhe had not arrived at the age ſpecified in the ſtatute.

The brutal officer, however, inſiſted that ſhe was arrived at years of puberty, and in order to prove the truth of his aſſertion, he proceeded to ſhocking acts of indecency, which irritated the father to ſuch a degree, that he knocked out the collector's brains.

Every one who was preſent applauded the reſolute behaviour of the tyler; and the populace betaking themſelves to their arms, and great numbers flocking in from the adjacent towns and villages, Wat ſoon found himſelf at the head of a numerous army, who determined to attempt to extricate themſelves from the heavy load of taxes under which they had long groaned.

The inſurgents taking the road to Maidſtone, releaſed from the goal of that town one Ball, an excommunicated prieſt, who had been long confined for ſeditious practices; and who was no ſooner at liberty than he commenced chaplain to his deliverers, and to encourage them in their proceedings he preached a ſermon to them, taking this proverb for his text.

"When Adam delv'd, and Eve ſpan,
"Who was then a gentleman?

From theſe words he laboured to prove, that all mankind, as the deſcendants of one common parent, were upon an equality: he therefore adviſed them to go to the king, and demand their liberties, which if they could not obtain by gentle meaſures, to uſe force for the recovery of them.

The people were highly animated by this diſcourſe, and making an unanimous choice of Wat Tyler for their leader, they, by his direction, took an oath "to be true to king Richard and "the commons of England; never to receive a "king whoſe name was John; * to perſuade their "neighbours to join in the common cauſe, and "never to ſubmit to the payment of any other "tax than a fifteenth."

The flame of rebellion having ſpread with the utmoſt rapidity through the counties of Suſſex, Eſſex, Surrey, Kent, and Hertford, Wat Tyler's army encreaſed every hour; and marching from Maidſtone he encamped at Blackheath, where he ſoon found himſelf at the head of an hundred thouſand men.

The profeſſed view of the inſurgents was to aboliſh all bad laws and cuſtoms; and they particularly declared againſt the intolerable exactions and corruptions of the lawyers; carrying their reſentment ſo far as to murder every one of that profeſſion, and even every nobleman who happened to fall in their way.

While they were thus encamped on Blackheath, they ſent a deputation to the king, who had taken refuge in the Tower, deſiring that his majeſty would come and hear their propoſals.

The [illegible] great debates in council reſpecting the propriety of his majeſty's complying with this requeſt, and ſome of the counſellors were of opinion that the king's preſence would be the only means of appeaſing the rioters; but this was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by Simon Sudbury, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and lord chancellor, and Sir Robert Hales, prior of St. John of Jeruſalem, and lord high treaſurer, who urged that his majeſty could not attend with ſafety to his perſon.

The advice of theſe counſellors being followed, the rioters were ſo enraged, that they vowed to deſtroy them; and leaving Blackheath, they haſtened toward London; and arriving in Southwark on the tenth of June 1380, they broke open the priſons of the King's-Bench and Marſhalſea, and ſet all the priſoners at liberty.

The greater part of the releaſed priſoners immediately joined the inſurgents, a part of whom marching to Lambeth, burnt the palace of the archbiſhop, with all its furniture, and the books, regiſters and writings belonging to the court of chancery.

Thoſe who remained in Southwark, having, by the aſſiſtance of the priſoners, diſcovered the dwellings of the lawyers, jurors, and queſtmongers, they immediately pulled them down to the ground; as they likewiſe did the common ſtews, or bawdy-houſes along the bank-ſide, which were kept by Flemiſh bawds who rented them of the city.

The mayor of London dreading the conſequence of the rioters advancing into the metropolis, ordered the bridge gate to be ſhut and fortified;

* This was a reflection on John, duke of Lancaſter, to whom they had an invincible hatred.

but on the following day it was thought more prudent to admit them into the city, to prevent the total deſtruction of the Borough of Southwark.

As ſoon as they entered London, the ſhambles and wine-cellars were ſet open for their accommodation; and being ſoon joined by great numbers of the inferior citizens, they repaired to the duke of Lancaſter's palace of the Savoy, which was at that time the grandeſt pile of buildings in this kingdom; and having deſtroyed all the rich furniture, plate, and jewels, they reduced the palace to a heap of aſhes and ruins.

While this building was on fire, thirty-two of the rioters were carouſing in the duke's cellar, where becoming intoxicated with liquor, they ſeemed to have forgot or deſpiſed the danger they were in; for they ſtaid till the rafters were conſumed, and the houſe fell down, whereby the paſſage was ſtopped up, ſo that they could not return: and in this place they periſhed, after crying out for help for ſeven days ſucceſſively, during which no perſon attempted to relieve them.

From the Savoy the rioters proceeded to the Temple, which they burnt down, together with all the books, papers and records: after which the other inns of court ſhared the ſame fate.

They now divided themſelves into three bodies, one of which repairing to Clerkenwell, burnt the rich priory of St. John of Jeruſalem; from whence they haſtened to the ſeat of Sir Robert Hales, at Highbury near Iſlington, which they likewiſe burnt and deſtroyed.

The ſecond diviſion having encamped at Mile-end, ſent a meſſage to the king, demanding a parley; and Richard, with the advice of his council, went to them, and aſked their demands; which were as follows:

1. That thenceforward all his majeſty's ſubjects ſhould be free from ſervitude or bondage.

2. That there ſhould be a general pardon, of all manner of actions for debt, inſurrections, treaſons, felonies, tranſgreſſions, and extortions.

3. That all perſons, from that day forward, ſhould have full liberty to buy and ſell in every county, city, borough, fair, market, and other place, within the realm of England.

4. That no acre of land held in bondage or ſervice, ſhould hold it for more than four-pence; and if it had been held for leſs in former times, it ſhould not be enhanced in future.

The king having heard theſe, and ſeveral other demands, complied with them all, on condition of their immediate return to their own habitations, leaving a few of each pariſh, to receive the charters of freedom, which were drawn up with all expedition, and ſealed the next morning.

This body, having carried their point, immediately diſperſed, and returned to their reſpective habitations; but in the mean time the third diviſion of the rioters, which were encamped on Tower-hill, found means to enter the Tower, notwithſtanding it was garriſoned by ſix hundred men at arms, and the ſame number of experienced archers, who had been placed there to defend the perſon of the king.

The inſurgents having thus obtained entrance into the Tower, (while the king was gone to the party at Mile-end) they entered the royal apartments, abuſed every perſon at their pleaſure, kiſſed the queen-mother, and having ſeized the archbiſhop of Canterbury and Sir Robert Hales, they dragged them out of the Tower and beheaded them.

Many arguments were uſed by the archbiſhop, to prevail on them not to embrue their hands in the blood of innocent men; but finding it in vain to remonſtrate, he chearfully ſubmitted his neck to the axe; but no leſs than eight ſtrokes were given before his head was ſevered from his body; after which the latter remained ſome hours before it was buried, and the former was carried to London-bridge, where it was fixed upon a pole.

During theſe tranſactions, Wat Tyler and his followers committed the moſt dreadful outrages and cruelties in the cities of London and Weſtminſter, murdering many eminent citizens, and in particular, wreaking their vengeance on the Flemiſh merchants.

They likewiſe broke open the priſons of Newgate and the Fleet, releaſed all that were confined, ſet fire to the city in ſeveral places, and made public proclamation for the beheading all lawyers, and perſons belonging to the exchequer.

The king having returned from Mile-end to the Tower, found his mother and ſome of his faithful counſellors had retired to the wardrobe for ſafety; where his majeſty having informed them of the ſucceſs of his negotiation at Mile-end, it was reſolved to propoſe the ſame terms to the reſt of the inſurgents.

In conſequence of this determination no leſs than three different plans of accommodation were ſent to, and rejected by Wat Tyler; and from what follows it will appear that he had no intention of complying with any terms of pacification.

Hereupon Sir John Newton was ſent to invite Tyler to a conference with the king in Smithfield, in order that ſuch articles as he demanded might be inſerted in the charter to be granted by his majeſty: one of which conditions was "that he "(Tyler) ſhould have a commiſſion to behead "all lawyers, eſcheators, and others, whoſoever "were learned in the law, or had any communi-"cation therewith;" that all the nation might receive their laws from his mouth only, as he had been heard to boaſt ſome days before.

After ſome debate, Tyler conſented to follow Sir John to the appointed place, and proceeded ſlowly at the head of his army; but as ſoon as he came within ſight of the king, he directed his confederates to keep at a diſtance, till he ſhould give them a ſignal, whereupon they were to murder all the company, except the king himſelf, who was to be ſeized and impriſoned.

This being agreed on, Tyler ſet ſpur to his horſe, galloped forward, and did not ſtop till he came cloſe to the king, whom he addreſſed in the following terms: "Sir king, ſeeſt thou all yon-"der people?"—"Yea truly," replied the king, "wherefore ſayeſt thou ſo?"—"Becauſe," ſaid

he, "they be all at my command, and have "ſworn to me their faith and truth, to do all "that I would have them." — "In good time," replied the king, "I believe it well."— "Then," ſaid Tyler, "believeſt thou, king, "that theſe people, and as many more as be in "London at my command, will depart from thee "thus, without having thy letters?"—"No," ſaid the king, "they be ordained for you, and "ſhall be delivered to every one of them."

At the time the king made this reply, Tyler obſerving Sir John Newton, who carried his majeſty's ſword, on horſeback, told him it would become him better to be on foot in his preſence: to which Sir John replying, that he thought there was no impropriety in his preſent ſituation, Tyler was ſo incenſed, that he called him traitor, and drew his dagger, with an intention to ſtab him.

Newton likewiſe drew his dagger, and gave Tyler the lie; on which the latter demanded the ſword which was carried by Sir John; but he replied, "No, it is the king's ſword, of which "thou art not worthy: neither durſt thou aſk it of me if we had been by ourſelves."

This reply ſo enraged Tyler, that he ſwore he would not eat till he had deſtroyed Sir John; and was abſolutely preparing to attack him, when the king commanded the knight to diſmount, to prevent any fatal conſequences.

During Tyler's conference with the king, he demanded, excluſive of all that had been granted to the inſurgents at Mile-end, that all the ancient laws of the kingdom ſhould be aboliſhed, and that all foreſts, parks and warrens ſhould be free to the poor as well as the rich.

Tyler, at length, behaved with ſo much inſolence, that the king's attendants told his majeſty, that the conduct of the traitor was not leſs dangerous than intolerable: they therefore adviſed that he might be arreſted on the ſpot, which the king complied with, though he dreaded the conſequence.

As the ſpot on which they were was within the juriſdiction of London, the king commanded William Walworth, the mayor, to arreſt Tyler; which the gallant magiſtrate was willing enough to do; for boldly riding up to him, he ſtruck him with his ſword ſo violent a blow on the head as brought him to the ground; and Sir John Sandwich, with others, haſtening to Walworth's aſſiſtance, he was quickly diſpatched.

Tyler's followers ſeeing him fall, cried out, "Our captain is ſlain! revenge! revenge!" and bent their bows for that purpoſe: nor can it be thought but that the king and his adherents muſt inſtantly have fallen a ſacrifice to the power of ſuperior numbers, had it not been for the admirable courage and preſence of mind which Richard diſplayed on this occaſion.

The young monarch having commanded his attendants to ſtop, advanced by himſelf towards the enraged multitude, and addreſſing them with a chearful yet reſolute air; "What, my friends, "(ſaid he) will you kill your king?—Be not "troubled for the loſs of your leader; I will be "your captain; follow me; I will grant all your "reaſonable deſires."

The inſurgents were ſo ſtruck with the death of their leader, and the magnanimity of their ſovereign, that, without heſitation, they marched under his conduct into St. George's Fields; and before they could recollect themſelves, Sir Robert Knowles appeared at the head of a thouſand citizens, who had been collected together, and completely armed, by the vigilance of Walworth, immediately after the death of Wat Tyler.

The nobility and gentry reſiding in the remoter counties of England, had no ſooner heard of this terrible inſurrection, than they armed their friends and vaſſals, and haſtened to London, ſo that the king ſoon found himſelf at the head of an army of forty thouſand men.

The inſurgents, awed by the ſight of the troops, and allured by the promiſe of a general pardon, as well as of charters ſimilar to thoſe already granted to their companions, inſtantly laid down their arms, and ſubmitted to the mercy of their ſovereign.

Thus ended an inſurrection, which threatened greater danger to this kingdom than any before or ſince; if we may judge from the confeſſion of a perſon called Jack Straw, who was next in command to Wat Tyler; and who, after the death of his leader, endeavoured to conceal himſelf in London; but being taken in an eating houſe, a few days after the inſurrection was ſuppreſſed, was tried before the Lord-mayor, and received ſentence of death.

The following is the ſubſtance of the confeſſion made by Jack Straw, a ſhort time before he was executed: "That when they aſſembled at Black-"heath, and ſent to the king to come to them, "they had reſolved to have killed all his attend-"ants, and carried him along with them where-"ſoever they went, that the populace might "with the greater aſſurance join them; and "when, by the help of the king's preſence, ſuf-"ficient numbers had got together in the ſeveral "counties of England, they were to have mur-"dered all thoſe from whom they could expect "reſiſtance, the nobility and gentry, and at laſt "the king, with all the clergy, both regular and "ſecular, except only the friars mendicants, "whom they thought were ſufficient for the ce-"lebration of divine ſervice through the king-"dom. Theſe things being performed, they "would have made ſuch laws as they judged "proper for the government of the people. "Wat Tyler was to have been made king of "Kent, and the other ringleaders of the rebels "were to have been appointed kings over the "other counties, each being to be made a diſtinct "kingdom: and in the evening of that day "whereon Tyler was killed, they were to have "been joined by the London rabble, when they "were to have ſacked and burnt the city."

The peace of the city was no ſooner reſtored, than the head of the archbiſhop was taken down from London bridge, and thoſe of Tyler and Straw, with ſome of their aſſociates, fixed up in the ſame place.

The king, determined to reward the ſervices which his faithful citizens of London had done, towards ſuppreſſing the late dangerous inſurrection, granted a fee-farm of one hundred pounds per annum to William Walworth the mayor, and forty pounds each on John Philpot, Nicholas Brembre, and Robert Laund, aldermen; and likewiſe conferred the honour of knighthood on each of the above-mentioned gentlemen.

It is the opinion of many writers that the dagger in the arms of the city of London was granted at this period, in commemoration of Wat Tyler's having received from the ſword or dagger of the mayor the blow which was the prelude to his death.

Lewdneſs puniſhed by the mayor of London. Victuallers rendered incapable of ſerving the office of mayor. Fiſhmongers company disfranchiſed. Letter of king Richard II. confirming the privileges of the conſtable of the Tower of London. A petition of the parliament for confirming the charters of the city. The Lord-mayor's proclamation of the charter of confirmation. Northampton, the late mayor's riot and puniſhment. Choice of common-councilmen by the ſeveral Wards. The ſheriffs of London ſworn before the barons of the exchequer. The privileges of the conſtable of the Tower confirmed.

SIR William Walworth was ſucceeded as chief magiſtrate of this city by John Northampton, who obſerving that the biſhops and inferior clergy permitted licentious and debauched perſons to go on in their irregular courſe of life, without reſtraint, he took the reformation of theſe abuſes into his own hands, and ſeverely puniſhed all ſuch as were found guilty of whoredom, cauſing the common proſtitutes to be carried through the ſtreets with their heads ſhaved, and with pipes and trumpets ſounding before them.

This proceeding of the mayor gave great offence to the clergy, who looking upon it as an infringement of their authority, enjoined him to deſiſt; but he, equally regardleſs of their commands or threatnings, proceeded to reform theſe abuſes to the utmoſt of his power.

This ſame magiſtrate procured an act of parliament, by which it was ordained that "no victualler ſhould exerciſe any judicial office in "London, or in any other city, borough, ſea-"port, or town in the kingdom, except in ſuch "towns where no other perſon could be found "qualified for ſuch an office;" in which caſe every ſuch perſon was to "abſtain from the ex-"erciſe of ſuch trade, during the time of his "office, upon pain of forfeiting all the victuals "he ſhould ſell during that time."

According to the meaning of this act, all butchers, grocers, and fiſhmongers, were rendered incapable of ſerving the office of mayor, as they were deemed victuallers.

By the management of Northampton an act of parliament was likewiſe procured, by which the trade of the fiſhmongers was laid open, ſo that all foreigners in friendſhip with the king of England, were permitted to ſell fiſh in London and elſewhere, either by wholeſale or retail; by which the fiſhmonger's company became one of the pooreſt in this city, though it had been one of the moſt flouriſhing.

In the year 1382, king Richard II. ſent a letter to the mayor and commonalty of London, confirming the privileges of the Tower of London; which we have recited at large, not only as it is a valuable piece of antiquity, but becauſe we ſhall have occaſion to give a particular account of the ſaid Tower in the next chapter of this work.

"Richard, by the grace of God, king of Eng-"land and France, and lord of Ireland, to the "mayor and ſheriffs of London ſendeth greeting. "Foraſmuch as we have underſtood, that the con-"ſtables of our Tower of London, time out of "mind, even to the time now laſt paſt, and in "particular John Darcy, John de Beaucamp, "Robert de Morle, Richard de Vache, and Alan "de Buxhill, hitherto conſtables of the ſaid "Tower, have had the cuſtoms, pence, and pro-"fits underwritten, by right belonging to the "foreſaid Tower; and in quiet manner taking "them by themſelves, or their ſervants; to wit, "of every boat loaden with ruſhes, brought to "the ſaid city, ſuch a quantity of ruſhes, to be "laid upon Tower-wharf, as may be contained "within a man's arm: of every boat accuſtomed "to bring oyſters, muſcles, and cockles, to the "foreſaid city, one maund, thence to be brought "and laid upon the ſaid wharf: from every ſhip "laden with wines, coming from Bourdeaux, or "elſewhere, unto the ſaid city, one flagon be-"fore the maſt, and another behind the maſt: "whatſoever ſhip, barge, or boat, or other veſ-"ſel, which ſhall go looſe by reaſon of ſtorm or "wind, or the ropes and cordage being broken, "ſhall float from London-bridge to Graveſend, "or from thence to the ſaid bridge, to be taken "by the conſtable of the ſaid Tower, or his ſer-"vants, and to be applied to the uſe of the ſaid "conſtable: what ſwans ſoever coming under "the ſaid bridge towards the ſea, or from the ſea "towards the ſaid bridge: all manner of horſes, "cows, oxen, hogs, and ſheep, which have fallen "from the ſaid bridge into the water of Thames, "which the foreſaid conſtable, or ſervants, may "take: any ſuch like creature ſwimming through "the middle of the ſaid bridge to the foreſaid "Tower, which the ſame conſtable or his ſer-"vants aforeſaid have taken: of every foot of "ſuch like creature feeding within the ditch of the foreſaid

" foreſaid Tower, one penny: every cart, empty " or laden, which ſhall fall into the aforeſaid " ditches, as forfeiture or fee of the conſtable: " and that the foreſaid conſtables, as well thoſe " afore-named, as others, have uſed and enjoyed " the uſages underwritten, from the time before- " ſaid; to wit, that no cart, empty or laden, " which ſhall fall into the foreſaid ditches, as " forfeiture or fee of the conſtable, and that the " foreſaid conſtables, as well thoſe afore-named " as others, have uſed and enjoyed the uſages " underwritten, from the time beforeſaid; to " wit, that no cart, empty or laden, ought " to come from the end of the ſtreet called " Petty-wales, upon the ſaid Tower-hill, nor near " the foreſaid ditch, to the high ſtreet, called " Tower-ſtreet, unleſs it be taken and brought " within the ſaid Tower; and that no cart ſhall " paſs beyond the bridge, between the ditch of " the ſaid caſtle and the ditch of the hoſpital of " St. Catharine's, without the licence of the con- " ſtable of the ſaid Tower; and if it do, and " break the bar, that cart ought to be brought " within the ſaid Tower, and to make ſatisfaction " for the tranſgreſſion, according to the ſaid " conſtable's will; We, willing to maintain all " and ſingular the rights and liberties of our " Tower aforeſaid, that they periſh not, or be " unlawfully taken away, command you, that " you permit our beloved and loyal Sir Thomas " Murrieux, our conſtable of the Tower, to take " and have the cuſtoms, pence and profits, by " himſelf and his ſervants, in form aforeſaid, and " to uſe and enjoy the foreſaid uſages freely, with- " out any impediment, as he ought to take and " have ſuch cuſtoms, pence and profits, and to " uſe and enjoy the aforeſaid uſages, as he and " all other conſtables of the ſaid Tower have " reaſonably accuſtomed to take and have thoſe " cuſtoms, pence and profits, and to uſe and en- " joy the foreſaid uſages, from the time afore- " ſaid; and that by no means ye neglect this. " Witneſs myſelf at Eltham, the ſixteenth day " of November, in the ſixth year of our reign.

" By the king."

The citizens of London conſidered this grant as a violation of their ancient rights and privileges, and therefore applied to the king, through the mediation of the next parliament, for a confirmation of all their rights, liberties, free-cuſtoms, ordinances, &c. and were ſucceſsful enough to obtain their requeſt.

In the year 1383, the houſe of commons, apprehenſive that the ancient government of the city might be again infringed, as in many former inſtances it had been, by the crown; petitioned the king for a confirmation of the liberties of the ſaid city; which petition is recorded in French, of which the following is a faithful tranſlation.

" The commons in this preſent parliament aſ- " ſembled pray, for the greater quiet and nouriſh- " ing of the peace amongſt your liege ſubjects, " and for common benefit, that your citizens of " your city of London be entirely in this preſent " parliament reſtored to their franchiſes and free " uſages, and that it may pleaſe your highneſs, " of your ſpecial grace, to grant and confirm to " your ſaid citizens, and to their ſucceſſors, by " your letters patents, all their liberties and free " uſages, as entire and full as they or their pre- " deceſſors have enjoyed at any time by the fa- " vour of your noble progenitors, with the clauſe " of Licet uſi non fuerint, vel abuſi fuerint; (i. e. " whether the ſame were not uſed, or ever abuſed;) " in like manner with the franchiſes, which they " enjoy by your own moſt gracious charter, and " are confirmed: any ſtatutes, judgments, ſur- " renders, ordinances, or any charters or grants " of your majeſty, or your progenitors aforeſaid, " in time paſt made and granted, to the contrary " notwithſtanding, &c."

To this petition his majeſty anſwered, " Le Rio le veut;" that is, " ſo the king willeth:" and in conſequence of the royal aſſent, a charter paſſed in that ſame parliament, reciting the ſeveral charters of confirmation, and others paſſed by king Edward the ſecond, Edward the third, and Henry the third, as well as a charter of confirmation, granted by Richard himſelf, in the firſt year of his reign.

Soon after the paſſing of this charter, the ſame was, by command of the king, fully ſet forth and publiſhed, in a proclamation of Sir Nicholas Brembre, lord mayor; which proclamation being carefully preſerved among the records of this city, as an affair of the higheſt importance to poſterity, we have ſubjoined a faithful tranſlation thereof, from the original latin.

A proclamation made in the mayoralty of Nicholas Brembre, knight, mayor, on Friday after the feaſt of the B. V. Mary, and in the ſeventh year of the reign of Richard II. concerning the liberties lately granted to the citizens of London, by the lord the king in his parliament, and alſo concerning certain ancient liberties renewed by the lord the king, and newly confirmed to the ſaid citizens by his royal charter.

" It is proclaimed on the part of the lord our " king, and of the mayor of the city of London, " by virtue of the confirmation and conceſſion " made by the ſaid lord the king, concerning " the liberties and ancient cuſtoms of the ſaid " city, as well by charters of the kings of Eng- " land, granted unto them, as without charters, " that it may be made known to all foreigners " concerning the following liberties of the ſaid " citizens, eſpecially touching the ſaid foreigners, " as the citizens of the city aforeſaid.

" So that no ſummons, attachments on execu- " tions, be made by any miniſters or officers of " the lord the king, or of his heirs, either with " or without a warrant, within the liberties of the " city aforeſaid, but by the officers of the city " only.

" Alſo the ſame lord our king hath, out of " his ſpecial grace, by his charter granted and " confirmed, as will fully appear by having re- " courſe to the ſaid charters and letters, the gifts, " grants, confirmations, innovations, and the " ordinances aforeſaid; and alſo all the articles,

" and

" and all other and every thing contained, recited, " and explained in all the charters and letters, as " well of him the lord the king, as any of his " progenitors; ratifying and granting all and each " thereof, at the inſtance and requeſt of the " commons of the realm of England in his laſt " parliament, for the nouriſhing greater quiet " and peace among his liege ſubjects, and for " the public good, and by and with the aſſent of " the prelates, lords, nobility, and great men, " aſſiſting him in the ſaid parliament, for him- " ſelf and his heirs, as much as in him lies, " to the citizens of the foreſaid city, and to " their heirs and ſucceſſors, citizens of the ſame " city.

" Alſo the ſame our lord the king has further " granted, at the inſtance and requeſt as afore- " ſaid, and by the aſſent aforeſaid, and alſo by " his own charters confirmed, for himſelf and " his heirs aforeſaid, that the foreſaid citizens " and their ſucceſſors, citizens of the city afore- " ſaid, ſhall be as entirely and fully reſtored to all " their liberties and free-cuſtoms, as ever they or " their predeceſſors have at any time more freely " and fully enjoyed the ſame under the predeceſ- " ſors of him the lord the king.

" Alſo the ſame lord our king, willeth, that, " though the ſame citizens, or their predeceſſors, " citizens of the city aforeſaid, have not on any " occaſion whatſoever, hitherto fully uſed any " or either of the liberties, acquittances, grants, " ordinances, articles, or free-cuſtoms, or other " things granted in the ſaid charters or letters, " or perhaps, have abuſed any or all of the ac- " quittances, grants, ordinances, articles, or " free-cuſtoms, or any other things in the ſame " charters or letters, as aforeſaid, contained; " nevertheleſs the ſame citizens, their heirs and " ſucceſſors, citizens of the city aforeſaid, may " for the future fully enjoy and uſe all and ſin- " gular the liberties, acquittances, ordinances, " articles, grants, free-cuſtoms, and whatſoever " elſe is contained in the ſame charters and letters " aforeſaid, whether the ſame were not uſed, or " perhaps abuſed, and every one of them, with- " out let or impediment, of the ſame the lord " the king, or of his heirs, juſtices, eſcheators, " ſheriffs, or of any other his bailiffs or miniſters " whomſoever; any ſtatutes or ordinances pub- " liſhed, or judgments given, or any charters of " the ſame the lord the king, or his progenitors " aforeſaid, in times paſt made and granted, to " the contrary notwithſtanding."

The citizens of London in general, and the company of fiſhmongess in particular were extremely gratified by this inſtance of the royal favour, whereby all their ancient rights and privileges were reſtored, except that of holding courts; all affairs being to be determined in the mayor's court, in conformity to the late charter.

Soon after this, John Northampton, the late mayor, who appears to have been a man of a very turbulent diſpoſition, raiſed great tumults in the city, by aſſembling large numbers of people, and walking through the ſtreets in a riotous manner.

Brembre, the preſent mayor, exerted all his authority to prevent any ill conſequences that might ariſe from theſe irregularities; and in the neceſſary exertion of this authority, one Conſtantine, a ſhoe-maker, being apprehended for encouraging the populace to eſpouſe the cauſe of Northampton, was immediately carried before the magiſtrates at Guild-hall, where he was tried and convicted, partly on his own confeſſion, and partly on the evidence of others, and beheaded ſoon afterwards.

About the ſame time Northampton was impeached by his own chaplain of being the principal actor in the late ſedition, and of conſpiring againſt the king and government; and being carried before a convention of the nobility at Reading, he was ſentenced to be impriſoned for life, and all his effects to be appropriated to the king's uſe; which ſentence was carried into execution by his impriſonment in the caſtle of Tintagel in Cornwall.

The peace of the city being again reſtored, its inhabitants began to think of eſtabliſhing a reſpectable common-council; and at a common hall aſſembled for this purpoſe, petitions were preſented to the mayor, ſetting forth, that " for " want of ſufficient perſons choſen, divers things " were paſſed in the common-council, more by " clamour than reaſon."

To remedy this grievance for the future, ſeveral articles were propoſed to be tried, and if found uſeful and neceſſary, to be confirmed: one of which articles was, that the common-council might conſiſt of ſufficient people; and it was determined that, for the future, four perſons ſhould be choſen out of each ward, under the inſpection of the alderman, to repreſent the ſaid ward in the court of common-council.

This appears to have been a very excellent regulation; becauſe, in former times, the members of the common council had been choſen by perſons profeſſing certain myſteries, or crafts, and not by the inhabitants of the reſpective wards.

Soon after this eſtabliſhment, Nicholas Brembre, then mayor, prevailed on the members of the common-council, to turn out almoſt all the aldermen, and to elect new ones in their room: a proceeding which ſeems to have been encouraged, if not propoſed, by the court; for the new elections were confirmed by a warrant from the king, dated the eighth of March, which was the very day on which the election of the new aldermen took place.

As this new method of electing the members of the common-council was thought to advance the good government of the city, the mayor, aldermen, and common council, did on the thirty firſt of July, 1384, make the following order reſpecting the choice and time of meeting of the common-council, viz. " That they " ſhould be choſen by the wards, fifteen days " after St. Gregory; and that the inhabitants " ſhould chuſe thoſe who had ſerved the year " before, or others: and, that the common- " council ſhould be aſſembled once a quarter, " or oftener, to conſult and take care of the af- " fairs of the city."

In the year 1385, Hammon Godcheap, and William de Buddle, having been elected ſheriffs, were were preſented to the mayor and aldermen, to the treaſurer and barons of the exchequer, who required them to take an oath for their good behaviour in the ſaid office.

Hereupon, John Gyſors, the mayor, replied, that "the perſons preſented by them to that office, were not obliged, nor ought they, to take an oath, concerning the exerciſe of their office any where but before the mayor and aldermen of the city; and that ſince the firſt conceſſion made to the citizens, of chuſing the ſheriffs of London and Middleſex, and of diſcharging them at pleaſure, it had not been known that ever any ſuch oath had been taken, except once, when the city was ſeized into the hands of Edward the firſt."

For theſe reaſons the mayor and aldermen, in the name of the city, deſired that "the ſaid Hammon and William might be admitted to the ſaid office, upon their preſentation, according to cuſtom."

This plea however, notwithſtanding its reaſonableneſs, had no weight with the barons, who would not permit the ſheriffs to execute their office, without taking the oath; though at the ſame time they did not pretend to invalidate the election.

Soon after this, the citizens received another mortification, not inferior to the former; for notwithſtanding the late confirmation of the city privileges, the conſtable of the Tower continued to demand the cuſtoms and profits annexed to his office in the ſixth year of this king's reign.

The citizens conceived this practice to be highly prejudicial to the city; and therefore determined to petition the king for a revocation of the grant: but ſo far from obtaining redreſs, they had the mortification to find that the grant was confirmed by the king and parliament, as will appear by the following recital.

"We, with the advice and aſſent of the prelates and other noblemen in our parliament, have graciouſly conſented on our part to the foreſaid ſupplication of the conſtable, according to his petition. And therefore we command you, that on your part ye take care that all and ſingular the liberties and franchiſes belonging to our ſaid Tower be publiſhed, proclaimed, and pronounced diſtinctly within your city aforeſaid, and its ſuburbs, in ſuch places as ſhall be moſt proper: and that we will, that our ſaid Tower may enjoy and uſe the liberties and franchiſes aforeſaid in the form aforeſaid; the liberties and franchiſes granted by us to the ſaid citizens and the commonalty notwithſtanding: and that ye permit the ſaid conſtable to have and receive, by himſelf or by his ſervants, the rights and profits aforeſaid, belonging unto the ſaid Tower. Witneſs myſelf at Weſtminſter, the twenty-ſecond of November, in the ninth year of our reign."

Notwithſtanding this, the privileges of the conſtable of the Tower furniſhed a conſtant ſource of contention for a long ſpace of time afterwards, till, in the reign of king James the firſt, that monarch determined the affair in favour of the city of London.

As this leads us, with great propriety, to treat of the Tower; we ſhall, in the next chapter, give a full and particular account of that ancient fortreſs; agreeable to the plan we have hitherto purſued, of compleating our deſcriptions of particular parts of this city, wherever thoſe deſcriptions can be introduced with the greateſt propriety.

CHAPTER XIX.

A conciſe hiſtorical view of the Tower of London. Of its foundation, increaſe, and preſent ſtate. Its government, cuſtoms, and privileges. Its antiquities and records. Of the lions and other wild beaſts. Of the ſpoils of the Spaniſh Armada. Of the ſmall armory, the royal train of artillery, and the horſe armory. Of the jewel office, and the regalia uſed at the coronation of the king's of England. Particulars of colonel Blood's attempt to ſteal the crown. Account of the mint, with its officers and the manner of ſtamping money. An account of the office of ordnance, with a liſt of its officers.

THE Tower of London, which is ſituated on the eaſt-ſide of the city, near the bank of the river Thames, was anciently a royal palace, and conſiſted of no more than what is now called the white Tower, which was built by William the conqueror, to over-awe the citizens, and ſecure to himſelf a ſafe retreat, in caſe of neceſſity.

In the year 1098, during the reign of William Rufus, ſon to William the conqueror, it was ſurrounded with walls, and fortified with a deep ditch, which is, in ſome places, no leſs than one hundred and twenty feet wide.

Henry I. built the lions tower for the reception of the foreign animals preſented to him by the emperor Frederic; and from this time it has ſerved to accommodate the beaſts, birds, &c. preſented to the kings of England.

In the year 1240, Henry III. ordered a ſtone gate, bulwark, and ſome other additions to be made to this fortreſs; and the outſide wall of the ſquare Tower to be whitened, from whence it obtained the appellation of the white Tower.

The church of St. Peter ad Vincula, within the Tower was built by king Edward III. and in the year 1465 the fortifications of this place were greatly enlarged by Edward IV.

In the year 1638 the white Tower was rebuilt; and after the reſtoration of Charles II. it was thoroughly repaired, and a great number of additional buildings made to it; ſo that the Tower of London has at preſent more the appearance of a town than a fortreſs.

The Tower is ſeparated from the river Thames by a narrow ditch and a convenient wharf, to which it has a communication by a draw-bridge, for the readier iſſuing and receiving ammunition, and naval or military ſtores.

On this wharf, there is lately made a long and beautiful plat-form, on which are planted ſixty-one pieces of cannon, mounted on new and very elegant iron carriages. The pieces of ordnance are chiefly uſed to fire on the days of ſtate, or to promulgate any joyful news to the public.

Parrellel to the wharf, within the walls, is a platform 70 yards in length, called the ladies line, becauſe much frequented by the ladies in the ſummer, as within it is ſhaded with a lofty row of trees, and without it has a delightful proſpect of the ſhipping, with boats paſſing and repaſſing on the river Thames.

You aſcend this line by ſtone ſteps, and being once upon it you may walk almoſt round the walls of the Tower without interruption, and in your courſe will paſs three batteries; the firſt called the Devil's battery, where is alſo a platform on which are mounted ſeven pieces of cannon, tho' on the battery itſelf are only five; the next is called the ſtone battery, and is defended by eight pieces of cannon; and the third and laſt is called the wooden battery, mounted with ſix pieces of cannon, all nine pounders.

The chief entrance into the Tower is by a gate to the weſt, large enough to admit coaches and heavy carriages; but theſe are firſt admitted through an outer gate, and muſt paſs a ſtout ſtone bridge, built over the ditch, before they can approach the main entrance. There is beſide an entrance for perſons on foot, over the draw-bridge, to the wharf, which wharf is only divided from the main land by gates at each end, opened every day at a certain hour for the convenience of a free intercourſe between the reſpective inhabitants of the Tower, the city, and its ſuburbs.

Beſides theſe entrances there is a water-gate, commonly called Traitor's gate, through which it has been cuſtomary to convey traitors, and other ſtate priſoners, to or from the Tower, perhaps for greater privacy, and which is ſeldom opened on any other occaſion; but the lords committed to the Tower on account of the late rebellion were publicly admitted at the main entrance.

Over this gate is a regular building, terminated at each end by two baſtions, or round towers, on which are embraſures for pointing cannon, but there are at preſent none mounted. In this building are placed the infirmary, the mill, and waterworks that ſupply the Tower with water.

At the opening and ſhutting the principal gate night and morning, there is a great deal of ceremony uſed; of which the following is a deſcription. A little before ſix in the morning in ſummer, and as ſoon as it is light in the winter, the yeoman porter goes to the governor's houſe for the keys, from whence he proceeds to the innermoſt gate, attended by a ſerjeant and ſix men of the main guard; this gate being opened to let them paſs, is again ſhut, while the yeoman porter and the guard proceed to open the three outermoſt gates, at each of which the guards reſt their firelocks, as do the ſpur-guard while the keys paſs and repaſs.

When the yeoman porter returns to the innermoſt gate, he calls to the wardens in waiting, to take in king George's keys; upon which the gate is opened, and the keys lodged in the warders hall till the time of locking, which is uſually about ten or eleven at night, with the ſame formality as when opened.

After they are ſhut, the yeoman and guard proceed to the main guard, who are all under arms with the officers upon duty at their head. The uſual challenge from the main guard to the yeoman porter is, Who comes there? His anſwer is, The keys. The challenger ſays, Paſs keys; upon which the officer orders the guard to reſt their firelocks; the yeoman porter then ſays, God ſave king George. Amen, is loudly anſwered by all the guard.

The yeoman porter with his guard proceeds, from the main-guard, to the governor's, where the keys are left; after which no perſon can go out or come in upon any pretence whatſoever till next morning, without the watch-word for the night, which is kept ſo ſecret, that none but the proper officers and the ſerjeant upon guard, ever come to the knowledge of it; for it is the ſame on the ſame night in every fortified place throughout the king's dominions.

When the watch-word is given by any ſtranger to the centinel at the ſpur-guard (or outer-gate) he communicates it to his ſerjeant, who paſſes it to the next on duty, and ſo on till it comes to the governor, or commanding officer, by whom the keys are delivered to the yeoman porter, who attends as before; the main-guard being put under arms, brings them to the outer gate, where the ſtranger is admitted, and conducted to the commandant. Having made known his buſineſs, he is conducted to the outer-gate, diſmiſſed, the gate ſhut, and the keys re-delivered with all the formality above deſcribed.

The conſtable of the Tower is the principal officer to whom the care of this fortreſs is committed; and he is uſually of the higheſt quality, as his poſt at all coronations and other ſtate ceremonies is of the utmoſt conſequence, having the crown and other regalia in his cuſtody. He hath under him a lieutenant and a deputy-lieutenant, commonly called governor, whoſe offices are likewiſe of great dignity, a tower-major, gentleman porter, yeoman porter, gentleman gaoler, four-quarter gunners, and forty wardens, whoſe uniform is the ſame with the king's yeomen of the guard.

Upon their heads they wear round flat-crowned caps, caps, tied round with bands of party-coloured ribbands: their coats are of a particular make, but very becoming, with large ſleeves and flowing ſkirts, and are of fine ſcarlet cloth, laced round the edges and ſeams with ſeveral rows of gold lace, and girt round their waiſts with a broad laced girdle. Upon their breaſts and backs they wear the king's ſilver badge, repreſenting the thiſtle and roſe, on which are the letters G. R. in capitals.

Beſides theſe, and other inferior officers, there is always a battalion of foot guards on duty quartered in barracks, which have been lately rebuilt. The principal buildings within the walls are the church, the white Tower, the offices of ordnance, of the mint, of the keepers of the records, the jewel office, the horſe-armory, the grand ſtore-houſe, the new or ſmall armory, handſome houſes for the chief officers reſiding in the Tower, with many other houſes for the inferior officers, and barracks for ſoldiers on duty, beſides priſons for ſtate-delinquents, which are commonly the warders houſes.

As the church has nothing worth a particular obſervation belonging to it, we ſhall not detain the reader by deſcribing it: but only remark, that it is famous for being the burial place of the following perſons of eminence.

John Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, who was beheaded on Tower-hill, the 22d. of June, 1535.
George Bullen, lord Rochford, beheaded on the 17th of May, 1536.
Anna Bullen, beheaded on the 19th of May, 1536.
Thomas Cromwell, earl of Eſſex, beheaded in the year 1540.
Catherine Howard, beheaded February the 13th 1541.
Edward Seymour, duke of Somerſet, beheaded January the 24th, 1552.
John Dudley, duke of Northumberland, beheaded on the 22d. of Auguſt, 1553; and James Scott, duke of Monmouth, ſon of Charles II. beheaded on the 15th of July, 1685, for aſſerting his right to the crown, againſt James the ſecond.
Beſides theſe, within the rails of the altar, were depoſited the remains of the infamous judge Jeffries, who died of grief, in the Tower, towards the end of the year 1688.

The white Tower is a large ſquare irregular building, ſituated almoſt in the center, no one ſide anſwering to another, nor are any of its watch towers, of which there are four that ornament the top, built alike: one of theſe towers is now converted into an obſervatory, and indeed ſeems well adapted to that uſe.

The building itſelf conſiſts of three very lofty ſtories, under which are moſt ſpacious and commodious vaults, chiefly filled with ſalt-petre. It is covered at top with flat leads, from whence there is an extenſive and noble proſpect of the ſhipping in the Thames, and the adjacent country.

In the firſt ſtory are two ſpacious rooms, one of which is a ſmall armory for the ſea-ſervice, having various ſorts of arms very curiouſly laid up in it, for more than 10,000 ſeamen. In the other room are cloſets and preſſes in abundance, all filled with warlike tools and inſtruments of death without number. Over theſe are two other floors, one filled principally with arms; the other with arms and armorers tools; ſuch as cheveaux de frize, pick-axes, ſpades and ſhovels.

In the upper ſtory is kept match, ſheep-ſkins, tanned hides, &c. And in a little room ſome records, containing the antient uſages and privileges of the place. In this tower are likewiſe kept models of the new invented engines of deſtruction, that have from time to time been preſented to the government.

On the top of this tower is a large ciſtern or reſervoir for ſupplying the whole garriſon with water in caſe of need; it is about ſeven feet deep, nine in breadth, and about ſixty in length, and is filled from the Thames by means of an engine very ingeniouſly contrived for that purpoſe.

The office of ordnance is kept in Cold Harbor; to which office all other offices for ſupplying artillery, arms, ammunition, or other warlike ſtores to any part of his majeſty's dominions, are accountable; from which office are iſſued all orders for the diſpoſition of warlike materials for every kind of ſervice.

The mint is alſo a ſeparate diviſion, which comprehends near one third of the Tower, and contains houſes for all the officers belonging to the coinage; of this, as well as of the office of ordnance, a particular account will follow in their proper places.

The office of keeper of the records is oppoſite the platform already deſcribed. It has lately been adorned with a fine carved ſtone door-caſe at the entrance, and finely wainſcotted within. All the rolls from king John to the beginning of the reign of Richard III. are depoſited in fifty-ſix wainſcot preſſes in this office; thoſe ſince that time are kept at the rolls in Chancery-lane.

The rolls and records kept in the Tower contain the ancient tenures of all the lands in England, with a ſurvey of the manors; the originals of all laws and ſtatutes; the rights of England to the dominion of the Britiſh ſeas; leagues and treaties with foreign princes; the atchievements of England in foreign wars; antient grants of our kings to their ſubjects; the forms of ſubmiſſion of the Scottiſh kings; writs and proceedings of the courts of common law and equity; the ſettlement of Ireland as to law and dominion; privileges and immunities granted to all cities and corporations during the period before mentioned; with many other important records; all regularly diſpoſed by the diligence of Sir William Dugdale, and others under his direction, and properly referred to in near a thouſand folio indexes. The price of ſearching here is half a guinea, for which you may peruſe any one ſubject a year. In the months of December, January, and February, this office is open only ſix, but all the reſt of the year eight hours in a day.

The jewel-office is a dark ſtrong ſtone room, about twenty yards to the eaſtward of the grand ſtore-houſe. The regalia kept in this office will be ſpoken of when we come to treat of the curioſities within the tower.

The horſe-armory is a little eaſtward of the White Tower. It is a plain brick building, rather ther convenient than elegant. Its contents are likewiſe among the curioſities commonly ſhewn at the Tower, and will be diſtinctly deſcribed hereafter.

The grand ſtore-houſe is a noble building to the northward of the White Tower, and extends in length 245 feet, in breadth 60. It was begun by king James II. and by that prince built to the firſt floor, but finiſhed by king William, who erected that magnificent room called the New or Small Armory, in which he, with queen Mary his conſort, on its being finiſhed, dined in great form, having all the warrant workmen and labourers to attend them, dreſſed in white gloves and aprons, the uſual badges of the order of free-maſonry. This noble ſtructure is of brick and ſtone, and on the north ſide is a ſtately door-caſe adorned with four columns, an entablature, and triangular pediment of the dorick order. Under the pediment are the king's arms, with enrichments of trophy work very ornamental.

The other buildings within the Tower having nothing remarkable, we ſhall proceed to the deſcription of thoſe curioſities that are uſually ſhewn to ſtrangers.

Of the LIONS and other wild beaſts in the Tower.

PERSONS whoſe inclination leads them to ſee the rarities in the Tower of London, generally take a view of the wild beaſts before any other curioſity, as by their ſituation they firſt preſent themſelves; for when you have entered the outer gate, and paſſed what is called the ſpur-guard, you will ſee the keeper's houſe juſt before you, which you will know by the figure of a lion being placed againſt the wall, and over the door where you are to enter is another figure of a lion; there you are to ring, and for ſix-pence each perſon, you will inſtantly gain admittance, and be ſhewn ſuch a noble collection of wild creatures, as is well worthy the admiration of the curious.

As ſoon as you enter you are carried into a range of dens in the form of a half moon, moſt of them inhabited by lions and lioneſſes of different ages and various countries.

The firſt they ſhew you is a young he-lion named MARCO, which was preſented to his majeſty by his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland; he is ſtill very ſavage, and cannot be tamed by all the art of the keepers.

This den was formerly occupied by a lioneſs, who lived above forty years in the Tower, and bred ſeveral times, to the no ſmall ſatisfaction of her keepers.—She was the oldeſt that ever was known here, tho' it is more than five hundred years ſince theſe ſort of beaſts firſt began to be kept in this place. Of her whelps NERO lived to the age of ten, and died about nine years ago, and NANCY lived to the age of twenty.

Theſe were both brought up in the Tower, with great care and expence; for hardly any creature is more tender when young than a lion's whelp, notwithſtanding the great ſtrength of thoſe animals when grown to maturity.

In this country they would infallibly periſh, if they were not immediately taken from their dams as ſoon as whelped; and it is remarkable, that in Barbary, where they are a part of the wild inhabitants of the woods and foreſts, many of them die in breeding their teeth, in ſtrong convulſions. Thoſe nurſed in the Tower were kept twelve months in a warm room, and fed moſtly with milk diet before they were put into dens; they were as gentle as lambs when about five or ſix weeks old, but it was obſerved that, as they grew older, their ſavage nature increaſed.

The following is the account given of Nero, "that when he was two years old, he was indeed "a very beautiful creature, and exceedingly well "educated; for, ſays he, upon my expreſſing a "deſire of viſiting his lodgings, at a word ſpeaking he marched down with great condeſcenſion "from his upper into his lower apartment, and "gave me the opportunity of entering into his "den; where having ſatisfied my curioſity in "viewing his dining-room, kitchen, and bed-"chamber, his manner of living, particular ce-"remonies in eating, drinking, &c. at my de-"parture from thence he would have taken me "by the hand, but our acquaintance being but "ſlender, I declined accepting ſo great a mark "of his friendſhip, till I had known him better. "Upon the keepers putting into his den a piece "of lights, he ſeemingly took very little notice "of it, but couched down on his belly, with "his fore-feet out like a cat that is going to leap "at a mouſe, and in an inſtant gave a ſudden "ſpring from the fartheſt ſide of the den, and "ſeized it with amazing fierceneſs." Nancy it ſeems, was more ſhy; ſhe would admit of no familiarity with ſtrangers; and was looked upon as the fierceſt beaſt in the Tower.

The next den is inhabited with maſter Dunco, a young he-lion, and miſs Groggery, a fine young tygreſs, which were preſented to his majeſty by lord Anſon. Tho' theſe creatures are full grown, they live together in the moſt perfect amity and friendſhip; and the king of beaſts permits his fair partner to ſhare with him his empire without controul.

The lion is ſo perfectly tame and good-natured, that he will ſuffer his keepers to do any thing with him; and there is one circumſtance, reſpecting his behaviour, which I muſt relate, as in tenderneſs he ſeems to have come near to human nature, and in friendſhip to have ſurpaſſed it.

When Dunco was in the den alone, and accident happened to the lower part of it, which ſo impaired the wood work that he could not be kept with ſafety; the carpenter was therefore called to mend it, who wiſely ſtood at a diſtance, and could not approach the den for fear of the lion. Upon this one of the keepers ſtepped into the den, and agreed to keep Dunco in the upper part of his houſe, while the carpenter was at work beneath. It happened, however, that the keeper, after playing ſome time with the lion, fell faſt aſleep. The carpenter continued his work, without knowing to what danger he was expoſed, and when he had done called the keeper to come down and faſten the door; but receiving no anſwer, he ran out of the den, and was greatly ſurprized to ſee, through the grate, both the keeper and the lion, ſtretched upon the floor and ſleeping together. He again called William, but William was too ſound aſleep to make any anſwer; however, the lion reared up his head, and, after looking looking at the carpenter ſome time, threw his great paw over William's breaſt, and laying his noſe upon his head again compoſed himſelf to reſt. The carpenter, already terrified with his own ſituation, was ſtill more alarmed when he ſaw the keeper thus incircled with the paws of the lion; and ran into the houſe for aid. Some of the people came out, and, having bolted the den-door, which the carpenter had neglected in his precipitate retreat, they rouſed William, who ſhaking the lion by the paw took his leave; but Dunco firſt rubbed his noſe againſt the keeper's knees, then held him by the coat, and, at length, attended him quite to the door.

It is an old maxim, that evil communication corrupts good manners; and as a companion to this adage, we may aſſert, that good company and kind treatment will tame the moſt ſavage animals. We have an inſtance of this, in the courteous behaviour of miſs Groggery, who is altogether as kind and familiar as her companion, and, though a tygreſs, diſcovers no marks of ferocity.—But notwithſtanding the polite and friendly behaviour of theſe beautiful creatures, I would not adviſe my friends to be too great with them; for, like other couples, they may ſometimes happen to be out of temper.

The tyger is in ſhape not much unlike a cat, only much larger, and when wild is prodigious fierce and ravenous. It lurks in the woods, and ſeizes its prey by a ſudden ſpring. Men in traverſing the woods, are frequently ſurprized by this animal. Tygers are finely ſpotted; they are of a yellowiſh colour, and their ſpots black; they are very playful, and leap a prodigious height, when they are playing their gambols.

In the third den, you were formerly ſhewn Zara a celebrated lioneſs, lately dead. She was brought from the dey of Algiers, as a preſent to his majeſty, by commodore Kepple, when he went to that prince, ſome years ago, to ſettle the peace, and ranſom the Engliſh priſoners. This lioneſs was married in the Tower, and there bred, and in the ſame den are now ſhewn Pompey and Dido, her ſon and daughter. Theſe ſhe brought forth about four years ago, and was ſo tenderly fond of them till her death, that ſhe eat no meat till they had done, though they were then grown almoſt as large as herſelf. Theſe two are remarkably tame, and fond of their keepers.

In the next den reigns alone Cæſar, a mighty lion, born in Barbary, and preſented by the dey of Algiers to his majeſty. He was brought over with Zara, by commodore Kepple, and has the honour to be father to Pompey and Dido. He may be a good father, but we cannot allow him to be a good companion, for he is both ſaucy and ſurley.

In the laſt den of this yard may be ſeen Sir Richard, a fine young tyger, preſented to his majeſty by the duke of Northumberland.

From this range of dens you are carried into the next yard, and ſhewn:

1. Miſs Fanny, a beautiful young lioneſs, brought from Bombay by captain Webb, and preſented to his majeſty. This is a very handſome beaſt and good tempered, but ſhe is ſomewhat lame, occaſioned by her paws being ſeared, when young, with a red hot iron by the negro who took her, which was done, we are told, to make her tame; and tame ſhe is, indeed, more ſo than many of the human race, for ſome time ago, when ſhe ſeemed indiſpoſed, and refuſed to eat her meat, the two keepers commenced doctors, and having prepared a drink for her, one opened her jaws with his hands, while the other poured it down her throat; and this doſe they repeated four different times, without any other oppoſition from the good natured creature than a ſour look, and a growl of diſapprobation.

In a ſecond den is a large wolf from Saxony, in form not unlike a dog of a mixed breed. Theſe are ravenous creatures, which inhabit the immenſe foreſts in Germany and other parts, and are a terror to men and cattle. In the ſevere ſeaſon of the year, when the froſts and ſnows have locked up every kind of vegetable, theſe creatures come from the woods, and fall ravenouſly upon every living thing they meet. Children have been torn from the breaſts of their mothers by them upon the road; and they have even entered houſes in ſearch of food.

The third den is occupied by Hector, a fine young lion, ſent from the emperor of Morocco, as a preſent to his majeſty.

Next to him you are ſhewn Miſs Jenny, a Bengal tygreſs, brought from Madraſs by governor Piggot, and preſented to his majeſty as a great curioſity. She is a moſt beautiful creature, and indeed more ſo than any other in the Tower.

In the next den, you are ſhewn Nero, the emperor, the oldeſt lion in the Tower, now greatly upon the decline. He was brought from the river Gambia in Africa, and is of a noble and majeſtic appearance. His looks ſtrike the ſtouteſt beholder with aſtoniſhing awe. His head is large, being covered with a long ſhagged mane that reaches to his ſhoulders, and adds rather to the terror than majeſty of his countenance, for his eyes being very fiery and far ſet into his head, and darting as it were a kind of red flame through his long, ſhaggy, and diſhevelled hair, raiſes ſuch an idea of fierceneſs, as cannot be excited in the mind unaccompanied with fear; nor can we conceive it poſſible for human courage to encounter a creature of ſuch a dreadful aſpect, without the intervention of ſome lucky circumſtance; notwithſtanding the ſtories that have been told of men killing lions in equal combat. His mouth opens wide, and diſcovers a frightful ſet of teeth, and when he roars (which he generally does, if not diſturbed or interrupted by company) about five in the evening, he may be heard at a great diſtance; indeed the voice of the lion is ſaid to be ſo terrible, when wild in the foreſt, that all creatures that hear it tremble.

The lion we are ſpeaking of, if we do not miſtake in deſcribing him, is a kind of yellowiſh cream colour, about four feet high, his body ſmall in proportion to his head, but his legs have the appearance of amazing ſtrength; his large muſcles being very viſible through the ſkin that covers them. The bone of his fore leg ſeems to be about the bigneſs of a man's wriſt, and his fore feet are armed with five prodigious claws, ſheathed like thoſe of a cat, with which he ſeizes his prey, like that animal; his hinder feet with only four.

This ſtately creature had his ſhoulder ſlipped by an accident, which makes him go lame, and ſeemingly in pain; yet he appears to be very gentle and tractable to his feeder, and will lie down to let him play with him like a ſpaniel; but we would adviſe no ſtranger to be ſo familiar with theſe beaſts; for there are ſome whoſe countenances they do not like at firſt ſight, and therefore when they have conceived a diſguſt, it would be dangerous to come within their reach.

We have been informed, that a ſpaniel dog being once thrown into a former lion's den in the Tower, inſtead of hurting it, the lion cheriſhed it, and contracted ſuch a fondneſs for it, that he would never ſuffer it to be taken out again, but fed it till he died, which happened ſeveral years afterwards.

The next den is inhabited by a leopard and leopardeſs, two beautiful creatures ſent to his preſent majeſty by the dey of Algiers, and preſented by the late Algerine ambaſſador.

The next beaſt that is ſhewn is a young heleopard, named Sir Robert, which was brought from Tripoly by capt. Birch, and preſented to the late king. This is a moſt beautiful creature, of a ſhining yellow colour intermixed with bright ſpots.

In the next den is Miſs Lucy, a panther, from Buenos Ayres. She is a moſt beautiful creature, her coat being of a ſhining yellow colour, decorated with great variety of round black ſpots, each encloſed in a compartment of an hexagonal form. Though Miſs Lucy is pretty in appearance, ſhe has ſome ſly, miſchievous tricks. She is ſurly even to the keepers, and very lately tore a woman's arm in a terrible manner, who attempted to be familiar with her. This we mention as a caution to others.

You are next ſhewn Cleone, a young lioneſs from the coaſt of Barbary, which is very tame, and full of play. This creature is eſteemed very beautiful, her coat being of a cream colour, with brown ſpots. She was preſented to the preſent queen by the earl of Bute.

There was formerly ſhewn here a black bear, brought from New-York by captain Lee, and preſented to the duke of York, who gave it to his majeſty. This creature was very docile, and would open the door of his den, and do ſeveral other feats at the word of command; but he was not ſo droll and dexterous as the Maryland bear; for that creature would ſhew you the humours of the beggars on Tower-hill, would make the ſide ſteps in the Pruſſian exerciſe, and uſually cloſed his entertainment with a fine boarding-ſchool courteſy.

The next thing ſhewn you is a capuchin monkey, which is all that now remains of the famous ſchool of apes, with which the public has been ſo often entertained. Beſides the creature above mentioned, this ſchool originally conſiſted of two Egyptian night-walkers, and two apes from Turkey. Of the largeſt of theſe creatures they uſed to tell abundance of very ſurpriſing ſtories; and indeed theſe ſort of animals are capable of ſuch variety of droll imitations of human actions, that their whimſical tricks, were they to be remembred, would fill a volume. The male Egyptian having one day broke his chain, in the twinkling of an eye mounted to the top of one of the offices, and there ſet his keepers at defiance.

When they prepared to ſet ladders to attack him by ſtorm, he played the tiles about their heads with ſuch dexterity, ſtrength, and nimbleneſs, that he fairly beat them off; when they attempted to ſurpriſe him by ſtratagem, he was no leſs vigilant than before he had been active, and diſcovered as much ſagacity in defeating their plots, as he had ſhewn courage in oppoſing their attacks.

Finding him neither to be overcome by force or ſtratagem, they had recourſe to milder methods, and thought to entice him down by feaſting his companions openly in his ſight; but that too failed of ſucceſs. He ſeemed to divert himſelf much, by the chattering he made, in baffling all the arts they could deviſe to catch him; and at length, after untiling almoſt all the place, and laughing as long as he thought proper at thoſe that thought themſelves wiſer than himſelf, he came down of his own accord, and retired to his own apartment.

But what ſurprized, and indeed infinitely delighted the keeper, was an amour he had with a favourite female of his own ſpecies, by whom, after more than twenty years cohabitation, he at length had iſſue. The little ape ſhe brought forth was eſteemed the greateſt curioſity the kingdom ever produced; theſe animals having never been known to breed in theſe cold regions before.

Nobody ſuſpected the pregnancy of the dam till ſhe had brought forth the young one, which ſhe nurſed with the ſame tenderneſs as mothers do infants, and much in the ſame manner. She carried it in her arms and ſometimes on her back, and danced it round the room with much drollery; but what is moſt remarkable is, that there was a dry nurſe in the ſame room, who was as fond of it as the dam. This old creature that uſed to run looſe about the room, one day took it upon her back and ran away with it. She mounted the ridge of the dens, and when ſhe thought ſhe had it ſafe to herſelf, ſhe ſeemed ſo highly pleaſed, that the keepers by her anticks were afraid ſhe would have dropped it; but having recovered it from her without any hurt, they ever after chained her up. Sometimes the dam and ſhe quarrelled about the nurſery.

A gentleman obſerving the particular tenderneſs of theſe animals, cried out one day, "We "are certainly all in an error, and have been "wrong from the beginning; theſe are the ra-"tionals, and we are the apes. Is it no ſo, Mr. "keeper?

The next beaſt ſhewn is Helen, a lioneſs from the coaſt of Barbary. She ſtill remains in the cage which brought her over, there being no den empty, though three new dens have been lately built.

The next curioſity you ſee is a Muſcovy cat, ſent from the dey of Algiers, and preſented to his majeſty by the late Algerine ambaſſador. This creature, which is beautifully ſpotted, is made very long in the back, head and tail, ſomewhat like a ferret.

You

You are next ſhewn Miſs Nancy, a fine large tygreſs from the coaſt of Guinea, which was preſented to his late majeſty by captain Scott. She is a fine beaſt but does not ſeem to have the moſt amiable diſpoſition.

After this you are ſhewn an eagle of the Sun, taken in a French prize by admiral Boſcawen, and by him preſented to his late majeſty. This bird is ſuppoſed to ſoar the higheſt of all the feathered tribe; and is able to look ſtedfaſtly at the ſun, even in his moſt refulgent ſplendor; whence it obtained the name by which that ſpecies of eagles is diſtinguiſhed. Here you are alſo ſhewn a brown eagle, which was brought from Philadelphia by captain Fitzroy, who preſented it to king George the ſecond.

The eagle is accounted the king of birds, as the lion is the king of beaſts; becauſe of all the ſubordinations of their reſpective ſpecies, they have the ſuperiority in point of fierceneſs and power to overcome and deſtroy; for though there are of each kind others of far greater ſtrength; as the bull for inſtance in one ſpecies, and the oſtrich in the other; yet nature has withheld from theſe the weapons of deſtruction, or the agility to uſe them, which ſhe has, for wiſe purpoſes unknown to us, beſtowed upon the others; and though the dominion is frequently diſputed in the wilderneſs and foreſt, and ſometimes the lion is vanquiſhed by the tyger, and the eagle by the vulture; yet nature has ſufficiently confirmed their reſpective dignities by this, that no beaſt, though ever ſo fierce, and made ravenous by hunger, will attack the lion for prey, nor any bird the eagle; an obſervation that has eſcaped the generality of writers on this ſubject.—

The eagle is generally of a dark brown colour, has a large hooked bill, and vaſt talons, and has ſuch ſtrength, that it has been confidently affirmed by perſons of undoubted credit, that they have been known to carry infants to their young, when they have failed of other food. An inſtance whereof happened, as Sir Robert Sibbald reports, while he was in the Orkney Iſles; for a woman there, being at harveſt work, and leaving her child, about a year old, at ſome diſtance from her, an eagle in ſearch of prey eſpied it, ſeized it in his talons, and carried it to his neſt upon a neighbouring rock; which ſome fiſhermen from the ſhore accidentally obſerving, purſued and attacked the eagle and brought off the infant yet alive.—

Lambs, hares, fawns, pheaſants, and even kids, are the ordinary food with which theſe birds bring up their young; and in the remote parts of France, if we may credit the following ſtory, a a gentleman who happens to have an eagle's neſt or two on his eſtate, thinks them equivalent to a good farm's rent.

The ſtory we have from a gentleman lately arrived from his travels, who ſays, that while he was in the neighbourhood of Mende, an officer of diſtinction invited him and ſome other travellers to paſs a few days at his country ſeat, where they were all entertained in the politeſt manner. "At the firſt collation he gave us, (ſays he,) we "obſerved with ſome ſurprize, that all the wild "fowl that were brought to table wanted either a "head, a wing, a leg, or ſome other part, which "occaſioned our gentlemen to ſay very pleaſantly, that we muſt pardon the voracioufneſs "of his caterer, who was ſuch a brute, as always "to be the firſt that taſted what he had provided."

It is remarked by hiſtorians, that the eagles ſhed their feathers every year, as the hart does his horns, and the ſerpent his ſkin; and that they live to an exceeding great age. The benedictine monks of the abbey of St. Bertin, at St. Omer's, have an eagle now living, which they report to be three hundred years old.

The next animal ſhewn is a Racoon from the coaſt of Guinea, which is ſmall, but much more beautiful than thoſe brought from America. This creature lives on the ſea-ſands, and chiefly on ſhell-fiſh, which it takes in a very ſafe and dexterous manner; for whenever the fiſh opens its ſhell to receive either air or nutriment, this creature, we are told, puts a ſmall pebble in, ſo that the ſhell may not cloſe again, and then picks out the fiſh with its claws.

Near to this is a tygreſs-cat, brought from Bombay by captain Fletcher, and preſented to his preſent majeſty. It is a beautiful creature, much larger than the largeſt boar-cat, delightfully coloured, and fierce beyond imagination.

The laſt animal ſhewn is a large Hyena, a fierce creature, and ſaid to be endued with great ſubtilty; but the noiſe he makes alarms travellers, and gives them notice to avoid the danger. Yet to thoſe who are unacquainted with them, this noiſe may have a contrary effect; for they ſo perfectly imitate the human voice by a ſort of moan and groan which they make, that a ſtranger might eaſily miſtake it for the voice of a human creature in extreme torture.

Some writers affirm that the Hyena will dig human bodies out of their graves, but perhaps this is only when preſſed by the ſeverity of hunger. He naturally limps upon one of his hind legs, notwithſtanding which imperfection he is tolerably ſwift; his neck is remarkably ſtiff, ſo that in looking behind, or ſnatching at any thing obliquely, he is obliged to move his whole body in the ſame manner as the hog, or the badger. He is of a dun colour, inclining to be reddiſh with ſome ſtreaks of a dark brown; and the hair upon his neck is near a ſpan long, and often ſet up like the briſtles of a hog.

We are unwilling to quit this ſubject, without lamenting the loſs of a fine large Oſtrich, which lately died here, and of whom we ſhall give ſome account. This creature was ſent as a preſent to his late majeſty by the dey of Tunis. His ſhape and colour was not very unlike that of a turkey cock breed, only greyer; but the ſize vaſtly bigger, being formerly accounted the largeſt bird in the world; but later diſcoveries have proved the contrary. Its legs were as much as a man could well graſp, and very long, as was the neck, of which it had great command, carrying it as erect and ſtately as the ſwan does, ſo that when it walked, its bill was higher than the talleſt man's head. Its bulk may be judged of by its eggs, of which ſhe had lain fourteen ſince ſhe came to England,

England, ſeveral of which are now to be ſeen, each weighing upwards of five pounds, and when firſt laid weighed above ſix.

It had a pretty large warm room to live in, which was often cleaned, and the ſtraw therein ſhifted, otherwiſe it would have died ſooner; for the climate of this country ſeems by no means fitted to its tender nature, tho' by its large bones, and vaſt bulk, it appeared to be very ſtrong. There was ſome time ago a couple of theſe birds, but one died before the other, by ſwallowing a large nail that ſtopt its paſſage.

The vulgar error, that the oſtrich can digeſt iron, has been long ſince exploded: for in the year 1659, the Morocco ambaſſador to the ſtates general, among other rarities, having brought over to Holland an oſtrich, as a preſent, it died at Amſterdam in a few days, by ſwallowing iron nails, which the populace threw to it, upon a preſumption that it could digeſt them like other food; but the oſtrich being opened, about eighty nails were found entire in its ſtomach.

All the creatures that are here ſhewn are regularly fed with food proper for them, and attended with the greateſt care. This takes off much of their ſavage nature, and makes them tame and ſubmiſſive, and perhaps contributed not a little to diſappoint the expectations of king James I. when he made trial of the fierce nature of a lion; for that prince having ordered a lion to be put out of his den, and a bear to be put to him; the lion refuſed to attack the bear; they tried another, and at length two together, but in vain; the lions diſcovered plain ſymptons of fear, by making to their dens: ſuch were the effects of indolence and high feeding, upon animals the moſt remarkable of any for courage and ferocity.

Account of the ſpoils of the SPANISH ARMADA.

HAVING entered the great gate of the Tower, one of the warders will attend you, and carry you in a regular order to ſeveral places where the curioſities are ſhewn; the firſt of which is ſituated to the ſouthward of the White Tower, and in it are repoſited the ſpoils of the Invincible Armada, as it was ſtiled by Philip II. of Spain, in order to perpetuate to lateſt poſterity, the memory of that ſignal victory obtained by the Engliſh, over the whole naval power of Spain, which will ever make the reign of queen Elizabeth glorious in the Britiſh annals.

This Armada, when it rendezvouſed in the Groyne, under the command of the duke of Medina Sidonia, conſiſted of 132 ſhips, including tranſports, on board of which were embarked 19290 ſoldiers, 8350 ſailors, 2080 gally ſlaves, and 2630 pieces of cannon, which at that time of day, when ſhips of 1200 tons carried hardly ſixty pieces of ordnance, was a prodigious force.

On the twenty-firſt of July 1588, this formidable fleet appeared off Plymouth, and was met there by the Engliſh under the command of lord Effingham, lord high admiral; Drake, Hawkins, and Forbiſher; when both fleets immediately formed the line of battle.

The van of the Spaniſh fleet was led by Alphonſo de Levya; the duke of Medina commanded the center; and Juan Martinez de Ricaldo in the rear.

The lord high admiral of England in his own ſhip, called the Ark Royal, ſeconded by the reſt of his ſquadron, fell upon Levya's diviſion, and a terrible engagement enſued; but Drake, Hawkins, and Forbiſher, mutually ſupporting each other where the danger was greateſt, and taking the advantage of the enemy where they obſerved them weakeſt, put their rear into diſorder, and forced them upon the center, which occaſioned ſome confuſion; but night coming on, obliged both parties to lie by; and the Engliſh being ill provided with ammunition and ſtores, were in no haſte to renew the engagement; well knowing that every day would weaken their adverſaries, and increaſe their own ſtrength.

Accordingly, the very night after the firſt engagement, one of the ſhips of the line, by ſome accident or other, blew up, and the fire from her communicating itſelf to the ſhip whereof Don Pedro, de Valdez was captain, ſhe fell an eaſy prize to admiral Drake, who ſent her into Dartmouth. This was looked upon as a favourable omen of a compleat victory.

Two whole days, however, were ſpent in reparing the damages ſuſtained on both ſides, in which time the Engliſh were reinforced from the neighbouring forts, with men, ammunition and ſhips, which enabled them on the twenty-third, after ſome time ſpent in ſtriving to gain the wind, to fight the enemy on more equal terms than in the preceding engagement, and having gained their point, fell upon Ricaldo's ſquadron with their whole force, and would certainly have deſtroyed it, had not the Spaniſh admiral made a moſt vigorous defence.

The fight then became general, and the Engliſh managed their ſhips with ſo much eaſe and dexterity, that the unweildy Spaniards, who lay like hulks in a dead calm, could make but little uſe of their ſuperior ſtrength, orders having been given by the Engliſh commander in chief, to avoid by all means a cloſe engagement; by which, as the enemy's ſhips were full of men, a great ſlaughter was made of them without ſuffering in return any conſiderable loſs.

In this manner, a ſort of running fight was maintained for two days, with no deciſive advantage on either ſide, except what aroſe from the diſproportion of the numbers ſlain.

It will not be improper to obſerve, that according to the original plan of this invaſion, the Spaniſh admiral was to have been joined in the Britiſh channel by the duke of Parma, with a body of thirty thouſand land forces from the Spaniſh Netherlands; but ſeeing no appearance of their arrival, he had diſpatch'd expreſs after expreſs to haſten their embarkation; and at length ſet ſail himſelf to the ſtreights of Calais to facilitate their junction.

This motion had been foreſeen, and a ſtrong ſquadron of forty ſail under lord Henry Seymour, and Sir William Winter, were properly ſtationed, as well to block up the ports from whence thoſe ſuccours were to embark, as to watch the future motions of the Spaniſh admiral.

This

This was a noble ſtroke of policy, and was ſoon followed by another that ruin'd their whole project, and put an end to the great conſternation, that had overſpread the whole nation on the firſt appearance of ſo prodigious a naval force.

As ſoon as the lord high admiral diſcovered what courſe the Spaniards had ſteered, a council of war was immediately called, wherein it was reſolved not to loſe a moment in purſuing them; on this occaſion admiral Drake, whoſe preſence of mind never failed him on the moſt preſſing emergencies, bethought himſelf of an expedient to diſtreſs the enemy, without riſquing the queen's ſhips in ſo unequal a conflict.

Having communicated his ſcheme to the commander in chief, it was reſolved to put it in execution, and the rather as the contrivance was new, and conſequently unſuſpected.

Hereupon, eight old and ſhattered ſhips were haſtily fitted up, and filled with all ſorts of combuſtibles; and when the fleet came up with the enemy, who lay at anchor off Calais waiting for the duke of Parma, thoſe ſhips were ſecretly diſpatched in the night, with proper inſtructions to their reſpective captains, to grapple at proper diſtances, where the enemy were cloſeſt in the line, obſerving always to keep the wind; and when their ſhips were thus properly ſtationed, to ſet them on fire, and then bring off their men.

This was executed under the direction of the captains Prowſe and Young, with all imaginable ſucceſs; for while the Spaniards, thinking themſelves ſurpriſed, were preparing for an unexpected attack, the captains of the fire-ſhips did their buſineſs, and in little more than an hour, the whole ocean ſeemed on fire, as if to devour what ſhe could not ſwallow up, of that preſumptuous Armada, which had braved the majeſty of heaven, been bleſſed by the pope, and pronounced invincible.

Now nothing but horror, confuſion, and hurry enſued; ſome were on fire, ſome fell foul of others, ſome cut their cables, and drove on ſhore; and had it not been for the calmneſs of the duke of Medina, their whole fleet had that night periſhed with their hopes: but this nobleman ſeeing the danger, and penetrating the cauſe, ordered his fleet to ſeparate, every one ſhifting for himſelf, and to rendezvous next morning at Graveling: though theſe were the ſageſt orders that could have been iſſued in the preſent dilemma, yet the Engliſh reaped from the conſequences all the advantage they could have wiſhed: it furniſhed them with an opportunity of attacking their huge ſhips ſingly, with what force they thought proper; and of coming to a general engagement, before the Spaniards were recovered from the dreadful panic with which they were ſtruck.

Drake and Forbiſher, experienced ſea-officers as ever the world produced, well knew how to improve this critical turn of fortune in their favour, and reſolutely attacked the duke of Medina's own ſquadron before it could be half formed, and made terrible havock, while the other commanders were as vigilant in ſeeking out the ſcattered remains of Levya's and Ricaldo's: in a word, the ſea ſeem'd to be covered with wrecks; and the flower of the Engliſh nobility, who had waited on the ſhore for the event of this engagement, ſeeing all fears over from the Spaniards landing, flocked on board the ſhips, which were now encreaſed to the number of 150 ſail, to be ſharers in the glory of delivering their country from ſlavery and papal tyranny.

In vain did the duke of Medina, in this lamentable diſtreſs, endeavour to regain the Britiſh channel; winds, as well as waves, fought againſt him, and drove him on the coaſt of Zealand, where he muſt have periſhed without any other enemies than tides, ſhelves, rocks, and ſands, had not providence reſerved him to experience ſtill farther misfortunes.

The Engliſh, well knowing that they muſt inevitably ſhare in one common deſtruction if they purſued, prudently gave over the chace; and the duke having now no other views than thoſe of ſelf-preſervation, (the wind chopping about in the very inſtant of his greateſt danger) called a council of war, in which it was reſolved to ſail for Spain by the northern paſſage.

Having taken this reſolution, they weighed anchor, but a ſtorm aroſe that croſſed their hopes for a while, and left them once more at the mercy of the Engliſh, who judging of their deſign, purſued them beyond the Firth of Edinburgh, though with no other advantage than that of weakening their crippled ſhips ſtill more, and thereby expoſing them to the fury of the firſt tempeſt that happened, which afterwards proved their total deſtruction.

In the ſeveral engagements on the Britiſh coaſt, fifteen of their ſtouteſt ſhips, beſides tranſports, were either deſtroyed or taken: on the coaſt of Ireland ſome were ſunk, ſome daſhed to pieces againſt the rocks, ſome run on ſands, and ſome were burnt by the Spaniards themſelves.

Between the rivers of Lochſoille and Lochſwille, on the north coaſt, nine were ſtranded, and the crews forced to ſeek for ſuccour among the wild Iriſh. In the bay of Calbeggy, three more run upon rocks, and moſt of the men periſhed.

In the bay of Barreys, a large ſhip of 1000 tons, and fifty four fine braſs cannon, was ſunk, and all on board periſhed, except ſixteen, who, by their apparel, ſeemed perſons of great diſtinction. On the coaſt of Thommond two ſhips more periſhed, one whereof they fired; the other was of St. Sebaſtiana, and had 300 men on board, 240 of whom were drowned. Before Sir Tirlogh Obrione's houſe, another great ſhip was loſt, ſuppoſed to be a Galleas.

In a word, from the twenty-firſt of July, when this vaunting Armada was firſt beaten by the Engliſh, until the tenth of September following, when the ſhattered remains of it paſſed the Iriſh coaſt, it appears that it had never had one good day or night; ſo that of 132 ſhips that arrived in the Britiſh channel, ſcarce 70 of them returned home again, and of 30,000 ſouls on board, upwards of 20,000 were either killed, or drowned, or remained priſoners in England.—Such was the fate of a fleet which had been denominated and thought Invincible!

The following is a catalogue of the reliques that are preſerved here of this memorable victory, ſo glorious for our country, together with ſome other curioſities of the like kind.

1. The common ſoldiers pikes 18 feet long, pointed with long ſharp ſpikes, and ſhod with iron, which were deſigned to keep off the horſe, to facilitate the landing of the infantry.

2. The Spaniſh officers lances, finely engraven; theſe were formerly gilt, but the gilding is now almoſt worn off with cleaning. There is a ſtory current concerning theſe, that when Don Pedro de Valdez, already mentioned, paſſed his examination before lord Burleigh, he told his lordſhip, that thoſe fine poliſhed lances were put on board to bleed the Engliſh with; to which that nobleman replied jokingly, that, if he were not miſtaken, the Engliſh had performed that operation better, on their good friends the Spaniards, with worſe inſtruments.

3. The Spaniſh ranceurs, made in different forms, which were intended either to kill the men on horſeback, or pull them off their horſes. At the back is a ſpike, with which they tell you, they were to pick the roaſt beef out of the Engliſhmen's teeth. On one of them is a piece of ſilver coin, which they intended to make current: on it are three heads, ſuppoſed to be the pope's, Philip II's and queen Mary's.
This is a curioſity that moſt Spaniards come to ſee.

4. An uncommon piece of arms, being a piſtol in a ſhield, ſo contrived as to fire the piſtol, and cover the body at the ſame time with the ſhield. It is to be fired by a match-lock, and the ſight of the enemy is to be taken through a little grate in the ſhield, which is piſtol proof.

5. A ſmall train of ten pieces of pretty little cannon, neatly mounted on proper carriages, being a preſent from the foundery of London to king Charles I. when a child, to practiſe the art of gunnery with. Theſe, though no part of the Spaniſh ſpoils, are nevertheleſs a great curioſity.

6. The banner, with a crucifix upon it, which was to have been carried before the Spaniſh general. On it is engraved the pope's benediction before the Spaniſh fleet ſailed: for the pope came to the water ſide, and on ſeeing the fleet, bleſſed it, and, as has been ſaid, ſtiled it INVINCIBLE.

7. Daniſh and Saxon clubs, which weapons thoſe people jointly are ſaid to have uſed in the conqueſt of England; and are, perhaps, curioſities of the greateſt antiquity of any in the Tower, having lain there 850 years. The warders call them the Women's Weapons, becauſe, ſay they, the Britiſh women made prize of them, when in one night they all conſpired together, and cut the throats of 35,000 Danes, the greateſt piece of ſecrecy the Engliſh women ever kept, for which they have ever ſince been honoured with the right hand of the man, and the upper end of the table. Indeed in 1002, a prodigious ſlaughter was made of the Danes, on the feaſt of St. Brice, not by the ſecret conſpiracy of the women alone, but by the private orders of Ethelred II. who commanded his officers on that day to extirpate the whole race of the Danes out of his dominions, at once, ſparing neither man, woman nor child; which orders were ſo punctually obeyed, that only about ſixteen who got on board a ſhip eſcaped; but theſe alarming their countrymen, they afterwards returned, and ſeverely revenged the death of their countrymen.

8. The Spaniſh cravats, as they are called; theſe are engines of torture, made of iron, and put on board to lock together the feet, arms and heads of Engliſh hereticks.

9. Spaniſh bilboes, made of iron likewiſe, to yoke the Engliſh priſoners two and two.

10. Spaniſh ſhot, which are of four ſorts; ſpike-ſhot, ſtar-ſhot, chain ſhot, and link-ſhot, all admirably contrived, as well for the deſtruction of the maſts and rigging of ſhips, as for ſweeping the decks of their men. But ſome attribute the invention of theſe to admiral Drake, to be employed againſt the Spaniards.

11. Spaniſh ſpadas poiſoned at the points, ſo that if a man received but ever ſo ſlight a wound with one of thoſe, certain death was the conſequence.

12. Spaniſh halberts, or ſpears, ſome whereof are curiouſly engraven, and inlaid with gold.

13. The axe, with which queen Anne Boleyn (mother of queen Elizabeth) was beheaded. This was performed May 19, 1536, a little before noon, by an executioner ſent for on purpoſe from Calais. At the time of her death ſhe was not 30 years of age, and fell a ſacrifice to the jealouſy, or rather the caprice of Henry VIII. to whom ſhe was lawfully married. The earl of Eſſex (queen Elizabeth's favourite) was likewiſe beheaded with the ſame axe.

14. A Spaniſh poli-axe, uſed in boarding of ſhips.

15. Thumb ſcrews, of which there were ſeveral cheſts full on board the Spaniſh fleet. The uſe they were intended for is ſaid to have been to extort confeſſion from the Engliſh where their money was hid, had that cruel people prevailed. Certain it is, that after the defeat, the whole converſation of the court turned upon the diſcoveries made by the Spaniſh priſoners of the racks, the wheels, and the whips of wire, with which they were to ſcourge the Engliſh of every rank and age, and of both ſexes. The moſt noted hereticks were to be put to death; thoſe that ſurvived were to be branded on the forehead with a hot iron; and the whole form of government both in church and ſtate was to be overturned.

16. The Spaniſh morning-ſtar; a deſtructive engine reſembling the figure of a ſtar, of which there were many thouſands on board, and all of them with poiſoned points: and were deſigned to ſtrike at the enemy as they came on board in caſe of a cloſe attack.

17. The Spaniſh general's halbert, covered with velvet. All the nails of this weapon are double gilt with gold: and on its top is the pope's head, curiouſly engraved.

18. A Spaniſh battle-axe, ſo contrived as to ſtrike four holes in a man's ſkull at once; and has beſides a piſtol in its handle with a match lock.

19. King Henry the VIII's walking-ſtaff, which has three match-lock piſtols in it, with coverings to keep the charges dry. With this ſtaff the warders tell you, the king walked round the city ſometimes, to ſee that the conſtables did their duty; and one night as he was walking near the bridge-foot, the conſtable ſtopt him to know what he did with ſuch an unlucky weapon at that time of the night; upon which the king ſtruck him; but the conſtable calling the watchmen to his aſſiſtance, his majeſty was apprehended and carried to the Poultry-Compter, where he lay confined till morning, without either fire or candle: when the keeper was informed of the rank of his priſoner, he diſpatched a meſſenger to the conſtable, who came trembling with fear, expecting nothing leſs than to be hanged, drawn and quartered; but inſtead of that, the king applauded his reſolution in honeſtly doing his duty, and made him a handſome preſent. At the ſame time, he ſettled upon St. Magnus pariſh an annual grant of 23*l.* and a mark; and made a proviſion for furniſhing 30 chaldron of coals, and a large allowance of bread annually for ever, toward the comfortable relief of his fellow priſoners and their ſucceſſors, which is paid them to this day, if the account given by the wardens may be relied on.

to

20. A large wooden cannon called Policy, becauſe, (ſay your guides,) when Henry VIII. beſieged Bologne, the roads being impaſſable for heavy cannon, he cauſed a number of theſe wooden ones to be made and mounted on proper batteries before the town, as if real cannon, which ſo terrified the French commandant, that when he beheld a formidable train, as he thought juſt ready to play, he gave up the town without firing a ſhot.—The truth is, the duke of Suffolk, who commanded at this ſiege under the king, ſoon made himſelf maſter of the lower town; but it was not till ſeven weeks afterwards that the upper town capitulated, in which time the Engliſh ſuſtained great loſs in poſſeſſing themſelves of the Braye; after which ſpringing ſome mines with good ſucceſs, and the garriſon loſing Philip Corſe, their beſt officer, at length ſurrendered on honourable terms. The lower town was taken July 25, 1544, and the upper town ſurrendered September 14, in the ſame year.

21. The laſt thing they ſhew of theſe memorable ſpoils, is the Spaniſh general's ſhield, not worn by, but carried before him as an enſign of honour. On it are depicted, in moſt curious workmanſhip, the labours of Hercules, and other expreſſive allegories, which ſeem to throw a ſhade upon the boaſted ſkill of modern artiſts. The date is 1370, near 100 years before the art of printing was known in England.

The inſcription upon it is as follows in Roman characters, tolerably engraven: ADVLTERIO DEIANIRA CONSPVRCAN SOCCIDITVR CACVS AB HERCVL. OPPRIMITVR 1376. Alluding to the killing of Cacus by Hercules, for adultery with his wife Deianira.

22. Some weapons made with the part of a ſcythe fixed on a pole, which were taken from the duke of Monmouth's party from the battle of Sedgemore in the reign of James II.

23. The partiſans that were carried at the funeral of king William III.

24. But what is moſt curious of all, is a perfect model of that moſt admirable machine, the idea of which was brought from Italy, by Sir Thomas Lombe, and firſt erected at Derby at his own expence, for making organzine or thrown ſilk. This ingenious gentleman made two attempts, at the hazard of his life, for the completing of this machine, which by means of a friar he at length effected; and having obtained the ſanction of an act of parliament, in the year 1742, by which 14,000 pounds were granted to his majeſty, to be paid to him as a reward for his eminent ſervice in diſcovering and introducing the ſaid machine, he finally completed it, and brought it into uſe. The following is a brief account of it, but no words can deſcribe the beautiful ſtructure of it.

It contains 26,586 wheels, and 97,746 movements, which work 93,726 yards of ſilk thread every time the water wheel goes round, which is thrice in one minute, and 318,504,960 yards in twenty-four hours. One water wheel gives motion to the reſt of the wheels and movements, of which any one may be ſtopt ſeperately. One fire engine conveys warm air to every individual part of the machine, and one regulator governs the whole work. The above model will make example amends to the curious for the trouble of inſpecting it.

Of the SMALL ARMORY.

A Small folding door adjoining to the eaſt-end of the Tower-chapel, the aſcent to which is by a grand ſtair-caſe of fifty eaſy ſteps, conducts the ſpectator to this curioſity.

On the left ſide of the uppermoſt landing-place is the work-ſhop, wherein are conſtantly employed about fourteen furbiſhers, in cleaning, repairing, and new-placing the arms. When you enter the armory itſelf, you will ſee, what they call a wilderneſs of arms, ſo artificially diſpoſed, and ſo admirably ranged, that at one view, you behold arms for near 80,000 men, all bright and ſhining, and fit for ſervice at a moment's warning; a ſight that none ever beheld without aſtoniſhment, and is not to be matched perhaps in the world.

Beſides thoſe expoſed to public view, there are ſixteen cheſts ſhut up, each cheſt holding about 1200 muſquets. Of the diſpoſition of the arms, deſcription can convey no adequate idea; but to aſſiſt the ſpectator to view it to advantage, and to help him to retain the remembrance of what he ſees, we have given the following particulars.

The north and ſouth walls are adorned with ſixteen pilaſters (on each ſide eight) of pikes ſixteen feet long, with capitals of piſtols in the Corinthian order.

At the weſt end, on the left hand as you enter, are two curious pyramids, compoſed of piſtols, ſtanding upon crowns, globes, ſcepters, finely carved and placed upon a pedeſtal five feet high. At the eaſt or farther end, in the oppoſite corner, are two ſuits of armour, one made for Henry V. the other for Henry VI. over each of which is a ſemicircle of piſtols; between theſe is repreſented the figure of an organ, the large pipes compoſed of braſs blunder-buſſes, the ſmall of piſtols; on one ſide of this figure is the repreſentation of a fiery ſerpent, the head and tail of carved work, and the body of piſtols, winding round in the form of a ſnake; and on the other a hydra, or ſeven headed monſter, whoſe heads are very artificially combined by links of piſtols.

The inter-columns which compoſe the wilderneſs, round which you are carried by your guides, are,

1. Some arms taken at Bath in the year 1715. Theſe are diſtinguiſhed from all others in the Tower, by having what they call dog-locks, which kind of locks have a ketch to ſecure them from going off at a half cock.

2. Bayonets and piſtols put up in the form of half moons and fans with the imitation of a target in the center, made up of bayonet-blades: theſe bayonets, of which you will obſerve ſeveral other fans compoſed, are of the firſt invention, having plug-handles, which go into the muzzle of a gun, inſtead of over it, and thereby prevent the firing of the piece without ſhooting away the bayonet. Theſe were invented at Bayonne in Spain, from whence they take their name.

3. Braſs blunderbuſſes for ſea-ſervice, with capitals of piſtols over them; the waves of the ſea are here repreſented in old faſhion bayonets.

4. Bayonets and ſword-bayonets, in the form of half-moons and fans, and ſet in ſcollop-ſhells finely carved: the ſword bayonet is made like the old bayonet with a plug handle, only different from it by being of a greater length.

5. The riſing ſun irradiated with rays of piſtols ſet in a chequered frame of marine hangers of a peculiar make, having braſs handles, and the form of a dog's head on their pummels.

6. Four beautiful twiſted pillars, made with piſtols up to the top, which is about twenty-two feet high, and placed at right angles, with the form of a falling ſtar on the ceiling exactly in the middle of them, being the centre of this magnificent room.

Into this place opens the grand ſtair-caſe door, for the admiſſion of the royal family, or any of the nobility, whoſe curioſity may lead them to view the armory; oppoſite to which opens another door into the balcony, that affords a fine proſpect of the parade, the governor's houſe, the ſurveyor-general's, ſtore-keepers, and the other general officers houſes in the Tower.

This grand entrance has been newly ornamented; the capitals, irradiations, and heads of Julius and Auguſtus Cæſar, are all finely gilt; and the whole armory neatly cleaned and painted, and newly fitted up in a moſt elegant manner.

7. The form of a pair of large folding-gates, made of ſerjeants halberts of antique form.

8. Horſemens carbines, blunderbuſſes, and piſtols, hanging very artificially in furbelows and flounces.

9. Meduſa's head, commonly called the witch of Endor, within three regular ellipſes of piſtols, with ſnakes repreſented ſtinging her. The features are finely carved, and the whole figure contrived with curious art.—This figure is the laſt on the north ſide.

10. The figure of a hydra, or ſeven-headed monſter, very curiouſly wreathed.

11. Facing the eaſt wall, as you turn round, is a grand figure of a lofty organ, ten ranges high, in which are contained upwards of 2000 pair of piſtols.

12. On the ſouth-ſide, as you return, the firſt figure that attracts attention, is that of Jupiter riding in a fiery charior drawn by eagles, as if in the clouds, holding a thunder-bolt in his left hand, and over his head is a rainbow: this figure is finely carved, and decorated with bayonets.

13. King Henry V. the greateſt conqueror in his time.

14. King Henry VI. his ſon.

☞ The figures on this ſide anſwer pretty nearly to thoſe on the others; and therefore need no farther deſcription till you come again to the centre; where, on each ſide the door leading to the balcony, you will ſee,

15. A fine repreſentation, in carved work, of the ſtar and garter, thiſtle, roſe and crown, ornamented with piſtols, &c. and very elegantly enriched with birds and other creatures.

16. The arms taken from Sir William Perkins, Sir John Friend, Charnock, and others concerned in the aſſaſſination plot, in 1696, among which they ſhew the very blunderbuſs with which they intended to ſhoot king William near Turnham Green, in his way to Hampton-Court; alſo the carbine with which Charnock undertook to ſhoot that monarch as he rode a hunting.

17. Laſtly, you are ſhewn the Highlander's arms, taken in 1715, particularly the earl of Mar's fine piece, exquiſitely wrought, and inlaid with mother of pearl; alſo a Highland broad-ſword, with which a Highlander ſtruck general Evans over the head, and at one blow cut him thro' his hat, wig, and iron ſcull-cap; on which that general is ſaid to have ſhot him dead; but others ſay he was taken priſoner, and generouſly forgiven for his bravery. Here is alſo the ſword of juſtice (having a ſharp point) the ſword of mercy (having a blunt point) carried before the pretender when proclaimed in Scotland 1715; ſome of the Highlander's piſtols, the barrels and ſtocks being all iron; alſo a Highlander's loughabor ax, with which it is ſaid colonel Gardener was killed at the battle of Preſton-Pans.

A curious ſpectator will diſcover a thouſand peculiarities in the diſpoſition of ſo vaſt a variety of arms, which no deſcription can reach; and therefore it is fit that every one who has a taſte for the admirable combinations of art, ſhould gratify that darling paſſion with the ſight of a curioſity which is not equalled by any of its kind in the univerſe.

Account of the Royal TRAIN of ARTILLERY.

UNDER the ſmall armory, on a ground floor of equal dimenſions, is the royal train of artillery, which one cannot view without a kind of awful dread. To ſee ſo many and ſuch various engines of deſtruction, before whoſe dreadful thunder, churches, palaces, pompous edifices, the nobleſt works of human genius, fall together in one common and undiſtinguiſhed ruin; one cannot reflect upon this, without wiſhing that the horrible invention had ſtill lain like a falſe conception conception in the womb of nature, never to have been ripened into birth.

At your entrance you are ſhewn two copper cannon, three pounders, on wheels, which were taken from the gate of the governor's houſe at Quebec.

You are then ſhewn two mortars, and upwards of twenty fine pieces of cannon, lately taken from the French at Cherbourg. Their deſcription, date, and weight, are as follows:

Two MORTARS, both inſcriptions alike.

2. Two large pieces of cannon employed by admiral Vernon before Carthagena; they have each a large ſcale driven out of their muzzles by balls from the caſtle of Bocca Chica.

3. Two carved pieces, of excellent workmanſhip, preſented by the city of London to the young duke of Glouceſter, queen Anne's ſon, to teach him the military art.

4. Four ſmall mortars in miniature, for throwing hand-granadoes; the invention of colonel Brown. They are fired with a lock like a common gun; but have not been introduced into practice.

5. Two fine braſs cannon taken from the walls of Vigo by the late lord Cobham, in 1704. Their breeches repreſent lions couchant, with the effigy of St. Barbara, to whom they were dedicated.

6. A petard for the burſting open the gates of cities or caſtles.

7. A large train of fine braſs battering cannon, 24 pounders never yet uſed.

8. A parcel of cannon of a new invention, from 6 to 24 pounders. Their ſuperior excellence conſiſts firſt, in their lightneſs; the 24 pounders weighing not quite 1700 weight, whereas formerly they weighed 5000, the reſt are in proportion; and 2dly, in the contrivance for levelling them, which is by a ſcrew, inſtead of beds and coins. This new method is more expeditious, and ſaves two men to a gun, and is ſaid to be the invention of his late royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland.

9. Braſs mortars 13 inches diameter, which throw a ſhell of 300 weight; with a number of leſſer mortars and ſhells in proportion.

10. A carcaſe, which they fill at ſieges with pitch, tar, and other combuſtibles, to ſet towns on fire; it is thrown out of an 18 inch mortar, and will burn two hours where it happens to fall.

11. A Spaniſh mortar of 12 inches diameter, taken on board a ſhip in the Weſt-Indies.

12. Six French pieces of cannon, 6 pounders, taken from the rebels at the battle of Culloden, April 16, 1746. This battle laſted but 35 minutes, but the ſlaughter was ſo great, that 3000 rebels fell on the ſpot; it is ſaid that lord Kingſton's horſe killed 10 or 12 of them a piece in the purſuit.

13. A beautiful piece of ordnance, made for king Charles I. when prince of Wales. It is finely ornamented with ſeveral emblematical devices, among which is an eagle throwing a thunderbolt in the clouds.

14. A train of field-pieces, called the galloping train, carrying a ball of one pound and half each.

15. A deſtroying engine that throws 30 hand granadoes at once, and is fired by a train.

16. A moſt curious braſs cannon made for prince Henry, eldeſt ſon of king James I. the ornamenting whereof is ſaid to have coſt 200*l.* It is inſcribed with the makers names, Thomas and Richard Pitt, 1608, who no doubt were proud of the performance, which is indeed a very exquiſite one.

17. A piece with ſeven bores, for throwing ſo many bullets at once; and another with three, made as early as the reign of king Henry VIII.

18. The drum-major's chariot of ſtate with the kettle drums placed; it is drawn by four white horſes at the head of the train, when upon a march.

19. Two French field-pieces, taken at the battle of Hochſtadt, in 1704, in which the French had 12,000 men killed, 5000 wounded, and more than 20,000 taken priſoners.

20. An iron cannon of the firſt invention, being bars of iron hammered together, and hooped from top to bottom with iron hoops, to prevent its burſting. It has no carriage, but was to be moved from place to place by means of ſix rings fixed to it at proper diſtances.

21. A huge mortar, weighing upwards of 6000 weight, and throwing a ſhell of 500 weight two miles: this mortar was fired ſo often againſt Namur in king William's time, that the very touch-hole is melted for want of giving it time to cool. This ſiege is one of the moſt remarkable that is recorded in hiſtory. The place was thought to be impregnable, and yet taken from a compleat army within, headed by a marſhal of France, in the ſight of 100,000 men without, that came to relieve it. Lord Cutts commanded the Engliſh at the general aſſault of the caſtle, where he acquired the name of the Engliſh ſalamander; ſcarce an officer or ſoldier in his corps came off unhurt; the greateſt part fell in the action, which was one of the moſt deſperate that ever was fought.

22. A fine twiſted braſs cannon, 12 feet long, made in the reign of Edward VI. called queen Elizabeth's pocket piſtol, which your guides, by way of joke, will tell you ſhe uſed to wear on her right ſide when ſhe rode a hunting.

23. Two braſs cannon, three bores each, carrying ſix pounders, taken by the duke of Marlborough, at the battle of Ramillies. Here the famous French houſhold troops, which had been boaſted of as impenetrable, were totally defeated and ruined. The French had 8000 men killed, and 6000 taken priſoners.

24. A mortar that throws nine ſhells at a time; out of which the balloons were fired at the late fire-works.

25. A very curious braſs cannon, finely carved, weight 52 c. 3 qrs. 18lb. carrying 24 pounders, with lord Ligonier's coat of arms upon it, and the names of his majeſty's principal officers of ordnance.

Excluſive of thoſe above enumerated, there are in this ſtore room a vaſt number of braſs cannon, all new; together with ſponges, ladles, rammers, hand-ſpikes, wad-hooks, &c. wherewith the walls are lined all round; and under the ceiling there hangs on poles upwards of 4000 harneſs for horſes, beſides men's harneſs, drag ropes, &c. This room, which is at leaſt 380 feet in length, 50 wide, and 24 high, has a paſſage in the middle 16 feet wide, on each ſide of which the artillery are placed. In it are 20 pillars for ſupporting the ſmall armory above, all hung round with implements of war; and beſides the trophies of ſtandards, colours, &c. taken from the enemy, it is now adorned with the tranſparent and well-coloured pictures brought hither from the fire-works played off in the Green Park, on occaſion of the late peace.

Account of the HORSE ARMORY.

IN this place the ſpectator is entertained with a perfect repreſentation of thoſe illuſtrious kings and heroes of our own nation, of whoſe gallant actions he has heard and read ſo much; all of them equipped and ſitting on horſeback, in the ſame bright and ſhining armour they were uſed to wear at the very time when thoſe glorious deeds were performed, which will be for ever remembered to their honour.

In aſcending the ſtair-caſe, juſt as you come to the landing-place, by caſting your eye inward, you'll ſee the figure of a grenadier in his accoutrements, as if upon duty, with his piece reſting upon his arm, which at firſt glance you will be apt to miſtake for real life, ſo admirably has the painter diſcovered the excellence of his art in the repreſentation of this centinel.

Having entered the room, you firſt behold a great number of iron caps and breaſt-plates, moſt of which were in uſe in the laſt war; but the only one that uſed to be ſhewn as a curioſity, hangs upon a beam on the left-hand as you paſs through the entry; it has had the lower edge of the left ſide carried away by a ſlant ſhot of a cannon ball; and, as an old warder uſed to tell the ſtory, the rim of the man's belly that wore it, and part of his bowels, were carried away at the ſame time; notwithſtanding which, being put under the care of a ſkilful ſurgeon, the man recovered, and lived ten years afterwards.

This ſtory the old warder conſtantly told to all ſtrangers, till his late royal highneſs the prince of Wales coming to ſee the curioſities in the Tower, and it falling to the old man's lot to attend his highneſs; when he came to his breaſt-plate, he repeated to him his accuſtomed tale: his royal highneſs liſtened to him with ſeeming pleaſure, and when he had done, looking upon him with a ſmile; and what, friend, ſays he, is there ſo extraordinary in all this? I remember myſelf to have read in a book, of a ſoldier who had his head cleft in two ſo dexterouſly by the enemy, that one half of it fell on one ſhoulder, and the other half on the oppoſite ſhoulder; and yet, on his comrade's clapping the two ſides nicely together again, and binding them cloſe with his handkerchief, the man did well, drank his pot of ale at night, and ſcarcely recollected that ever he had been hurt.

This ſimilar ſtory, ſo ſeaſonably applied, put all the company that attended his royal highneſs into a violent laugh; which ſo daſhed the old warder that he never had courage to tell his ſtory again, ſo that the poor battered breaſt-plate has lain unnoticed ever ſince.

We have already obſerved, that the breaſt-plates here laid up, were almoſt all in uſe in the late war; but were not thought neceſſary at firſt, till the want of them was felt at the battle of Dettingen, when the black muſketeers of the enemy being covered with their cuiraſſes, (the ſame piece of armour with the addition of a back piece) pierced the very lines of our army, and rode up undaunted to the muzzles of our guns, till being flanked by our foot, and ill ſupported by their own troops, they were forced to retreat, though with an inconſiderable loſs, conſidering their deſperate attempt.

This plainly diſcovered the great uſe of breaſt-plates, and orders were ſent to England for the immediate embarkation of all that were in the Tower fit for ſervice. In the wars of queen Anne, there was the ſame omiſſion, till the duke of Marlborough being convinced of the diſadvantage his horſe fought under againſt an enemy entrenched, as it were, in iron; ſent lord Cadogan over, who went himſelf to the Tower, and choſe out as many breaſt and back-plates, as he could find for his purpoſe; but the duke would not ſuffer the latter to be worn, being, as he ſaid, an uſeleſs incumbrance; for he was ſure his men would never ſhew their backs to the enemy.

Moſt of thoſe breaſt-plates are muſquet-proof; they are quilted on the inſide, and ſo contrived as to cover the whole trunk of the body, and yet, by the manner of fixing them on, are very little trouble to the wearer. There are likewiſe to be ſeen here a great many curiaſſes taken from the French, out of a ſhip called the Holy Ghoſt, and marked Torras, which might poſſibly be the the name of the admiral.

What has been ſaid above is rather by way of remark than deſcription.———When you enter the room, your conductor directs you to obſerve,

1. The figures of the horſe and foot, on your left hand, ſuppoſed to be drawn up in military order to attend the kings on the other ſide of the houſe; theſe figures are as big as the life, have lately been painted, and have a very noble appearance.

2. The large tilting lance of Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, king Henry the VIIIth's general in France.—This nobleman excelled at the then faſhionable diverſion of tilting, and engaging king Henry VIII. who was likewiſe paſſionately fond of that royal exerciſe, gave the king ſuch a ſhock with his ſpear, that had like to have coſt him his life.—The duke's valour had indeed been ſufficiently tried in France, when he attended princeſs Mary of England on her marriage with Lewis XIIth.—On this occaſion, Francis de Valois, preſumptive heir to the crown of France, being willing to give ſome proof of his valour, cauſed juſts to be proclaimed; theſe juſts continued three days, in which 305 men at arms were anſwered by their defendants; of whom ſome were ſo hurt, that they died ſoon after. Francis had choſen the duke and marquis of Dorſet two of his aids, and being hurt himſelf at firſt, deſired the duke and marquis to fight at barriers, who therefore took the firſt place againſt all comers. In the mean time Francis, as was thought, intending an affront to the duke, cauſed a German, the ſtrongeſt about the court, to be armed ſecretly, and to preſent himſelf: they both did well; yet the duke at laſt, with the but-end of his ſpear, ſtruck the German till he ſtaggered; and then the rail was let fall: having breathed a while, they renewed the fight, when the duke ſo mauled the German about the head, that the blood guſhed out of his noſe and ears, and then he was ſecretly conveyed away. Before this encounter, the duke had likewiſe unhorſed a gentleman at tilts, and hurt him prodigiouſly.

3. A complete ſuit of tilting armour, ſuch as the kings, nobility, and gentlemen at arms, uſed to exerciſe in on horſeback; at which diverſion one of the kings of France is ſaid to have been killed by a ſhiver of a ſpear ſtriking him in the eye.—Likewiſe the tilting lance, the reſt for the tilting lance, with the grand guard and the ſlits before the eye, through which they take the ſight.

4. A compleat ſuit of armour made for king Henry VIII. when he was but eighteen years of age, rough from the hammer: 'tis at leaſt ſix feet high, and the joints in the hands, arms, thighs, knees, and feet, play like the joints of a rattleſnake, and are moved with all the facility imaginable.—The method of learning the exerciſe of tilting was upon wooden horſes ſet on caſtors, which, by the ſway of the body, could be moved every way; ſo that by frequent practice the rider could ſhift, parry, ſtrike, unhorſe, and recover with ſurprizing dexterity. Some of the horſes in this armory had undoubtedly been made uſe of for this purpoſe; and it is but lately that the caſtors have been taken from their feet.

5. A little ſuit of armour made for king Charles II. when he was prince of Wales, and about ſeven or eight years of age, with a piece of armour for his horſe's head; the whole moſt curiouſly wrought and inlaid with ſilver.

6. Lord Courcy's armour, who, as the warders tell you, was grand champion in Ireland, and, as a proof, ſhew you the very ſword he took from the champion of France, for which valiant action he and all his ſucceſſors have the honour to wear their hats in the king's preſence; which privilege, add they, is enjoyed by Lord Kinſale, as head of that ancient and noble family, at this day.—It is recorded indeed of this Courcy, that when a conſpiracy was formed againſt him in Ireland, by his own ſervants, at the inſtigation of Hugh de Lacy, who was jealous of his power, though he was betrayed at his devotions, he laid thirteen of the conſpirators dead at his feet before he was overpowered. He was afterwards committed priſoner to the Tower of London, and it is not unlikely that what is ſhewn is the very armour he brought with him to that priſon.

7. Real coats of mail called brigandine jackets: They conſiſt of ſmall bits of ſteel, ſo artfully quilted one over another as to reſiſt the point of a ſword, or even, we imagine, a muſket bullet, and yet they are ſo flexible, that you may bend your body in them any way, as well as in ordinary cloathing.

8. An Indian ſuit of armour, ſent as a preſent to king Charles II. from the great mogul: this is indeed a great curioſity: It is made of iron quills about two inches long; finely japanned and ranged in rows, one row ſlipping over another very artificially; they are bound together with ſilk twiſt very ſtrong: They are uſed in that country as a defence againſt darts and arrows poiſoned or unpoiſoned.

9. A neat little ſuit of armour, in which is a carved figure repreſenting Richard duke of York, king Edward the IVth's youngeſt ſon, who, with his brother Edward V. were ſmothered in the Tower by order of Richard III. their uncle and guardian. The manner of their deaths was this: one Sir James Tyrrel, a ſtrong reſolute fellow, having a commiſſion from the king for that purpoſe, and employing one Miles Forreſt, a common ruffian, and John Deighton his own groom, theſe two wretches, by night, entered the room where the young princes, attended only by one ſervant, were confined, and while they ſlept, ſmothered them in their bed-cloaths. After this, Tyrrel ordered them to be buried at the ſtair foot, deep under ground; where their bones were found in the reign of king Charles II.

10. The armour of the great John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaſter, who was the ſon, father and uncle of a king, but was never king himſelf. Dugdale ſays, that more kings and ſovereign princes ſprang from his loins than from any king in Chriſtendom. He was interred with Blanch, his firſt wife, on the north ſide of the choir of the old cathedral church of St. Paul; and on his monument hung his helmet and ſpear; as alſo his his target covered with horn; which precious reliques were unfortunately conſumed with that ſtately edifice itſelf, by the dreadful fire of London. The armour here ſhewn is ſeven feet high, and the ſword and lance are of an enormous ſize.

11. The droll figure of Will Somers, who was, as the warders tell you, king Henry the VIIIth's jeſter.

12. A collar of torment, which, (ſay your conductors) uſed formerly to be put about the womens necks, that cuckolded their huſbands, or ſcolded at them when they came home late.

You are next ſhewn the line of kings, which, to follow the order of your conductor, we muſt reverſe the order of their chronology, and deſcribe the laſt firſt, as

1. His late majeſty king George I. in a compleat ſuit of armour, ſitting with a truncheon in his hand on a white horſe, richly capariſoned, having a fine Turkey bridle gilt with gold, with a globe, creſcent, and ſtar; velvet furniture laced with gold, and gold trappings. This prince was born in 1660, came to the crown on the death of queen Anne, Auguſt 1, 1714, and died June 11, 1727, on his journey to Hanover.

2. The late king William III. dreſſed in the very ſuit of armour worn by Edward the Black prince, ſon of Edward III. in the famous battle of Creſſy, wherein the French loſt 11 princes, 18 baronets, 1200 knights, 1500 gentlemen at arms, 4000 ſquires, who were mounted on horſeback; and 30,000 common men. He is mounted on a ſorrel horſe, whoſe furniture is green velvet embroidered with ſilver, and holds in his right hand a flaming ſword. The battle of the Boyne, in Ireland, and the taking of Namur, are the only memorable victories of this warlike king; who was born in 1650, aſcended the Britiſh throne on the abdication of king James II. his father-in-law, February 13, 1688, and died March 8, 1702, by a fall from his horſe.

3. King Charles II. dreſſed in the armour that was worn by the champion of England at the coronation of his late majeſty. There is nothing very memorable in this king's ſtory, but his ſufferings, and his reſtoration to the crown after twelve years baniſhment. He ſits with a truncheon in his hand on a fine horſe richly capariſoned with crimſon velvet laced with gold. He was born in 1630, ſucceeded to the throne on the death of his father Charles I. January 30th, 1649, and died February 6, 1684.

4. King Charles I. in a rich ſuit of his own proper armour, gilt with gold and curiouſly wrought, preſented to him by the city of London when he was prince of Wales; and in the ſame armour that was laid on the coffin at the funeral proceſſion of the late great duke of Marlborough; on which occaſion a collar of SS's was added to it, and is now round it.

The civil wars in this prince's reign, and his untimely death, afford a very melancholy ſtory, which will never be forgotten. He was born in 1600, ſucceeded his father king James I. March 27, 1625, and was beheaded in ſight of his own palace gates, January 30, 1649.

5. James I. of England and VIth of Scotland. By his ſucceeding to the throne of England, on the death of queen Elizabeth, the kingdoms of England and Scotland, which till then had been at continual wars, were united under one head. He ſits on horſeback with a truncheon in his right hand, dreſſed in a complete ſuit of figured armour. He was born in 1566, mounted the Engliſh throne March 24, 1603, and died March 27, 1625, after one of the moſt inglorious reigns of any recorded in the annals of this kingdom.

6. King Edward VI. the firſt proteſtant prince that ever reigned in England (if Henry VIII. the father of the reformation be excepted.) He is ſaid by ſome to have been cut out of the belly of his mother lady Jane Seymour, but that queen lived twelve days after her delivery. The memorable acts of his reign are thoſe of charity and benificence. He gave to the citizens of London three hoſpitals: to wit, that of Chriſt-Church, for the maintenance and education of poor citizens children; that of Bridewell, for breeding them up to trades: and that of St. Thomas, for healing the ſick and diſeaſed. He is dreſſed in a moſt curious ſuit of ſteel armour, whereon are depicted in different compartments, a vaſt variety of ſcripture hiſtories, alluding to battles and other memorable paſſages. He ſits on horſeback like the reſt, with a truncheon in his right hand. He was born October 12, 1537, proclaimed king January 31, 1548, and died July 6, 1553.

7, King Henry VIII. in his own proper armour, being of poliſhed ſteel, the foliages whereof are gilt or inlaid with gold. In his right hand he bears a ſword, but whether of cruelty or mercy, will hardly, I think, admit a doubt. His reign is marked with the divorce and murder of wives, the deſtruction of religious houſes and monaſteries, and by a defiance of all laws divine and human. He was indeed an infamous villain; and yet to his vices we are in a great meaſure indebted for the enjoyment of the reformed religion. He was born June 28, 1491, ſucceeded his father Henry VII, April 22, 1509, and died January 28, 1547.

8. Henry VII. who killed Richard III. in the memorable battle of Boſworth-Field, and by marrying Elizabeth, eldeſt daughter of Edward IV. united the two famous houſes of York and Lancaſter, about whoſe claims to the throne a deluge of Engliſh blood had been poured forth. This prince holds likewiſe a ſword in his hand, and ſits on horſeback in a complete ſuit of armour, finely wrought and waſhed with ſilver. He was born in 1457, crowned October 30, 1485, and died April 12, 1509.

9. Edward V. who, with his brother Richard, as has been ſaid, was ſmothered in the Tower: he was proclaimed king, but never crowned; for which reaſon a crown is hung over his head: he is in a rich ſuit of armour finely decorated, and holds a lance in his right hand.

10. King Edward IV. father to the unhappy princes abovementioned: his reign is ſtained with blood and luſt; and though he was fortunate in moſt of his battles, yet his victories were all at the expence of his own ſubjects. At the battle of Townton 36,000 Engliſh are ſaid to have been killed; and during his reign, Guthrie ſays no leſs than 200,000 Engliſh loſt their lives in the conteſt conteſt between Henry of Lancaſter and this Edward of York. He was equally formed for love and war, and his gallantries with the citizens wives, amongſt which was the famous Jane Shore, are ſtill remembered with deteſtation. He is here diſtinguiſhed by a ſuit of bright armour ſtudded, and by holding in his right hand a drawn ſword. He was born in 1441, began his reign March 4, 1460, and died in 1483.

11. King Henry VI. who though crowned king of France at Paris, loſt all that kingdom. In his reign no leſs than ſixteen battles were fought at home and abroad. The bloody civil wars commenced between the houſes of York and Lancaſter, already mentioned. The rebellion of Jack Cade, who entered London, and beheaded lord Say, happened in his reign. The famous Joan of Arc, or maid of Orleans ſtarted up alſo, and ſpread her fame through all Europe by raiſing the ſiege of Orleans. In his time alſo the art of printing was introduced into England. He was born in 1422, began his reign Auguſt 31, the ſame year (being an infant) and was murdered in the Tower by the duke of Glouceſter in 1471.

12. The warlike and victorious Henry V. who by his conqueſts in France gained immortal glory. He cauſed himſelf to be acknowledged regent, and preſumptive heir of that kingdom. With only 9000 Engliſh, he defeated 15000 French at the battle of Agincourt, where he took more priſoners than he had men in his army. Near Harfleur 15000 French were defeated by 1500 Engliſh. This prince was Sir John Falſtaff's companion. He was born in 1389, began to reign March 20, 1413, and died Auguſt 31, 1422. A ſhort reign, but full of glory.

13. Henry IV. ſon of the great John of Gaunt. his reign is made infamous by a bloody ſtatute to burn heretics. He was notwithſtanding valiant; but his courage was employed to ſecure himſelf on a throne to which he had but ſlight pretenſions. Four inſurrections againſt him were defeated, the greateſt of which he quelled himſelf by the battle of Shrewſbury, wherein Harry Hotſpur, and 10,000 rebels fell, beſides as many of his own troops. He twice beat the Welſh under Owen Glendower. He was born in 1367, aſcended the throne September 20, 1396, and died March 20, 1413.

14. Edward III. John of Gaunt's father, and father to Edward the Black prince, of whom we have already ſpoken. Beſides the battle of Creſſy, the ever memorable battle of Poictiers was fought by this king, at which John, king of France, was taken priſoner and brought to England, where he met David, king of Scots, a priſoner alſo; and theſe two, accompanied by the king of England and the king of Cyprus, who happened to be on his travels at the Engliſh court, were all entertained at a banquet, by a citizen of London, as hath been already mentioned in this work. David, king of Scots, was afterwards ranſomed for 10,000 marks, and John, king of France, for 500,000 crowns. Edward, the Black Prince, died in 1376, to the inexpreſſible grief of the king and the whole nation; but his ſon Richard II. ſuccceded to the throne, whereby the famous John of Gaunt was excluded. Edward III. is repreſented here with a venerable old grey beard, and in a ſuit of plain bright armour, with two crowns on his ſword, alluding to the two kingdoms France and England, of both which he was crowned king, and was the firſt who quartered the arms of France with his own; adding the motto, Dieu et mon Droit. He was born in 1312, called to the throne on the depoſition of his father, January 25, 1326, and died June 21 1377, after a glorious reign of fifty years.

15. Edward I. in a very curious ſuit of gilt armour, with this peculiarity, that the ſhoes thereof are of mail. He is repreſented with a battle-ax in his hand, perhaps to diſtinguiſh him from the reſt, he being the only king in the line that had employed his arms againſt the Turks and Infidels, by an expedition to the Holy-Land. The warders tell you, that being there ſhot with a poiſoned arrow, his queen who accompanied him, ſucking the wound, ſhe died, and he lived; and add, that he afterwards brought her corpſe over, and buried it in Weſtminſter-Abbey; but Camden, who reports this fact, tells it thus: "when "her huſband was treacherouſly wounded by a "Moor with a poiſonous dagger, and the wounds, "by reaſon of the malignity of the poiſon, "could not be cloſed, ſhe licked them daily with "her own tongue, and ſucked out the venemous "humour; by the power whereof he was en-"tirely cured of his wound, and ſhe eſcaped "unhurt." This fact happpened in 1272, the queen (Eleanor of Caſtile) died at Herdby in Lincolnſhire, November 29, 1290, being 18 years after; from whence ſhe was carried to Weſtminſter-Abbey, and there pompouſly interred by order of her huſband. This warlike prince conquered Wales; aſſerted a right of ſovereignty over Scotland; raiſed Baliol to the throne of that kingdom; and afterwards cited him before the parliament at Weſtminſter to anſwer to a complaint made againſt him by the earl of Fife. He was every where victorious, and his reign is famed for acts of juſtice, and is one of the faireſt in the Engliſh hiſtory. He was born in 1239, made the Cruſade in his father's life-time, and received the news of his death, and the advancement to the crown, in his journey home. He began his reign November 16, 1272, and died of the bloody flux, July 7, 1307.

16. The firſt in the line though laſt ſhewn, ſits Willliam the conqueror, duke of Normandy, in a ſuit of plain armour. This valiant prince having with his Normans, on ſome pretence of right to the crown, invaded England, by one deciſive battle accompliſhed his great deſign. This memorable battle was fought October 13, 1066, near Haſtings in Suſſex, in which king Harold, with the flower of the Engliſh nobility and beſt warriors, were ſlain. Some authors affirm, that this victory was obtained by means of the broad arrow and long bow which the Normans were in poſſeſſion of, and with which the Engliſh were then utterly unacquainted, though afterwards they became ſuch expert archers, that with the ſame weapons they conquered France. The glory of William's reign and of his victories, is ſtained by the cruel and arbitrary foreſt laws he enacted, and the waſte and devaſtation he made by converting a tract of land, of more than threeſcore miles in circumference, into a den of wild beaſts, driving the inhabitants out, and and filling their habitations with wolves and boars; forbidding at the ſame time thoſe unhappy men, whoſe lands and properties he had invaded, on pain of death, to kill either deer or wild boar. He was born in 1027, was crowned October 14, 1066, and died September 9, 1087.

Over the door, as you go out of this armory, is a target, on which are engraved, by a maſterly hand, the figures, of fortune, fortitude and juſtice; and round the room, the walls are every where lined with various old uncommon pieces of armour, ſuch as targets, caps, horſes heads, breaſt plates, and many other ſorts, for which the very names have not deſcended to modern times.

Account of the JEWEL-OFFICE.

A Deſcription of this place has already been given; nothing therefore now remains, but to give an account of the curioſities contained in it.

1. The imperial crown that all the kings of England have been crowned with ſince Edward the Confeſſor 1042. It is of gold, enriched with diamonds, rubies, emeralds, ſapphires and pearls. The cap within is of purple velvet, lined with white taffaty, turned up with three rows of ermine. —They are miſtaken in ſhewing this as the ancient imperial diadem of St. Edward; for that with the other ancient regalia of this kingdom was kept in the arched room in the cloyſters of Weſtminſter-Abbey till the grand rebellion, when in 1642 Harry Martin, by order of the then parliament, broke open the iron cheſt in which it was ſecured, took it thence, and ſold it, together with the robes, ſword and ſcepter of St. Edward. After the reſtoration, king Charles II. had one made like it, which is what is ſhewn at preſent

2. The golden orb or globe, put into the king's right hand before he is crowned; and borne in his left, with the ſcepter in his right, upon his return into Weſtminſter-Hall after he is crowned. It is about ſix inches in diameter, edged with pearl, and enriched with precious ſtones. On the top is an amethyſt, of a violet colour, near an inch and a half in height, ſet upon a rich croſs of gold, adorned with diamonds, pearls and precious ſtones. The whole height of the ball and cup is eleven inches.

3. The golden ſcepter, with its croſs, ſet upon a large amethyſt, of great value, garniſhed round with table diamonds. The handle of the ſceptre is plain, but the pummel is ſet round with rubies, emeralds, and ſmall diamonds. The top riſes into a Fleur de lis of ſix leaves, all enriched with precious ſtones, from whence iſſueth a mound or ball made of the amethyſt already mentioned.

The ſceptre is a very ancient enſign of kingly power. Among the Jews, it was uſed as an emblem of power and royalty, and ſpiritually as a weapon to oppoſe the wicked, and protect the good. The croſs is quite covered with precious ſtones.

4. The ſceptre with the dove, the emblem of peace, perched on the top of a ſmall Jeruſalem croſs, finely ornamented with table diamonds and jewels of great value. This emblem was firſt uſed by Edward the Confeſſor, as appears by his ſeal. It is alſo marked on the ſeals of Henry I. Stephen, and Henry II. but omitted by Richard I. Richard II. aſſumed it again on his ſeal, and it was alſo uſed by Edward IV. and Richard III. The ancient one was ſold with the reſt. This now in the Tower, was made after the reſtoration.

A bold attempt was made in the reign of king Charles II. to carry off theſe enſigns of royalty, the particulars whereof are worth reciting, as it is, perhaps, the moſt ſingular enterprize that ever was undertaken. The projector of this theft was one Col. Blood, by birth a gentleman of Ireland, who, having ſpent his ſubſtance in following the fortune of king Charles II. while in adverſity, thought himſelf hardly uſed, by being neglected when that prince was reſtored to his throne; and therefore, after being engaged in ſeveral very deſperate, though unſucceſsful plots, ſuch as ſurprizing the caſtle of Dublin, ſeizing the perſon of the duke of Ormond, and others, he at length thought of a ſcheme to make himſelf amends, once for all, by ſeizing the crown, globe, ſceptre, and dove, and carrying them all off together; for this purpoſe, he put himſelf into a habit of a doctor of divinity, with a little band, a long falſe beard, a cap with ears, and all thoſe formalities of garb belonging to that degree, except the gown, chooſing rather to make uſe of a cloak, as moſt proper for his deſign.

Thus habited, Blood, with a woman whom he called his wife, went to ſee the curioſities in the Tower; and while they were viewing the regalia, the ſuppoſed Mrs. Blood pretended to be taken ſuddenly ill, and deſired Mr. Edwards (the keeper of the regalia) to aſſiſt her with a dram.

This being drank, ſhe was invited to repoſe herſelf on a bed, which ſhe did, and after a pretended recovery, took her leave, together with Blood, with many expreſſions of gratitude.

In a few days afterwards Blood returned, and preſented Mrs. Edwards (the keeper's wife) with four pair of white gloves, in return for her civility.

This brought on an acquaintance, which being ſoon improved into a ſtrict intimacy, a marriage was propoſed between a ſon of Edwards, and a ſuppoſed daughter of colonel Blood; but Edwards's ſon being at ſea, the pretended daughter was under no neceſſity of appearing.

The night before the fact was to be done, the doctor told the old man, that he had ſome friends at his houſe that wanted to ſee the regalia, but that they were to go out of town pretty early in the morning; and therefore hoped he would gratify them with the ſight, though they might come a little before the uſual hour. (Blood had engaged three accomplices, named Deſborough, Kelſy and Perrot, in this enterprize) Accordingly two of them came, accompanied by the doctor, about eight in the morning, and the third held their horſes that waited for them at the outer gate of the Tower ready ſaddled; they had no other apparatus but a wallet and a wooden mallet, which there was no great difficulty to conceal.

Upon their approach, the old man received them with great civility; and preſently admitted them into his office; but as it is cuſtomary for the

the keeper of the regalia, when he ſhews them, to lock himſelf up in a kind of grate with open bars, that thoſe things of high value may be ſeen but not ſoiled, the old man had no ſooner opened the door of this place, but the doctor and his companions were in at his heels, and without giving him time to aſk queſtions, ſilenced him, by knocking him down with the wooden mallet; they then inſtantly made flat the bows of the crown to make it more portable, ſeized the ſceptre and dove, put them into the wallet together, and were preparing to make their eſcape, when, unfortunately for them, the old man's ſon, who had not been at home for ten years before, came from ſea in the very inſtant; and being told that his father was with ſome friends, that would be very glad to ſee him, at the jewel-office, he poſted thither immediately, and met Blood and his companions as they were juſt coming out; who, inſtead of returning and ſecuring him, as in good policy they ſhould have done; they hurried away with the crown and globe, but not having time to file the ſceptre, they left it behind them.

By this time old Edwards, who had not been ſo much hurt as the villains had apprehended, recovered his legs, and cried out murder, treaſon, murder.

The daughter hearing her father's cries, ran out and gave an alarm; and Blood and Perrot, making more than ordinary haſte, were obſerved to jog each others elbows as they went, which gave reaſon for ſuſpecting them.

The villains were now advanced beyond the main-guard; but the alarm being given to the warder at the draw-bridge, he put himſelf in a poſture to ſtop their progreſs.

Blood diſcharged a piſtol at the warder, who, though unhurt, fell to the ground through fear; by which they got ſafe to the little ward-houſe gate, where one Sill, who had been a ſoldier under Oliver Cromwell, ſtood centinel; but though this man ſaw the warder, to all appearance, ſhot, he made no reſiſtance to Blood and his aſſociates, who now got over the draw-bridge, and through the outward gate upon the wharf.

Captain Beckman, who had purſued them from Edwards's houſe, now overtook them; on which Blood diſcharged his ſecond piſtol at Beckman's head; but he ſtooping down at the inſtant, the ſhot miſſed him, and he ſeized Blood, who had the crown under his cloak.

Notwithſtanding Blood was in this ſituation, he ſtruggled a long while to preſerve his prize; and when it was at length wreſted from him, he ſaid, "It was a gallant attempt, how unſucceſsful ſo-"ever; for it was for a crown!"

Another perſon ſeized Perrot before Blood was taken; and young Edwards obſerving a perſon that was bloody in the ſcuffle, was going to run him through the body; but was prevented by captain Beckman, who cried out "Hold, he is "none of them."

The next thing to be done, was to confine the priſoners, and acquaint his majeſty with the nature of their offence, and take directions from court how to proceed.

The reſult was, that the king had a fancy to examine Blood himſelf; and while all men thought that ſome new puniſhment would be deviſed to torture ſo daring on offender, his majeſty thought proper not only to pardon him and his accomplices, but to grant Blood a penſion, ſome ſay of 500*l.* a year during his life.

What the motives were, that induced his majeſty to ſhew ſo much lenity to a man, who had been engaged in ſo many plots and conſpiracies, is yet a ſecret, and ever muſt remain ſo; many conjectures were formed, and ſurmiſes made, but no man knew the truth.

Blood ſoon after died with grief, being convicted of a plot againſt the duke of Buckingham, who laid a heavy accuſation of Scandalum Magnatum againſt him, by which he was like to remain a priſoner for life; though moſt people were of opinion, that this plot was forged againſt him by his enemies; and having eſcaped puniſhment for what he did do, ſuffered at laſt for what he did not do.

We have but juſt hinted that Blood was engaged in the plot to ſurprize Dublin caſtle, and another to ſeize the perſon of the duke of Ormond; of both which, though a little foreign to our ſubject, we ſhall give a brief account.

Upon the reſtoration, many Engliſh, Scots, and Iriſh were diſſatisfied, and wanted only a head to lead them into action. Colonel Blood having declared himſelf of their party, was thought a proper perſon for that purpoſe; and, as nothing could be attempted in England with any probability of ſucceſs, Ireland was pitched upon for the ſcene of rebellion.

The colonel knowing what advantage it would be to their cauſe, to be maſter of ſome place of ſtrength, propoſed to begin with the ſurprize of Dublin caſtle; which was accordingly to have been attempted on the twenty-ninth of May, the anniverſary of the king's return, in the following manner.

Blood, with a company of reſolute fellows, were, under a pretence of preſenting a petition to the duke of Ormond, then lord lieutenant, to have procured admittance, and ſeized his perſon, while about fourſcore choſen foot, in the habit of tradeſmen, were to have waited without, and upon a certain ſignal to have ſurprized the guards.

But this plot, by the treachery of one of the conſpirators, having been defeated before it was ripe, a proclamation was iſſued out, with a reward of five hundred pounds for the apprehenſion of any of the ringleaders: in conſequence whereof, one Mr. Lockey, brother-in-law to Blood, was taken, tried, and executed, and Blood himſelf obliged to make his eſcape; but with a full reſolution to be revenged on the duke of Ormond, by whoſe vigilance his views had been diſappointed, and his brother-in-law hanged.

But it was not till nine years afterwards, that he durſt attempt any thing upon the duke's perſon; when having engaged five of his old and truſty friends, on the ſixth of December, 1670, being all well armed and mounted, they beſet the duke's coach, as he was paſſing from St. James's palace, through the long ſtreet to Clarendon-houſe, where the duke then reſided; and having knocked out the flambeaux, and ſecured the attendants, they forced the duke out of his coach, and had actually

actually tied him behind one of their aſſociates, (who was to have rode with him without ſtopping till he came to an appointed place, where they were to meet him, and conſult what advantage they ſhould make of their priſoner) when his grace's porter, being apprized of his maſter's danger, by a boy who concealed himſelf under the coach, and eſcaped, ſeaſonably came to his reſcue; but what is very ſurpriſing, not one of the ruffians were ever apprehended, though a thouſand pounds reward was offered, till the attempt already related diſcovered them, and then they were all pardoned. But to return to our account of the curioſities; the other jewels ſhewn here are,

5. St. Edward's ſtaff, in length four feet ſeven inches and an half, and three inches and three quarters in circumference, all of beaten gold, which is carried before the king at his coronation.

6. A rich ſalt-ſeller of ſtate, in form like the ſquare White Tower, and ſo exquiſitely wrought, that the workmanſhip of modern times is in no degree equal to it. It is of gold, and uſed only on the king's table at the coronation.

7. The curtana, or ſword of mercy, the blade 32 inches long, and near two broad, is without a point, and is borne naked before the king at his coronation, between the two ſwords of juſtice, ſpiritual and temporal.

8. A noble ſilver font, double gilt with gold, and elegantly wrought, in which the royal family are chriſtened.

9. A large ſilver fountain, preſented to king Charles the ſecond, by the town of Plymouth, very curiouſly wrought, but far ſhort of that already deſcribed.

10. The rich crown of ſtate, that his majeſty wears in parliament, in which is a large emerald ſeven inches round, the fineſt pearl in the world, and a ruby of prodigious value.

11. His royal highneſs the prince of Wales's crown. Theſe two laſt named crowns, when his majeſty goes to the parliament houſe, are carried by the keeper of the jewel-office, attended by the warders, privately in a hackney-coach to White-hall: there they are delivered to the officers appointed to receive them, who, with ſome yeomen of the guard, carry them to the robing rooms, where his majeſty and the prince robe themſelves. The king wears his crown on his head as he ſits upon the throne; but that of the prince of Wales is placed before him, to ſhew that he is not yet come to it, As ſoon as the king is diſrobed, the two crowns are re-conducted to the Tower by the ſame perſons that brought them.

12. The late queen Mary's crown, globe, and ſceptre, with the diadem ſhe wore in proceeding to her coronation with her conſort the late king William.

13. An ivory ſceptre with a dove on the top, made for the late king James the ſecond's queen, whoſe garniture is gold, and the dove on the top gold, enamelled with white.

14. The golden ſpurs, and the armillas, which are bracelets for the wriſts, very antique, and worn at the coronation.

15. Laſtly, the ampulla, or eagle of gold, finely engraved, which holds the holy oil the kings and queens of England are anointed with; and the golden ſpoon that the biſhop pours the oil into. Theſe are two pieces of great antiquity. The golden eagle, including the pedeſtal, is about nine inches high, and the wings expand about ſeven inches; the whole weighs about ten ounces. The head of the eagle ſcrews off about the middle of the neck, which is made hollow, for holding the holy oil; and when the king is anointed by the biſhop, the oil is poured into the ſpoon out of the bird's beak.

There are in the jewel-office, beſides theſe commonly ſhewn, all the crown jewels, worn by the prince and princeſſes at the coronations, and a vaſt variety of curious old plate; but what is already deſcribed is ſufficient to gratify any reaſonable ſpectator; though it muſt be confeſſed, that the eye can never be ſatisfied with ſeeing, where the objects are ſo admirably adapted to excite and to gratify curioſity.

Account of the MINT and its OFFICERS, and the manner of ſtamping money.

THE Mint is the office for coining gold, ſilver, and copper, and is conducted by a number of officers, whoſe titles and employments are as follows:

1. The Warden. The buſineſs of the warden is to receive the ſilver &c. from the goldſmiths, to pay for it, and to ſuper-intend all the other perſons belonging to the office.
2. The Maſter-Worker. He receives the ſilver &c. from the warden, orders it to be melted, delivers it to the moniers, and receives it back from them.
3. The Comptroller. It is this perſon's buſineſs to ſee that the money is made to a juſt aſſize, to overlook the officers, and to controul them, if the money does not prove as it ought.
4. The Maſter of the Aſſay. His buſineſs is to weigh the bullion, and take care that it be according to the ſtandard.
5. The Auditor. This gentleman inſpects and ſettles the accompts.
6. The Surveyor of the melting. His employment is to ſee the bullion caſt out, and that the metal is not altered after the aſſay-maſter has made trial of it, and it is delivered to the melter.
7. The Clerk of the irons. His buſineſs is to take care that the working irons are kept clean, and fit for uſe.
8. The Engraver. This perſon is employed in engraving the ſtamps for the money.
9. The Melters. Their buſineſs is to melt the bullion before it comes to be coined.
10. The Blanchers. Theſe perſons anneal, boil, and cleanſe the money.
11. The Proveſt. This perſon provides for all the moniers, and ſuperintends them.
12. The Moniers. Their buſineſs is to ſhear the money, and forge it: ſome beat it broad, others round it, and ſome ſtamp, or coin it.

The only part of the proceſs reſpecting the coining of money which we are permitted to ſee, is the ſtamping it; which is performed in a very expeditious manner, by means of an engine worked ſometimes by three and ſometimes by four men.

The manner of ſtamping gold and halfpence is exactly the ſame, only a little more care is neceſſary in one than in the other, in order to prevent waſte. The engine works by a ſpindle, like that of a printing preſs; to the point of which the head of the die is fixed with a ſcrew, and in a little ſort of a cup which receives it, is placed the reverſe: between theſe the piece of metal, already cut round to the ſize, and, if gold, exactly weighed, is placed; and by once pulling down the ſpindle, with a jerk, is compleatly ſtamped. It is amazing to ſee how dexterouſly the coiner performs this; for as faſt as the men that work the engine turn the ſpindle, ſo faſt does he ſupply it with metal, putting in the unſtamped piece with his fore-finger and thumb, and twitching out the ſtamp, with his middle finger. The ſilver and gold thus ſtampt are afterwards milled round the edges, the manner of performing which is kept a profound ſecret, and therefore our readers cannot expect a deſcription of it.

Account

Account of the Office of ORDNANCE, with a liſt of its Officers.

THE office of ordnance is kept in Cold Harbour; to which office all the other offices for ſupplying artillery, arms, &c. to any part of his majeſty's dominions, are accountable; and from thence are iſſued all orders for the diſpoſition of warlike materials, for every kind of ſervice.

In ancient times, before the uſe of gunpowder was known, the buſineſs of this office was conducted by officers who were diſtinguiſhed by the names of bowyer, the croſs-bowyer, the galeator, the armourer, and the keeper of the tents.

The buſineſs of the bowyer was to make and take care of the bows: the croſs-bowyer provided accoutrements for the bows: the galeator was purveyor of the helmets or head-pieces: the armourer was the keeper of the king's armour within the Tower: and the buſineſs of the keeper of the tents is fully explained by the title itſelf.

Beſides the abovementioned, there was a maſter ſmith, whoſe pay, in the reign of Edward the firſt, was four-pence halfpenny per day from the crown, and three-pence per day from the Warders or Tower-guards: likewiſe a maſter-maſon, and a maſter carpenter, each of whom had twelve pence per day, payable at the exchequer, and a robe once a year.

The office of ordnance continued under the direction of the abovementioned officers till the reign of Henry the eighth, who gave the management of it to a maſter, lieutenant, ſurveyor, &c. and in this manner it has continued, ſome improvements excepted, to the preſent time.

CHAP.

CHAPTER XX.

The city walls repaired in conſequence of the king's writ. A plot againſt the duke of Glouceſter's life defeated. The addreſs of the city to the king, with the effects it produced. Sir Nicholas Brembre hanged at Tyburn. A grand tournament in Smithfield. The city refuſes to lend the king money. Account of a dangerous riot. Mayor of London and others, impriſoned and fined. Citizens fined three thouſand marks. The king and queen make a public entry into London. Ten thouſand pounds paid by the Londoners for the privilege of chuſing their own mayor, which had been illegally taken from them. Order of parliament reſpecting layſtalls. The ſeveral wards of London taxed. Proceſſion of queen Iſabella. The king compelled to reſign his crown, and Henry, duke of Hereford recognized king of England.

HAVING in the laſt chapter given an account of the Tower of London, agreeable to our invariable plan of introducing a deſcription of the moſt remarkable places in this city and its ſuburbs, where ſuch deſcription can be introduced with the greateſt propriety, we will now reſume the thread of our narrative, reciting every intereſting event in chronological order.

This kingdom being threatened with a French invaſion in the year 1316, when the beſt of the Engliſh troops were in Spain, whither they had been ſent to ſupport the pretences of the king's uncle, the duke of Lancaſter, to the crown of Caſtile; it was thought neceſſary to put the city in a proper ſtate of defence, in caſe it ſhould be attacked by the French, as was then apprehended.

In order, therefore, to advance this work as much as poſſible, the king iſſued a writ to the citizens of London, of which the following is a faithful tranſlation.

"The king to his beloved the mayor and al-
" dermen, and the reſt of the citizens of Lon" don, ſendeth health. Know ye, that as well
" the walls and other defences or forts of the " ſaid city be old and weak, and, for want of " repair, are fallen down in ſome places; as alſo
" the ditches of the ſaid city are exceedingly " filled with dirt, dunghills, and other filth, and
" with graſs growing in the ſame, not only to
" the evident danger of the ſaid city and inhabi" tants thereof, (and chiefly at this preſent time of " war) but alſo to the manifeſt diſgrace and
" ſcandal of us and the whole city, &c."

His majeſty then gives the mayor and citizens a licence to take a toll on all kinds of victuals and merchandize brought into the city for the ſpace of ten years, in order to defray the expence of the intended repairs.

Thus encouraged, the citizens loſt no time in repairing the wall and bulwarks, and cleanſing the ditches; and, in order to prevent the French from having any place of ſhelter, in caſe of their attacking the city, they demoliſhed ſeveral houſes contiguous to, and on the outſide of the wall.

This great precaution, however, was needleſs; for the French did not make the expected invaſion; and the citizens diſcontinued the repairs, and devoted the firſt moments of repoſe to mirth, joy, and feſtivity.

About this period the king's favourites, Robert de Vere, and Michael de la Pole, had gained ſuch an aſcendancy over his majeſty as occaſioned great uneaſineſs between him and his ſubjects. De Vere had been created duke of Ireland, and de la Pole, earl of Suffolk and lord high-chancellor.

Theſe worthleſs minions, unſatisfied with the exorbitant degree of power they poſſeſſed, and apprehenſive that they could not totally engroſs the royal confidence during the life of the king's uncle Thomas, duke of Glouceſter, entered into a conſpiracy to deſtroy him, and ſome other perſons of eminence, whom they conſidered as their enemies.

In order to carry this ſcheme into effectual execution, they treated with Nicholas Exton, mayor of London, whom they endeavoured to prevail on to invite the duke and his friends to ſup in the city, at the houſe of Nicholas Brembre, the late mayor, who was in the ſecret; and when the glaſs had freely circulated, to aſſaſſinate them all.

The mayor heard their propoſal, but deteſting ſo foul a deed, he acquainted the duke of Glouceſter of the intended villainy, by which he was put upon his guard, and the horrid project defeated.

The duke, from a principle of revenge, and to ſpirit up the people to lay their complaints againſt the favourites before the king, induſtriouſly propagated a report throughout the nation, that the miniſters intended to levy a general poll-tax of a noble a head.

This report produced the intended effect; for the citizens of London immediately deputed proper perſons to wait on the duke of Glouceſter, to requeſt him to aſſume the government of the kingdom, and to bring to juſtice all its internal enemies, who had burthened the people with intolerable taxes, and had endeavoured to aggrandize themſelves at the public expence.

This ſollicitation the duke thought proper to decline; urging, as a reaſon for ſo doing, that it would be impoſſible for him to redreſs their grievances, while the ear of the king was ſo totally engroſſed by his favourites: but he adviſed the citizens to engage the other cities and towns to addreſs his majeſty reſpectively, beſeeching him to remedy their grievances; and he promiſed conſequences would have reſulted from this affair; but the biſhop of Saliſbury, inſtead of puniſhing his raſcally ſervant, went immediately to the king and made heavy complaints againſt the citizens, whom he repreſented as having inſulted, in his perſon, the whole body of the clergy; and ſaid, that if the citizens of London were permitted to go on unpuniſhed, the ſtate, as well as the church would be endangered.

The king, who was glad of any opportunity of puniſhing the citizens for refuſing him the loan he had requeſted, immediately threatened to plunder the metropolis, and raze it to the ground: but by the advice of many of the principal nobility, he was prevailed on to moderate his anger; in conſequence of which he commanded, the mayor, aldermen, ſheriffs, and twenty four other principal citizens, to attend him at Nottingham, to anſwer ſuch complaints as ſhould be made againſt them.

The citizens, during their journey to Nottingham, mutually reſolved to adhere faithfully to each other, as the moſt probable method of vindicating themſelves from the malice of their enemies: but ſome of them failing in this reſolution, began to impeach their brethren; which occaſioning recriminations on the part of the accuſed, was likely to have produced very diſagreeable conſequences to them all.

This aſpect of their affairs determined them to ſubmit entirely to the mercy of the king, who committed the mayor to the caſtle of Windſor, and the reſt to other priſons, to remain during his pleaſure.

In a ſhort time, however, a commiſſion was iſſued "to enquire into all and ſingular the errors, defects, and miſpriſions committed in the city, through the bad conduct of the ſaid magiſtrates."

In conſequence hereof William Venour, the late mayor, John Loveneye and John Walcote, late ſheriffs, with William Barret, Nicholas Exton, and others of the aldermen, were indicted for mal-adminiſtration in the government of the city; and being found guilty, they were ſentenced to pay a fine of three thouſand marks, for the uſe of the king; and the liberties of the city were ſeized, in direct violation of the firſt charter of king Edward the third.

As a farther token of the king's diſpleaſure, he removed the courts of juſtice to York, to which city himſelf and the nobility withdrew. But at length the city privileges, except that of chuſing their mayor, were reſtored, and all diſputes between the king and the citizens were adjuſted, on their paying the fine of three thouſand marks.

The king having at length declared his intention of returning to London, he was met at Shene * near Richmond, by four hundred of the citizens on horſeback, who were elegantly dreſſed in an uniform manner, and preceded by the recorder of London, who, in the name of the company, entreated his majeſty to honour the city with his preſence.

His majeſty having conſented to gratify the citizens in this particular, they conducted him as far as St. George's church, in Southwark, where he was received by the biſhop of London, the clergy of his dioceſe, and five hundred boys in ſurplices.

Thus attended, his majeſty proceeded to London-bridge, where he was preſented with a beautiful horſe, adorned with trappings of gold brocade, and a white pad, decked with rich furniture for the uſe of the queen.

From hence the king and queen, mounted on the beaſts which had been preſented to them, advanced into the city, the ſtreets of which were lined with the ſeveral companies in their formalities, and the houſes were adorned with rich hangings of ſilk and tapeſtry, while the conduits ran with a great variety of wines.

A ſtately pageant was erected at the ſtandard in Cheapſide, on which was placed a boy, repreſenting an angel, who preſented the king with wine in a cup of gold, and placed on his head a golden crown elegantly adorned with jewels, and pearls of great value; and likewiſe paid the ſame honour to the queen.

Their majeſties proceeding to St. Paul's cathedral, the king there made an offering, after which they were conducted, with great pomp, to the royal palace at Weſtminſter.

On the following day the mayor, aldermen, and ſheriffs waited on the king, and preſented him with two ſilver baſons gilt, each of them containing a thouſand nobles of gold; and likewiſe with a curious picture of the trinity, eſteemed worth eight hundred pounds.

They likewiſe preſented the queen with a ſilver tablet, gilt with gold, valued at a thouſand marks, beſides other things of conſiderable value.

By theſe liberal preſents the citizens hoped to have recovered their ancient liberty of chuſing their mayor: but in this they were miſtaken, and were obliged to pay ten thouſand pounds for the reſtoration of this valuable privilege, which ſum was raiſed by a general aſſeſſment on the inhabitants of London.

On the meeting of the parliament, the ſtate of the lay-ſtalls in the city was again taken into conſideration, and it was enacted that "all the filth "of a certain lay-ſtall upon the bank of the "river Thames, be forthwith removed; and "that the butchers of London ſhould, before "the enſuing Eaſter, erect a houſe or houſes, in "a proper place, to receive all their ordure, "thence to be carried in boats into the middle of "the ſaid river, and to be thrown in at the turn "of the tide at high water. And that no perſon ſhould preſume to throw any muck, rubbiſh, layſtage, or other ordure, in at the ſides "of the ſaid river, or lay any filth or naſtineſs "on the banks of the ſame, between the palace "of Weſtminſter and the Tower of London, "upon the penalty of 10l."

It was enacted, by this parliament, for the ſecurity of the city liberties againſt future attempts

* From this it ſeems probable that the great north road from York to London lay then in a very different line from the preſent: or perhaps his majeſty went to his palace at Shene, in order to repoſe himſelf for a time, before his public entry into London.

The parliament, however, left them anſwerable for all defects reſpecting the government of the city.

It was further enacted by the authority aforeſaid, "That from thenceforward, the aldermen "of the city ſhould not be choſen annually, but "remain in their offices during their good behaviour. And that the great ward of Farringdon "ſhould be divided into two wards, and have "two aldermen."

This parliament likewiſe ordained what proportion the ſaid wards ſhould pay towards raiſing a tax called a fifteenth; whereby it appears that the ſums to be paid into the exchequer by the reſpective wards, were as follow.

In the year 1394, the mayor of London was empowered by the parliament to ſearch all the malt to be brought into the city, and to ſee that each quarter meaſured eight buſhels of clean malt.

In the ſame year the mayor and ſheriffs were ordered to attend the king's council, to anſwer a charge brought againſt them by the country graziers frequenting Smithfield market, who alledged that the officers of the city extorted from them every third beaſt which they brought to that market: but hiſtory does not inform us whether any, or what puniſhment was inflicted for ſo ſcandalous an inſtance of injuſtice and oppreſſion.

In the year 1396 the mayor of this city being informed that the king was arrived at Dover, with his young conſort, Iſabella, † a daughter of France, he went to Blackheath to meet them, attended by the aldermen, and a number of the principal citizens, mounted on horſeback, and dreſſed in an uniform cloathing, having each of them on their ſleeves a ſymbol of their reſpective myſteries, richly embroidered.

The recorder of London having addreſſed their majeſties, on the part of the citizens, with compliments of congratulation, the royal pair were conducted to the palace at Kennington.

From hence the little queen (as ſhe was called) was carried to the Tower of London, with great pomp and magnificence; on which occaſion the crowds of people were ſo great, that no leſs than nine of them were preſſed to death on London bridge; and on the following day her majeſty was conducted to Weſtminſter, amidſt the repeated applauding ſhouts of the citizens.

In the year 1398, if the account of a foreign author ‡ may be credited, the citizens of London, by the advice of the duke of Glouceſter, petitioned the king to annul the heavy taxes which had been impoſed for the ſupport of the French war; and requeſted that his majeſty would not enter into any treaty with the French king reſpecting the delivering up the town of Calais.

This petition of the Londoners ſo irritated the king, that he compelled many of the moſt eminent citizens to ſign and ſeal a number of blank papers, which were afterwards filled up with ſuch ſums as the miniſtry thought proper to extort.

By a continued courſe of exactions and oppreſſions, king Richard became at length ſo odious to his ſubjects, that Henry duke of Hereford, ſon of the famous John of Gaunt, and grandſon of Edward III. was, by the principal nobility, gentry, and others, invited from France, where he was then an exile, to come over and deliver the nation from ſlavery.

In conſequence of this invitation, Henry ſet ſail, and landing at Ravenſpurre in Yorkſhire, ſoon found himſelf at the head of ſixty thouſand men, with whom he marched to London, where he was received as the deliverer of his country, and ſupplied with all kinds of proviſions for his army. King Richard was now expected from Ireland, where he had been to reduce that kingdom; and Henry, encouraged by the Londoners eſpouſing his intereſt, marched againſt Richard, who finding himſelf deſerted by moſt of the great men in his train, ſurrendered to Henry, by whom he was confined in the Tower of London, and obliged to reſign the crown in favour of his competitor.

* This was not a ſeparate ward, but only a liberty or part of the former, under one aldermen, as at preſent.

† This lady was at that time only about eight years old.

CHAPTER XXI.

Henry IV. aſcends the throne. Popular acts of parliament. Plot to aſſaſſinate the king defeated. Clauſe in king Henry the fourth's firſt charter. The priſon called the Tun in Cornhill, converted into a conduit. Conteſt between the goldſmiths and cutlers. Dreadful peſtilence. A play acted by the company of pariſh clerks. Tournament in Smithfield. A riot in the city. John Bradby burnt in Smithfield. Guildhall founded. The death of Henry IV. and acceſſion of Henry V. A great mortality in Newgate. Great rejoicings on account of the victory at Agincourt. The city of London firſt lighted with lanthorns. The king's crown and jewels pawned. Leadenhall built. Death of Henry V.

ON the thirtieth day of September 1399, Henry duke of Lancaſter aſcended the throne by the title of Henry the fourth; and on the thirteenth day of October the mayor and aldermen of London rode to the Tower, from whence they attended his majeſty to Weſtminſter, where the ceremony of his coronation was performed, with the accuſtomed ſolemnity.

One of the firſt acts of ſovereignty exerciſed by this monarch was, the giving orders that all the blank papers which had been extorted from the citizens (as mentioned in the preceding chapter) ſhould be burnt at the ſtandard in Cheapſide: a circumſtance which greatly endeared the new king to his ſubjects in general, and to the inhabitants of London in particular.

About this time the parliament repealed an act paſſed in the twenty-ſeventh year of king Edward the third, by which it had been ordained, that "the mayor, aldermen, and ſheriffs of London, "in default of the good government of the city, "were to be tried as delinquents, by a foreign "inqueſt, to be taken out of the counties of "Kent, Eſſex, Suſſex, Hertfordſhire, Buckingham-"ſhire, and Berkſhire; and who upon being found guilty, were to pay a thouſand marks "for the firſt default, two thouſand for the ſecond, and for the third to forfeit the franchiſes "of the city to the king."

And the ſame parliament enacted, that "all "repyers, and other fiſhers, from Rye and Winchelſea, and all other parts on the ſea coaſts, "ſhould ſell their fiſh themſelves in Cornhill and "Cheap, and other Streets of London, unto all "men that would buy them, except fiſhmongers, "and others that would buy the ſaid fiſh to ſell "again. And that all foreign fiſhermen in amity "with the king, as well as domeſtic, ſhould have "the privilege of retailing their fiſh in the city, "either whole or in pieces, to all perſons whatſoever, except fiſhmongers."

As theſe acts were ſuppoſed to have paſſed at the particular deſire of the king, this circumſtance ſtill further endeared his majeſty to the citizens of London, who had ſoon an opportunity of teſtifying their gratitude for the favours received, as will appear from the following particulars.

Several of the principal people in the nation having formed a conſpiracy to aſſaſſinate the king, his majeſty was no ſooner informed of it, than he haſtened to London, and acquainting the mayor with the affair, commanded him to raiſe the citizens; which was obeyed with ſo much expedition, that in a few hours ſix thouſand of the Londoners were aſſembled, completely armed, and ready to march wherever the exigency of his majeſty's affairs might require.

The king having learnt that the conſpirators had been at Windſor, with an intent to ſurprize him there, marched from London at the head of the citizens, and as many auxliary forces as made his army twenty thouſand; with which he waited the approach of the rebels on Hounſlow heath.

The rebels, however, retired at the approach of the royal army; and the duke of Surry and earl of Saliſbury, two of the principal inſurgents, being taken at Cirenceſter, the army was diſperſed; and the reſt of the ringleaders being ſoon made priſoners, were tried, condemned and executed; by which the rebellion was totally ſuppreſſed.

The king, truly ſenſible of the obligations he had to his faithful citizens of London, was determined to give them ſome teſtimony of his gratitude; and therefore granted them a charter, of which the following clauſe is a part.

"And moreover, of our ample grace, we have "granted for us and our heirs, as much as in us "is, to the ſame citizens, their heirs and ſucceſſors, as aforeſaid, that they ſhall have the cuſtody, as well of the gates of Newgate and Ludgate as all other the gates and poſterns of the "ſame city; and alſo the office of gathering of "the tolls and cuſtoms in Cheap and Billingſgate "and Smithfield, there rightfully to be taken "and accuſtomed; and alſo the tronage, that "is to ſay, the weighing of lead, wax, pepper, "allom, madder, and other like wares, within "the ſaid city for ever; as by the ſaid charters, "amongſt others things, more plainly may appear." Dated the 25th of May, 1399."

In the year 1401 the citizens of London converted the priſon called the tun, in Cornhill, into a conduit for the reception of water which was brought in leaden pipes from Tyburn: and on the ſide of this conduit they erected a cage, with a pair of ſtocks over it for the puniſhment of night-walkers; together with a pillory, in which diſhoneſt millers and bakers were expoſed to the ſcorn of the public.

In the year 1405 a conteſt happened between the companies of goldſmiths and cutlers, with regard to certain privileges claimed by the former, of inſpecting all the gold and ſilver work made by the latter.

At length the goldſmiths appealed to the parliament, and by the authority of the king the affair was referred to the mayor of London, who having carefully examined into the affair, reported, that according to the ancient immunities of the city, the cutlers had a right to work in gold and ſilver; but that all things made by them were to be aſſayed by the goldſmiths: whereupon the goldſmiths charter was confirmed by parliament, and additional privileges were granted.

A moſt dreadful plague broke out among the inhabitants of the city in the year 1407, which raged to ſo great a degree as to deſtroy thirty thouſand of the inhabitants in a very ſhort time; which conſiderably leſſening the conſumption of bread, reduced the price of wheat to three ſhillings and ſix-pence the quarter.

In the year 1409 hiſtory informs us that the company of pariſh clerks of London acted a play concerning the Creation of the World, which they repeated eight days ſucceſſively, at Skinner's-Well, near Clerkenwell, with great applauſe.

From the play the company retired daily to Smithfield, where a tournament was held between the marſhal and gentlemen of Hainault, and the earl of Somerſet and ſeveral other Engliſh gentlemen; in which victory declared ſo much in favour of the Engliſh, that they all came off conquerors except one.

In the year 1410 a riot happened in this city, of which our hiſtorians relate the following particulars. The princes Thomas and John, ſons of the king, being at an entertainment in Eaſtcheap, a diſpute aroſe between their highneſs's ſervants and ſome others belonging to the court, during which it was ſaid that ſome inſult was offered to the princes.

The mayor being informed of the riot, immediately repaired to the place, attended by the aldermen and ſheriffs, who exerted themſelves effectualy to reſtore the peace. But notwithſtanding this ſpirited and well judged conduct, the king iſſued a writ, appointing commiſſioners to enquire into the cauſe of the tumult, who ſummoned the mayor, aldermen and ſheriffs before them; when the chief juſtice Gaſcoyne adviſed them to make ſubmiſſion to the king, in behalf of all the citizens.

This they refuſed to do; and, conſcious of their own innocence, vindicated themſelves with ſo much ſpirit, and ſo ſtrict a regard to truth, that the king appeared fully ſatisfied with their conduct, and they were diſcharged with honour.

In the year abovementioned one John Bradby, Alias Badby, a taylor, one of the profeſſors in the doctrine inculcated by the celebrated Wickliff, having been convicted before Thomas archbiſhop of Canterbury, of what was then called Hereſy, was ſentenced to be burnt to death in Smithfield.

This unhappy man was conveyed to the place of execution in a caſk, and Henry prince of Wales being preſent on the occaſion, offered him a free pardon, on condition of his recanting before the fire was kindled. This offer Bradby rejected; on which he was tied to a ſtake, in the caſk, and the fire being lighted, the flames ſoon reached his body, which occaſioned his crying out in a moſt piteous manner.

The young prince was ſo affected by this circumſtance, that he gave orders to take him inſtantly out of the fire, renewed the offer of a pardon on the conditions abovementioned, and even promiſed to allow him a penſion of threepence per day, in conſideration of the injury he had already ſuſtained by the fire.

This offer likewiſe the reſolute martyr rejected; upon which he was re-conducted to the flames, which ſoon put a period to his life.

The Guildhall of the city of London having been heretofore nothing better than a mean cottage ſituated in Aldermanbury, and the buſineſs of the city greatly increaſing, the foundation of the New Guildhall was laid this year, on the ſpot where the preſent building ſtands, at the upper end of King-ſtreet in Cheapſide, of which it may not be improper to introduce a conciſe deſcription in this place.

The New Guildhall, which was finiſhed in the year 1411, having been very conſiderably damaged by the dreadful fire in 1666, it was thought fit to demoliſh it entirely; and the preſent edifice was built and extremely well beautified in 1669.

This hall is 153 feet long, 48 broad, and 55 feet high to the roof.

The portico is adorned with a ſtately gothic frontiſpiece, enriched with the king's arms, &c.

After entering the portico, the firſt thing worthy attention is the balcony, over a flight of nine or ten ſteps leading to the mayor's court, in the front of which is a fine clock and dial, in a curious frame of oak: the carvings are, at the four corners the four cardinal virtues, and on the top, time, with a cock on each ſide of him. Above this are the figures of Moſes and Aaron; on the ſides beneath, the four cardinal virtues; and below are depicted the arms of the 24 companies. On each ſide of the balcony is a giant of an enormous ſize; the one holding a pole-axe, the other an halbert, ſuppoſed to be an ancient Briton and a Saxon.

Round the hall are colours and ſtandards taken from the French, &c. at different periods.

The roof is flat, divided into pannels; the walls on the north and ſouth ſides are adorned with four gothic demi-pillars, painted white, and veined with blue, and the capitals gilt with gold; upon which are the royal arms, and thoſe of Edward the confeſſor. In many places are the royal arms: on the ſouth-eaſtward pillar is the arms of London, and weſtward are the arms of the twelve companies.

Manner of BURNING the MARTYRS in Smithfield.

At the eaſt end are the portraitures of their late majeſties king George II. and queen Caroline, and thoſe of their preſent majeſties: cloſe by the firſt is the picture of queen Anne, at the foot of an anabathrum, under a rich canopy; by the latter, his majeſty king George I. And at the ſame end, but on the north and ſouth ſides, the pictures of king William III. and queen Mary, fronting each other.

The inter columns are painted in imitation of porphyry, and embelliſhed with the pictures, in full proportion, of 19 judges, who determined differences between landlord and tenant in rebuilding the city after the dreadful fire in 1666, without the expence of law-ſuits; in gratitude for thoſe ſignal ſervices, their pictures were put up in the Guildhall.

On the ſouth ſide are eight, on the north ſide eight, and on the weſt end three; to which the city have lately added the picture, in full proportion, of lord chief juſtice Pratt, in grateful remembrance of that gentleman's uprightneſs, firmneſs, and conduct in the cauſe of liberty, which has deſervedly given him a place with thoſe worthy men, who ſtept forth in the utmoſt danger to defend the weak from oppreſſion, and to ſave mankind from ruin.

In the Lord mayor's court, which is adorned with ſleak-ſtones and gildings, and alſo the figures of the four cardinal virtues, are the portraits of four other judges, in full proportion. This court is called the council chamber, and is well worthy of obſervation.

In this hall are held the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen; the court of common-council; the court of huſtings; the court of orphans; two courts of the ſheriffs; the court of wardmote; the court of hallmote; the court of requeſts, and the chamberlain's court.

The lotteries are drawn in this hall, which is likewiſe uſed for chuſing the city officers, and members of parliament, and is large enough to contain near ſeven thouſand perſons.

King Henry the fourth dying ſuddenly, while he was paying his devotions at the ſhrine of Edward the confeſſor in Weſtminſter-Abbey, his ſon Henry was proclaimed by the ſtile and title of Henry the fifth.

The diſſolute life of this prince till the period of his father's death is well known; but that event no ſooner happened, than he immediately diſmiſſed his rakiſh companions, reformed his whole conduct, and acted as became the monarch and the man.

His former courſe of life, however, furniſhed his enemies with a pretence of diſturbing their ſovereign's tranquillity; and a conſpiracy was even formed againſt his life; which coming to his majeſty's knowledge, he ſent an order to Sir Nicholas Falconer, mayor of London, to ſhut the gates of the city, and to apprehend all ſuſpected perſons.

In obedience to this command, the mayor iſſued his orders to the aldermen, each of whom kept a ſtrong guard in his reſpective ward: and information having been received that ſome of the conſpirators were to meet at the Axe-inn without Biſhopſgate, the mayor, attended by a proper guard, went thither about midnight, and apprehended John Borgate, a carpenter, and ſeven other perſons, who being examined, made a ready confeſſion of their guilt.

On this occaſion many others were apprehended, and committed to Newgate, where the number of delinquents was ſo great as to cauſe a dreadful peſtilential diſorder, by which the keeper, the turnkey, and ſixty-four of the priſoners loſt their lives.

In the year 1415, as Nicholas Wotton was riding to Weſtminſter, (on the Lord-mayor's day) to qualify himſelf for the office of mayor, one of the king's meſſengers met him with a letter, by which he was informed of the victory which the king had obtained over the French at Agincourt.

In conſequence of this good news, the mayor, on his return from Weſtminſter, being accompanied by the biſhop of Wincheſter, the lord high-chancellor, and other perſons of rank, went to St. Paul's cathedral, and attended the Te Deum, which was ſung in a moſt ſolemn manner.

On the day following, the queen, attended by the nobility, clergy, mayor, aldermen, and the ſeveral city companies, walked in ſolemn proceſſion from St. Paul's to Weſtminſter-abbey, where having made a rich oblation at the ſhrine of St. Edward, they returned in triumph to the city.

Soon after this, the king returned from France, with a great number of the French nobility, priſoners; on which occaſion he was met on Blackheath, by the mayor, aldermen, and ſheriffs of London, in ſcarlet robes, attended by three hundred of the principal citizens mounted on horſes adorned with rich trappings.

In the road near Deptford this cavalcade was joined by a ſolemn and pompous proceſſion of the clergy of London, in magnificent copes, and preceded by rich croſſes, and cenſers ſmoking with frankincenſe.

The city of London was embelliſhed, on this joyful occaſion, with rich hangings of tapeſtry; the city conduit ran with divers ſorts of wine for the entertainment of the populace, and a variety of ſtately pageants were erected, on which were placed children dreſſed in imitation of angels, who chaunted praiſes to God for the ſucceſs of his majeſty's arms.

On the morning ſucceeding theſe public rejoicings, the mayor, aldermen, and citizens went to Weſtminſter, where they preſented the king with a thouſand pounds in gold, in two golden baſons of the like value.

In the year 1416, Sir Henry Barton, mayor of London, ordered lanthorns to be hung out, for the purpoſe of lighting the ſtreets by night; and this is the origin of a cuſtom which is now become general in this city, and on which its ſafety in a great meaſure depends.

In the following year, the king being diſtreſſed for money to carry on the war with France, pawned his crown for twenty thouſand marks to the biſhop of Wincheſter, and his jewels for ten thouſand to the citizens of London.

In the year 1419, Sir Thomas Eyre, who had been mayor of this city, compaſſionating the diſtreſſes to which the poor were frequently driven by the ſcarcity of corn, built Leadenhall at his ſole expence, and gave it to the city, as a public granary, granary, for the purpoſe of laying up a quantity of corn as a reſerve, to be uſed in times of neceſſity.

In the eaſt ſide of this building was originally a chapel, in which was founded a fraternity of the trinity, conſiſting of ſixty prieſts, beſides other brethren and ſiſters; and ſome one or more of the prieſts were enjoined to perform divine ſervice every market day, to ſuch perſons as frequented the market.

After this period, the common beam for weighing wool was erected, and a public market for foreign commodities was held in Leadenhall; and ſince that it was occupied as an armory, in which the military utenſils of the city were depoſited; but at preſent it is converted into warehouſes, for leather, wool, and other commodities, and the area is a market for hides, leather, and butchers meat.

On the thirty firſt day of Auguſt, 1422, king Henry the fifth died in France, from whence his corpſe was brought to England, and carried through London in a pompous manner, on an open chariot, drawn by four horſes, to St. Paul's cathedral, where the funeral obſequies being performed, the body was carried to Weſtminſter, and depoſited among the remains of his royal progenitors.

At this funeral, James, king of Scotland, aſſiſted as chief mourner, and was attended by the princes of the blood, almoſt all the nobility, and the principal gentry of the kingdom.

CHAPTER XXII.

The acceſſion of Henry VI. Newgate rebuilt. The biſhop of Wincheſter attempts to ſurprize the city of London, but is fruſtrated. The king's letter concerning the ancient liberties of the city, with the anſwer thereto. A pernicious ſtatute reſpecting apprentices repealed. The reception of the king on his return from Paris. Tyburn water brought to the ſtandard in Cheapſide. A remarkable ſevere froſt. Act of parliament reſpecting the ſale of fiſh. Water brought to Aldermanbury, Cripplegate, and Fleet-ſtreet. A dreadful ſcarcity of corn. A violent ſtorm of wind. Sir Richard Wick burnt on account of religion. The croſs in Cheapſide rebuilt. The Merchant-Taylors endeavour to ſet aſide the choice of a mayor. The king's letter on that ſubject. The ſteeple of St. Paul's burnt by lightning.

ON the death of Henry the fifth, his ſon, at that time only eight months and a few days old was advanced to the throne, by the name of Henry the ſixth; and in the month of November following, the young monarch was carried through the city, in his mother's lap, in an open chair, to the parliament then ſitting at Weſtminſter.

Soon after the young king's acceſſion to the throne, in the year 1423, a petition was preſented to the king in council, for permiſſion to remove the priſoners out of Newgate, in order to rebuild that priſon, in conformity to the will of Sir Richard Wittington, late Lord-mayor of London; and the petition being granted, the work was performed under the inſpection of Sir Richard's executors.

About the year 1426, the biſhop of Wincheſter, who was great uncle to the king, formed a deſign of ſeizing the protectorſhip into his own hands; and as the moſt likely method to accompliſh his ends, determined to ſurprize the city of London.

The duke of Glouceſter, who was protector, having received intelligence that this bold plan was intended to be carried into execution, in the night ſucceeding the Lord-mayor's day, when the citizens were engaged in feſtivity, he ſent an order to the Lord-mayor to raiſe ſuch a number of citizens as might be ſufficient to defeat the attempt.

Sir John Coventry, the mayor, obeyed this order ſo effectually, that when the biſhop's archers and men at arms attempted to force a paſſage at London-bridge, they were eaſily repulſed, and the inſurrection was wholly ſuppreſſed, with very little damage on either ſide.

In the year 1426, the following intereſting letter was ſent by king Henry the ſixth to the mayor and aldermen of London.

" Henry, by the grace of God, king of Eng" land and France, and lord of Ireland, to the " mayor and aldermen of the city of London,
" greeting. Willing for certain cauſes to be

To this letter the mayor and aldermen returned the following anſwer, viz. that

" all time in memory of man, then was extant
" ſuch dignity, liberty, and loyal cuſtom, among " others

" others was had, uſed, and approved, in the city " of London, which is, and from all time hath " been called, the free chamber of the king of " England, as from ancient time it was uſed, and " had as in the great city of Troy; to wit, that " every ſervant, whoſoever he were, that came " to the city of London, and tarried in it for a " year and a day, without being reclaimed by " his lord there, afterwards he may, ought, and " hath accuſtomed through his whole life, ſo " freely and ſecurely to tarry there, as it were in " the houſe or chamber of the king: and hence " it is, that the ſame holy king Edward, amongſt " other things, by his laws remaining upon re- " cord, in the treaſury of Guildhall of the ſaid " city, and reciting the city itſelf to be the head " of the kingdom, and that it was founded like " and after the manner of old Troy; and that it " containeth in it the laws, liberties, dignities, " and royal cuſtoms of Great Troy: he appointed " and ordained, that the ſaid city of London may " have and keep every where, by one inviolabi- " lity always, all her old uſages and cuſtoms, " whereſoever the king himſelf ſhall be, whether " on an expedition or otherwiſe. And that after- " wards, William the conqueror, king of Eng- " land, by his charter, which remaineth of the " record, in the ſame treaſury, granted to the " men of London, that they be worthy of all " that, both law and right, as they were in the " the days of the foreſaid Edward: and moreover " that the ſaid William the king, among other " laws at the ſaid city made, with the conſent of " noble and wiſe men of the whole kingdom, " and remaining in the ſaid treaſury, likewiſe " remaining of record, appointed and ordained " that if ſervants remain without complaint by " a year and a day, in a burgh compaſſed with a " wall, or in caſtles, or in the cities of the ſaid " king; whence the ſaid city of London, to that " time, and from all time before was one, and the " more principal of the whole kingdom, as is " ſaid before; from that day let them become " freemen, and let them be for ever free and " quit from the yoke of their ſervitude." And the record of this tranſaction further ſaith, " It " is to be noted, that the laws, recitements, and " ſtatutes of holy king Edward, of which men- " tion is made above, are contained in folio 34 " of this book, under the title De Heretochiis et " libertatibus London: and in folio 113 of the " book of Cuſtoms of the ſaid city; and in folio " 36 of the book called Recordatorium London, " &c. and in folio 162 of the Red Book in the " exchequer, called The True Charter: by which " the ſaid lord the conqueror, hath confirmed " to the citizens of London, all rights and laws " which they had in the time of holy king Ed- " ward, together with certain other charters, by " which the ſaid lord, immediately after the con- " queſt, gave the whole hyde and land of the " city of London, whereof he had been poſſeſſed " in his demeſne, to the men of the ſaid city, " patent and remanent under the ſeal of the ſaid " king, in the cuſtody of the chamberlain, in " the treaſury of the ſaid city: which charters " are contained and incorporated into the great " charter of the liberties and cuſtoms of the " city of London; and are confirmed by the lord " the king, (Henry the ſixth) and his progeni- " tors. But the tenor of the ſaid charters are " patent in the Latin tongue, in folio 238 of the " ordinations of the ſaid city."

By an act of parliament paſſed in the ſeventh year of king Henry the fourth, it had been ordained, that no perſon ſhould be admitted to put out their children as apprentices to any trade, unleſs they were worth twenty ſhillings per annum; and all perſons preſuming to take as apprentices the children of any parents ſo diſqualified were liable to a heavy penalty mentioned in the ſtatute.

The citizens, conſidering this as a grievous oppreſſion, applied to parliament for redreſs, in the year 1426; and, in conſideration of the great ſervices which the city had rendered to the king, this act was repealed.

The favours abovementioned gave occaſion for the grand and ſplendid reception which the king met with on his return from Paris, where he had been crowned.

On the twenty-firſt day of February 1427, his majeſty was met on Blackheath, by the mayor of this city, dreſſed in crimſon velvet, a large furred velvet hat, an ornament of gold about his neck, falling down behind, and a golden girdle about his waiſt.

The chief magiſtrate was followed by three horſemen, cloathed in ſcarlet ſtudded with ſilver, and attended by the aldermen in ſcarlet gowns, and a great number of the principal citizens in white gowns and ſcarlet hoods, each riding on a ſtately horſe, and having the ſymbol of his trade or myſtery embroidered on his ſleeve.

On this occaſion the city was adorned with rich ſilks and carpets, and a great number of pageants were erected, in which were placed perſons repreſenting the graces and ſciences, who congratulated his majeſty in ſongs and ſpeeches.

Two days afterwards the mayor and aldermen waited on the king at Weſtminſter, and preſented him with a thouſand pounds, in nobles, in a golden hamper, in the name of the citizens of London.

In the year 1429, Sir John Wells, late mayor of this city, laid a number of pipes, at his own expence, to convey water from Tyburn, to the ſtandard in Cheapſide.

A moſt ſevere froſt began on the twenty-fourth of November, 1434, which continuing till the tenth of February following, the river Thames was entirely frozen up, ſo that the navigation being entirely impeded, the ſhips from foreign parts were obliged to be unladen at the mouth of the river, and their cargoes brought to London by land carriage.

As the fiſhmongers of London, in defiance of former laws, endeavoured to monopolize the ſale of fiſh, an act of parliament was paſſed in the year 1435, by which it was ordained, that " No " perſon whatever ſhould preſume to hinder or " obſtruct any fiſherman, either foreign or do- " meſtic, from diſpoſing of his fiſh as he ſhould " ſee convenient, on the penalty of ten pounds."

In the year 1438, conduits were erected in Aldermanbury, at Cripplegate, and in Fleet-ſtreet, which were ſupplied with water from Highburybarn and Tyburn, at the ſole expence of Sir William Eaſtfield, knight of the bath, and mayor of this city.

During the harveſt ſeaſon of this year, there were ſuch exceſſive ſtorms of wind and rain that a great part of the crops of corn were deſtroyed, ſo that the poor in ſome parts of the country were reduced to the neceſſity of making a kind of bread of ivy-berries and fern-roots; and though this calamity was ſeverely felt in London, yet, by the care and humanity of the mayor, who ſent ſhips to Pruſſia to fetch rye, when the ſcarcity firſt began, the city was ſo far ſupplied, as to prevent the dreadful conſequences of a total famine.

On the twenty-fifth of November in this ſame year, there happened a moſt violent ſtorm of wind, by which many churches and houſes were uncovered, and almoſt half of the houſes in the Old Change, near Cheapſide, quite blown down.

In the year 1440, Sir Richard Wick, vicar of Hermetſworth, in Eſſex, was burnt on Tower-hill, on account of his religious tenets; and as he had the reputation of being a man of remarkable ſanctity, the vicar of Barking embraced this opportunity of impoſing upon the people, by mixing a quantity of odoriferous ſpices with ſome aſhes, which he privately ſtrewed on the place where Wick had been burnt, in order to induce the people to worſhip him as a martyr to the faith.

This trick drew numbers of people to the ſpot, who began to invoke the deceaſed as a deity, and offer ſtatues of wax, and money at his ſhrine, which the impoſtor repaid, by preſenting them with the aſhes as ſacred relicks, and ſupplying the place with freſh aſhes during the night.

After this farce had been carried on for about a week, the vicar was ſeized and impriſoned, and in a ſhort time afterwards, the whole cheat was diſcovered by his own confeſſion.

In the year 1441, John Hatherley, the mayor of London, applied to king Henry the ſixth, for permiſſion to rebuild, in a beautiful manner, the croſs in Cheapſide, which had been erected by Edward the firſt, in the year 1290, in memory of Eleanor his queen.

This magiſtrate likewiſe, at the ſame time, ſollicited the royal aid towards repairing the common granary of the city, and the conduits, as well as for compleating other improvements then carrying on for the ſupplying the city with water: and the king granted his ſeveral requeſts, as will appear by the following letter.

"The king to whom theſe ſhall come, greeting. Know ye, That whereas our beloved John Hatherley, mayor, and the citizens of London, do intend, for the common utility and decency of all the ſaid city, and for the univerſal advantage; likewiſe for the well-pleaſing of all liege ſubjects flowing thither from other parts, at convenient places therein, as it well becomes them ſo to do, to build and erect divers aqueducts of freſh water, with ſtandards and other machines, and leaden pipes, which have and do run under and above the earth, above three miles; and to rebuild a certain common granary, and a certain beautiful croſs in the Weſt-cheap of the ſaid city, which may ſerve for a reſervoir, or, as it were, a mother to the ſaid conduits or aqueducts; which works cannot be performed without a very large quantity of lead, and workmen proper to carry on the ſaid works; we, well conſidering the utility, decency, and advantage of the ſaid works, do, of our ſpecial grace, grant and give our licence for completing the ſame; and for the ſaid citizens to take up two hundred fodder of lead for the building thereof, and to impreſs plumbers and labourers, &c. for carrying on the ſaid work, paying them their wages."

In the year 1442, Robert Clopton, a member of the Draper's company, and Ralph Holland, a Merchant-Taylor, were returned to the court of aldermen, for their choice of one of them to be mayor for the year enſuing; when they made choice of the former, agreeable to the ancient cuſtom of the city: on which a number of perſons belonging to the Merchant-Taylor's company, being ſupported by many of the inferior citizens, demanded that Ralph Holland ſhould be mayor, and proceeded to ſuch unwarrantable lengths in ſupport of their demand, that Sir John Paddeſley, the mayor, was obliged to commit ſeveral of the rioters to Newgate, who being ſeverely puniſhed, there was an end of the diſturbance for the preſent.

This affair, however, did not end here; for the Merchant-Taylor's party made no ſcruple of declaring that they would oppoſe the next election; whereupon the king was applied to, who iſſued a letter to the following effect.

"That whereas the mayors of London uſed to be choſen by the aldermen, and certain more diſcreet perſons of the ſaid city, eſpecially ſummoned and warned for that purpoſe; yet ſome that had not, nor ought to have, any intereſt in ſuch elections, came, and with their noiſe and clamour diſturbed them, with an intion to chooſe ſuch who might afterwards favour their evil-doing and errors: He therefore, willing to provide for the quiet and peace of his ſubjects, and to apply a ſuitable remedy on this behalf, did command and firmly enjoin the mayor and ſheriffs, to make proclamation through all the city and liberty, before the time of the election of a mayor, ſtrictly forbidding, that none be preſent at ſuch election, or any way, or under any colour, thruſt himſelf into it, but ſuch as by right, and according to the cuſtom of the city, ought to be there; and that ſuch election be made by the aldermen and other of the more diſcreet and able citizens, eſpecially warned and ſummoned, according to the cuſtom aforeſaid: letting them know for certain, that if any, ſome other way elected, were preſented to him, or his treaſurer, and barons of the exchequer, they would by no means admit him: and that they ſhould arreſt and commit to priſon all thoſe who ſhould act contrary to the ſaid proclamation and prohibition."

On the eve of Candlemas day in the year 1444, there there was a dreadful ſtorm of thunder and lightning, by which the ſteeple of St. Paul's church was ſet on fire; but by immediate aſſiſtance it was thought to be extinguiſhed: yet between eight and nine o'clock at night, the flames again broke out, and conſumed almoſt all the wooden frame of the ſteeple.

CHAPTER XXIII.

The murder of the duke of Glouceſter. Singular petition to parliament for a licence to open grammar ſchools. The rebellion of Jack Cade, and the conſequences thereof. Firſt uſe of barges on Lord-Mayor's day. The king taken priſoner and the duke of York made protector of England. Riots in St. Martin's-le-Grand and Cheapſide. The court greatly alarmed. Five thouſand citizens mount guard. The royal army refuſed admiſſion, and the earl of March's army received into the city. King Henry VI. depoſed, and the earl of March choſen king, by the name of Edward IV.

IN the year 1447, the duke of Glouceſter, uncle to the king, being obnoxious to the queen and her party, on account of his great virtues and abilities, was falſly charged with a deſign to murder the king; upon which they ſeized and committed him to priſon; but conſcious that they ſhould not be able to ſupport the charge againſt the worthy duke, they procured him to be privately murdered during the firſt night of his impriſonment, and cauſing his body to be expoſed on the following day, they reported that he had died of the apoplexy.

Five of his Graces domeſticks being likewiſe ſeized, were brought to their trial, and ſentence of death being paſſed upon them, they were drawn to Tyburn, where they were hanged, but cut down alive, ſtripped naked, and marked with a knife, in order to their being quartered; but at this inſtant the duke of Suffolk produced a pardon, and being brought back to the city, they all recovered.

About this period the public ſchools for the education of youth had ſo far gone to decay, that the groſſeſt ignorance prevailed among the people in general.

To remedy this defect, by improving the riſing generation in grammatical knowledge, four clergymen petitioned the parliament for leave to ſet up ſchools in the reſpective pariſhes of Allhallows the Great, St. Andrew, Holborn, St. Peter, Cornhill, and St. Mary, Colechurch, with liberty for their ſeveral ſucceſſors to continue the ſaid ſchools.

As this petition may be ſuppoſed to have been drawn up by men of learning, with their greateſt care, and the utmoſt exertion of their abilities, we have carefully tranſcribed it from the records in the Tower of London, as a curious ſpecimen of the language and manner of ſpelling then in uſe.

" To the ful worthie and diſcrete communes " in this preſent parlement aſſemblyd to conſidre " the grete Nombre of gramer ſcholes that " ſometyme were in divers parties of this realme, " beſides thoſe that were in London, and how " few ben in theſe dayes, and the grete hurt is " cauſed of this, not oonly in the ſpiritual partie " of the chirche, where oftentyme it apperith to " openly in ſom perſones with grete ſhame, but " alſo in the temporal partie; to whom alſo it is " full expedyent to have competent congruite for " many cauſes, as to your wiſdomes apperith.

For wher ther is grete " nombre of lerners and few techers; and al the " lerners be compelled to go to the few techers, " and to noon others, the maiſtreſs waxen rich " of monie, and the lerners pourer in counyng, " as experyence openlie ſhewith ayenſt all vertu " and ordre of well publik.

" And that everiche of the ſaid Maiſtres, " Maiſtre William, Maiſtre Gilbert, Maiſtre " John, and John Neel, Maiſtre; ſuch ſchole- " Maiſtre, ſo bi him ſett, and everiche of their " ſucceſſors, ſuch ſchole-Maiſtre bi him, or bi " any of his predeceſſors ſo eſtabliſhed and ſett, " ſpecially as is above rehercid, may in his own " parich or place remove, and another in his " place ſubſtitute, and ſett, as any of the ſaid " perſones, or their ſucceſſors ſemith, [and] the " cauſe reaſonable ſo requireth.

" And ſo to do ich of the ſaid perſones and " and their ſucceſſors, as often as it happenyth " any of the ſaid ſcholes to be void of a ſchole- " maiſtre in any manner wyſe, to the honour of " God, and encreaſyng of virtu."

The following is the anſwer given to the above recited: " the king wille that it be done as it is " deſired, ſo that it be done bi th' advyſe of the " ordinary, the relles of archbiſhope of Canter- " bury for the tyme being."

In the year 1450, one Jack Cade, a native of Ireland, who greatly reſembled John Mortimer, a prince of the blood of the family of March, who had been beheaded in the beginning of this reign, began a ſcene of impoſture of a very extraordinary kind.

Cade, who had ſerved as a ſoldier in France, " under the duke of York, was nothing more than the tool of that prince, who thought it adviſeable to prepare the nation for his deſign of aſcending the throne, by exciting their affection to the houſe or Mortimer.

The courage, capacity, and ſpirit of Cade, had well qualified him for the part he was to act; and he had no ſooner received his inſtructions from the duke of York's agents, than he aſſumed the name of John Mortimer, pretending to be the ſon of John Mortimer, the perſon who had been beheaded; and repairing to the county of Kent, in which the duke of York had a great number of adherents, he collected a ſtrong body of malecontents, on pretence of delivering the people from the burden of taxes, and redreſſing the grievances of the nation.

Such prodigious numbers of people ſoon flocked to his ſtandard, that finding himſelf in a condition to advance towards London, he marched, and encamped on Blackheath with all his forces.

From hence Cade ſent letters of ſafe conduct to Thomas Cock, a draper in the city, who repaired to him for the tranſacting ſome affairs between Cade and ſome of the citizens; and in one of the letters he enjoined the ſaid Cock to demand horſes, arms, and a thouſand marks in money of the Genoa, Venetian, and Florence merchants reſiding in London.

As ſoon as the king received intelligence of this rebellion, he ſent a meſſenger to demand the cauſe of their appearance in arms; to whom Cade, in the name of the reſt, replied, that they had no deſign againſt the perſon of his majeſty; but their intention was to addreſs the parliament, that all evil miniſters might receive their deſerts; and in particular he demanded that the duke of Somerſet ſhould be puniſhed for the loſs of Normandy, and that the king's council might be compoſed of the princes of the blood, and other wiſe and worthy perſons; and not of wretches equally contemptible for the weakneſs of their intellects, and the depravity of their hearts.

The king in council being informed of Cade's propoſals, the council immediately condemned them as arrogant and ſeditious, and determined to ſuppreſs the rebellion by force of arms; and an army of fifteen thouſand men being aſſembled, the king advanced at their head towards Blackheath.

As his majeſty advanced, Cade retired, as if afraid of coming to an engagement, and retreated into a wood near Sevenoaks in Kent, expecting that the king's army emboldened at his retreat, would purſue him in diſorder; but Henry, imagining that the rebels were totally diſperſed, returned towards London, having firſt detached a ſmall party in purſuit of the fugitives, under the command of lord Stafford, who falling into the ambuſcade, he and all his followers were cut to pieces.

As ſoon as Cade had gained this advantage, he again marched towards London; while the king and court retired haſtily to Kenilworth caſtle, having left a ſtrong garriſon in the Tower of London, under the command of lord Scales.

The citizens of London, being either averſe to the government, or terrified at the ſucceſs of the rebels, opened the gates at their approach, and Cade entered in triumph, at the head of his troops, which had been greatly augmented ſince his victory: but he forbad his followers, on the ſeveréſt penalties, to commit the leaſt outrage on the citizens, or give the ſlighteſt cauſe of complaint.

It is recorded of this celebrated impoſtor, that in his march through Cannon-ſtreet, he ſtruck London-ſtone with his ſword, and exclaimed, " now is Mortimer lord of this city!" In the evening Cade withdrew to Southwark, but returned to London on the following day, and hearing that the lord treaſurer Say was in the city, he gave immediate orders for his being apprehended, and cauſed him to be beheaded without any form of trial.

Thus did Cade continue for ſome days to enter the city in the morning, and retire at night, that he might not give offence to the citizens, with whom, for ſome time, he maintained a good underſtanding.

At length, however, the rebels having pillaged ſeveral of the citizens, and committed many violent violent outrages, Cade one morning found the gate of the bridge ſhut and ſecured againſt him.

Hereupon he attempted to force a paſſage; upon which a battle enſued between the citizens and the rebels, which laſted till night put an end to the combat.

The archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the lord chancellor, who had taken refuge in the Tower, being informed by their emiſſaries that the rebels were greatly diſpirited by this repulſe, and heartily tired of the rebellion; they immediately drew up an act of amneſty, confirmed by the ſanction of the great ſeal, which they cauſed to be publiſhed in Southwark before the next evening.

This expedient produced an effect as happy as it was ſudden; for the rebels, anxious to eſcape the puniſhment due to their crimes, deſerted in ſuch numbers, that, by break of day, Cade found himſelf almoſt alone, and was obliged to take ſhelter in the woods of Suſſex.

His flight was no ſooner known, than the government iſſued a proclamation, with a reward of a thouſand marks, to any perſon who ſhould take him, alive or dead; and it was not long before he was diſcovered in a garden, at Hothfield in Suſſex, by Alexander Eden, a Kentiſh gentleman, who endeavoured to apprehend him; but Cade fought till he was killed on the ſpot; and his body being brought in a cart to London, his head was cut off and fixed upon London-bridge, together with the heads of nine of his accomplices.

Thus happily ended this dangerous rebellion, chiefly through the bravery of the citizens of London, whoſe courageous reſiſtance of the inſurgents at London-bridge, paved the way for all the happy conſequences that followed.

In the year 1451, Godfrey Fielding, mayor of London, being greatly in favour with the king, his majeſty created him one of his privy-counſellors. We mention not this circumſtance as a matter of any great importance in itſelf, but to obviate a miſtake which has lately prevailed, that Mr. Harley, late Lord-mayor of London, was the firſt perſon in that rank of life that was ever honoured with a ſeat in the privy-council.

The cuſtom of the Lord-mayor elect being rowed in a barge to Weſtminſter, in order to qualify himſelf for his office, took its riſe in the year 1454, when John Norman, the newly choſen mayor, having built an elegant barge at his own expence, his example was imitated by the ſeveral city companies, who attended him in their reſpective barges, magnificently painted, and adorned with flags and ſtreamers.

The queen and her party continuing to influence all the king's actions, the affections of his ſubjects were at length ſo entirely alienated from him, that great numbers of them joined the duke of York, who with an army compoſed of Welſhmen and the diſſatisfied Engliſh, engaged the king's army at St. Alban's, and after an obſtinate battle, Henry was taken priſoner, ſent to London, and confined in the palace of the biſhop of that dioceſe.

The battle above-mentioned happened in the week before Whitſuntide, ſoon after which the parliament aſſembled, removed all the king's evil counſellors, and made choice of the duke of York to be protector of the kingdom.

At this period there were ſeveral extraordinary riots in this city, of which the two following were the moſt remarkable. A number of the inhabitants of St. Martin's-le-Grand aſſembled, and having violently aſſaulted the citizens, ſeveral of whom they beat and wounded, they returned to their habitations within the ſanctuary of their church.

This affair being repreſented to the mayor and aldermen, they went to the monaſtery with proper attendants, forced open the door and ſeized the rioters, whom they committed to priſon.

Hereupon the dean of Weſtminſter complained to the king that the mayor and aldermen had been guilty of a breech of privilege; upon which they were ſummoned before the king and council, then at Egle in Hertfordſhire, who, after a long examination, diſmiſſed them, with an order to detain the rioters in cuſtody till his majeſty ſhould come to London, and enquire more particularly into the merits of the affair.

The particulars of the other riot are as follow. A young mercer of the city of London, having reſided ſome time in Italy, where, by the laws of the country, he was forbid to wear a dagger, being returned to England, accidentally met an Italian in Cheapſide, with a dagger by his ſide. This circumſtance ſo highly offended the mercer, that he ſnatched the dagger and broke the foreigner's head with it, affirming, that as himſelf had not been allowed to wear a weapon in Italy, neither ſhould the other in London.

The Italian applied to the Lord-mayor for redreſs, who ſummoned the mercer to appear before himſelf and the whole court of aldermen, and, upon full conviction of his guilt, ſentenced him to be impriſoned in Newgate: but as the proper officers were conveying him to the jail, a number of ſervants in the mercery buſineſs, ſtopped them near the end of Laurence-lane, Cheapſide, and reſcued the priſoner.

The populace, taking the advantage of the confuſion which this affair occaſioned, immediately aſſembled in great numbers, and plundered the houſes of the moſt eminent Italian merchants in the city; nor was the tumult appeaſed without bloodſhed; while the mercer who had occaſioned all the diſturbance, took ſanctuary in the abbey church of St. Peter, where he remained till the whole matter was adjuſted.

The report of theſe riots gave great uneaſineſs to the queen and her party, who apprehended that they might be ſet on foot by the adherents of the duke of York: whereupon her majeſty diſpatched the dukes of Exeter and Buckingham, with other noblemen, to aſſiſt the mayor and aldermen in the trial and puniſhment of the offenders.

A court was accordingly held at Guildhall, and they were proceeding to impannel the jury, when the mob aſſembled in greater numbers than ever, and threatened that if their fellow citizens, then in priſon on account of the late riots, were tried, they would take a ſevere revenge.

Theſe threats ſo intimidated the court, that they they immediately broke up, and the queen's commiſſioners retired with the utmoſt precipitation: but the mayor, foreſeeing that if a ſtop was not put to the riotous proceedings of the populace, there would be an end of all civil government in the city, he ſummoned a court or common-council, to meet at Guildhall on the following day, and ſtrictly enjoined the warden of every fellowſhip to aſſemble his whole fellowſhip at the reſpective halls that very afternoon, and to charge every member of their community, to keep, in his own perſon, and endeavour to maintain the peace of the city: and that if they ſhould diſcover or ſuſpect any perſon inclined to attempt the forcible releaſe of ſuch perſons as were in priſon, the ſaid warden ſhould, by fair means, endeavour to perſuade the parties ſo diſpoſed to change their ſentiments, and in the mean time give their name or names privately to the mayor.

The conſequence of this proceeding was, that all tumults ſubſided, and the queen's commiſſioners returning to the city, the priſoners were brought to their trial, three of whom were condemned and hanged at Tyburn, and ſeveral others fined in conſiderable ſums of money.

It having been found by experience that the four grammar ſchools already founded were productive of great public good; five other ſchools were now opened, (under the auſpices of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the biſhop of London) which were reſpectively ſituated within the church-yard of St. Paul; at the collegiate church of St. Martin-le-Grand; at Bow-church in Cheapſide; at St. Dunſtan's in the eaſt; and at the hoſpital of St. Anthony.

Towards the cloſe of the year 1456 two whales, a ſword-fiſh, and a fiſh called Mors Marina, were taken in the river Thames near Erith; which the inhabitants of London, who were at that time amazingly ſuperſtitious, conſidered as the ſure prognoſticks of public calamity and misfortune.

A power having been granted to the curates of the churches of London, in the year 1453, to levy certain rates or offerings upon the laity, it had given riſe to many diſputes between the clergy and their pariſhioners: but in the year 1457, theſe diſputes were finally adjuſted, by the clergy agreeing to accept, and the laity to pay, the following compoſition.

The compoſition of all offering within the city of LONDON and ſuburbs of the ſame.

" Firſt, that every perſon, dweller and inhabitant in any houſe in London, or its ſuburbs, " who hireth and occupieth the ſame at 10*s* per " annum, ſhall offer to God, and to the church " in whoſe pariſh ſuch houſe ſtandeth, one farthing on each of the feaſt days, hereafter mentioned; viz. on every Sunday in the year, " Chriſtmas-day, circumciſion, epiphany, purification of our lady, aſcenſion of our Lord, " Corpus Chriſti, St. Matthew, St. Simon and " Jude, All-ſaints, St. Andrew, conception of " the bleſſed Virgin, St. Thomas the apoſtle, St. " Peter and Paul, St. James and St. Bartholomew, aſſumption and nativity of our lady, dedication day: to be kept for all the churches " in London from henceforward on the 3d of " October yearly; and alſo on the patron's day " of each church in London and its ſuburbs. It

It is proper to obſerve, that at this time, there were, within the city of London, and the ſuburbs thereof, one hundred and eighteen pariſh churches.

In the year 1458, the king and queen, the dukes of York, Exeter, and Somerſet, the earls of Warwick, Northumberland and Saliſbury, and the lords Egermond, and Clifford, having arrived in the city of London, and all of them being attended by great numbers of guards; (the loweſt number being four hundred) Godfrey Buloine, the Lord-mayor, began to be apprehenſive for the ſafety of the city; upon which he cauſed five thouſand citizens to mount guard, under his own command, and two thouſand every night, under the command of three aldermen; by which prudent meaſure the peace of the city was preſerved, till the departure of its illuſtrious, but unwelcome viſiors.

The meaſures of the court were at length ſo oppreſſive as not to be endured; when the earl of March, chiefly on the invitation of the Londoners, landed at Sandwich, in Kent, from Calais.

The king was no ſooner informed of the earl's arrival in England, than he commanded lord Scales to march with a large body of troops, to poſſeſs himſelf of the city of London; but the Lord-mayor refuſed to admit an army within the line of his juriſdiction; and told lord Scales, that he wanted no aſſiſtance, either in the government or defence of the city.

Hereupon that nobleman, who foreſaw the intention of the citizens to admit the earl of March, poſſeſſed himſelf of the Tower, and threatened to lay the city in aſhes, in caſe the rebels were admitted.

It appears, however, that theſe menaces had but little weight with the Londoners; for the earl of March no ſooner appeared before the gates of the city, than he was received with every poſſible demonſtration of joy.

The metropolis having thus declared for the earl, he immediately marched at the head of twenty-five thouſand men, in ſearch of the king, leaving the earl of Saliſbury, with the remainder of his army, to defend the city againſt lord Scales, who really did as he had threatened, firing guns upon the city in ſuch a manner, as to deſtroy many houſes and kill ſeveral people.

Hereupon the earl of Saliſbury blocked up the Tower on all ſides, and erected a battery on the oppoſite ſide of the Thames, which ſoon prevented Scales from firing on the city.

In a ſhort time after this the king's army was routed at Northampton, which being followed by many other advantages on the ſide of the earl of March, the latter was, at length, received into London with every poſſible teſtimony of joy; and in a convention of the nobility, clergy, gentry and citizens, held at Baynard's caſtle, king Henry was depoſed, and the earl of March unanimouſly choſen king by the name of Edward IV.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Edward the fourth proclaimed. Crowned. Grants a valuable charter to the citizens. Particulars of the ſecond charter of king Edward the fourth. Sentence of excommunication pronounced againſt the wearers of long-toed ſhoes. A jury puniſhed for perjury.

KING Henry was no ſooner depoſed, than Edward the fourth was proclaimed at the uſual places of making proclamation in the cities of London and Weſtminſter.

One of the firſt actions of this monarch evinced an arbitrary turn of mind, which does him no ſmall diſhonour. One Walker, a grocer, who lived at the ſign of the crown in Cheapſide, having, in a joke, ſaid that he would make his ſon heir to the crown, (meaning his own ſign) it came to the knowledge of the king, who ordered the unfortunate man to be beheaded in Smithfield; which was accordingly performed on the eighth day after the king's acceſſion to the throne.

On the twenty-ſeventh of June, 1460, being the day appointed for his majeſty's coronation, he rode from the Tower through the city in great ſtate to Weſtminſter, where the ceremony was performed.

This monarch, in the ſecond year of his reign, in grateful acknowledgment of repeated favours from the citizens of London, granted them a valuable charter, of which we have ſubjoined a faithful copy, that our fellow-citizens may be well inſtructed in their ancient, chartered, and invaluable privileges!

"Edward, by the grace of God, king of "England and France, and lord of Ireland, to "all archbiſhops, &c. greeting. Although as "we underſtand ſuch things altogether as ought "to be holden and determined by conſervators of "the peace, and juſtices aſſigned for hearing and "determining divers felonies, treſpaſſes, and "miſdemeanors, in all the counties of our realm "of England, by the king's authority, by virtue "of the ordinances and ſtatutes of our realm "aforeſaid, made for the good of the peace, and "rule of our people, have always, time out of "mind, been uſed and well affirmed, and yet be "in our city of London: nevertheleſs, to the end "that from henceforth one good, certain and "undoubted manner may be continually had in "our city, for the conſervation of the peace, and "governing our people of the ſame; and that "the ſame may always be, and remain a city of "peace and quietneſs: we will of our mere "motion, and by tenor of theſe preſents do "grant, for us, and as much as in us is, to the "mayor and commonalty of the city aforeſaid, "and to the citizens of the ſame, and to their ſuc-"ceſſors for ever, that they may have and hold "all and ſingular their liberties and free cuſtoms,

" as whole and ſound as ever they had and held " them in all time of our progenitors. And fur- " ther we grant, for us and our heirs aforeſaid, " to the mayor and commonalty, and citizens, " and to their ſucceſſors, the liberties and autho- " rities, acquittals and franchiſes, under written ; " that is to ſay, that from henceforth the mayor " and recorder of the ſaid city who now be, and " their ſucceſſors, and the mayors and recorders " which for the time ſhall be, as well thoſe al- " dermen which before this time have been " mayors of the ſame city, as other aldermen " who ſhall hereafter ſuſtain the charge of mayor- " alty, and ſhall not be thereof diſmiſſed as long " as they ſhall there remain aldermen for ever ; " ſhall be conſervators of the preſent peace of " our city, and the peace of our ſucceſſors of the " ſaid city and liberties thereof as well by land " as by water. And to keep or cauſe to be kept, " all ordinances and ſtatutes, made and to be " made for the good of our peace, and for the " quietneſs, rule, and government of our peo- " ple, in all their articles, as well within the " city aforeſaid, as the liberty and ſuburbs of the " ſame, as well by land as by water, according " to all the force, form and effect of the ſame. " and to chaſtiſe and puniſh whom they ſhall " find offending, contrary to the form and effect " of the ſaid ordinances and ſtatutes, as accord- " ing to the form of the ordinances and ſtatutes " aforeſaid, ſhould be done. We will alſo and " grant to the ſaid mayor and commonalty and " citizens, and their ſucceſſors that the now " mayor and his ſucceſſors aforeſaid, and the re- " corder of the ſaid city which for the time ſhall " be : and ſuch aldermen as aforeſaid, or four of " the ſame, mayor, recorder, and aldermen, of " whom we will that ſuch mayor for the time " being, and his ſucceſſors, to be one, be ju- " ſtices, and have ſo aſſigned them juſtices for " us and our ſucceſſors for ever ; to enquire, " hear, and determine, as often and at ſuch times " as to them ſhall ſeem meet, of all manner of " felonies, treſpaſſes, foreſtalling and regratings, " extortions and other miſdemeanors within the " ſaid city, or the liberties or ſuburbs thereof, " as well by land as by water, by whomſoever, " or after what manner ſoever, done or commit- " ted, and which from henceforth ſhall happen " to be done : and alſo to hear and determine, " and execute all and ſingular other things which " ſhall pertain to our juſtices of peace within our " realm of England. So always, that the ſaid " mayor and citizens, and their ſucceſſors, may " have and hold all and ſingular their antient " liberties and cuſtoms, whole, free, and ſound, " the premiſes in any thing notwithſtanding. " Given to our ſheriffs of the city aforeſaid for " the time being, and to their ſucceſſors, and to all " whatſoever citizens of the ſaid city, which " now be, and which hereafter for the time ſhall " be, by tenor of theſe preſents ; ſtreightly in " commandment, that they be attendant, coun " ſelling, anſwering and aiding the ſaid keepers " of the peace aforeſaid, the now mayor, re- " corder, and to their ſucceſſors, and to ſuch al- " dermen as aforeſaid, in all things they do, or " may pertain to the office of conſervator of the " peace, and of ſuch juſtices within the ſaid city, " and the liberties thereof, according to the form " aforeſaid, as often, and at ſuch times, as ſhall be " by them, or any of them, on our behalf, duly " required. Saving always to the mayor and com- " monalty, and the citizens of the ſame city, and " to their ſucceſſors, the cuſtoms, liberties and fran- " chiſes, which we will and ſtrictly command to " be inviolably obſerved in all things, as they " and their predeceſſors before the making of " theſe preſents obſerved the ſame. And becauſe " we underſtand, that by the moſt ancient cuſtom " of the ſaid city, it is there had, and in the cir- " cuits of the juſtices of our progenitors, ſome- " times kings of England, it is allowed to the " ſaid citizens, that the mayor and aldermen of " the ſaid city, for the time being, ought to re- " cord all their ancient cuſtoms by word of " mouth, as often and at ſuch time as any thing " ſhould be moved in act or queſtion before any " judges or juſtices touching their cuſtoms afore- " ſaid ; as in their claims in the laſt circuit of " juſtices holden at our Tower of London it is " more fully contained : We, conſidering the " ſame thing, being willing rather to enlarge " than diminiſh the cuſtom of the ſaid city, of " our ſpecial grace have granted, for us, our " heirs and ſucceſſors, unto the ſaid mayor and " commonalty, and citizens, and their ſucceſſors, " that whenſoever any iſſue ſhall be taken on any " plea of, or upon the cuſtom of the city of " London, between any parties in pleading, (yea " though themſelves be parties) or if any thing " in plea, act, and queſtion, touching the ſaid " cuſtoms be moved, or happen before us or our " heirs to be holden, the juſtices of the common " bench, the treaſurer and barons of our exche- " quer, or of our heirs, or before the barons of " ſuch like exchequer, or any other the juſtices " of us, or our heirs, which ſhall exact or " require inquiſition, recognizance, certificate or " trial, the ſame mayor and aldermen of the ſaid " city for the time being, and their ſucceſſors, " ſhall record, teſtify, and declare, whether ſuch " be a cuſtom or not, by the recorder of the " ſame city for the time being, by word of " mouth ; and that there may be ſpeedy proceſs " by that record, certificate, and declaration, ſuch " cuſtom ſo alledged ſhall be allowed for a cuſ- " tom, or accounted not for a cuſtom, without " any jury therefore to be taken, or further pro- " ceſs thereupon to be made. enjoy

" enjoy and uſe all and ſingular the liberties, " grants, acquittals, ordinances, articles, free- " cuſtoms, and other things whatſoever, ſo not " uſed or abuſed, in the charters aforeſaid con- " tained, and every of them, without impeach- " ment or let of us, or our heirs, juſtices, eſ- " cheators, ſheriffs, or other our bailiffs and " miniſters, or of any other whatſoever ally, ſta- " tutes or ordinances made, or judgments given; " or any other charters, or any the charters of our " predeceſſors whatſoever, in times paſt granted " to the contrary notwithſtanding. And we, be- " ing willing further to do the ſaid mayor and " commonalty a greater pleaſure; and alſo for " the bettering and common profit of our ſaid " city, will and grant to the ſaid mayor and com- " monalty, and their ſucceſſors, that from hence- " forth all and ſingular merchants, as well deni- " zens as aliens, abiding within the ſaid city, " and the liberties and ſuburbs of the ſame, and " exerciſing merchandizing or occupations there, " by any means, by themſelves or others, though " they be not of the liberty of the ſame city, " ſhall be partakers, ſhall be taxed, and contri- " bute according to their faculties in ſubſidies, " tallages, grants, and other contributions what- " ſoever, by any means to be aſſeſſed, for the " need of us, or of our heirs, or of the ſaid city, " for the maintenance of the ſtate and profit of " the ſame with the citizens of the ſaid city: yet " notwithſtanding, that this our preſent grant be " not in prejudice or derogation of any grants by " us, or any of our progenitors, made or granted " to thoſe merchants of Almaine, which have an " houſe in the city of London, which is commonly " called the Guildhall of the Almains, or their " ſucceſſors. And further, becauſe it is well " known and manifeſt, that thoſe of the ſaid city " which are called elected, and taken to the de- " gree of aldermen, proper for the conditions and " merits requiring the ſame, have ſuſtained and " ſupported great charges, coſt, and pains, for the " time they make their abode and reſidence in the " ſame city, being vigilant for the common good, " rule, and government of the ſame, and for that " cauſe oftentimes do leave their poſſeſſions, and " places in the countries there; that therefore they " and every of them, may, without all fear of un " quietneſs or moleſtation, peaceably abide and " tarry in ſuch their houſes, places and poſſeſſions, " when they ſhall return thither for comfort and " recreation's-ſake. We have, of our ſpecial " grace, granted to the ſaid mayor and common- " alty, and to their ſucceſſors aforeſaid, that all " and every of thoſe which be aldermen of the " ſaid city, and their ſucceſſors which for the time " ſhall be aldermen there, for the term of their " lives ſhall have this liberty; that is to ſay, " that as long as they ſhall continue aldermen " there, and ſhall bear the charge of aldermen " proper; and alſo thoſe which before had been " aldermen, and have alſo with their great coſts " and expences born the offices of mayoralty, " ſhall not be put in any aſſizes, juries, or attaints, " recognizances, or inquiſitions, out of the ſaid " city; and that they nor any of them ſhall be " tryer or tryers of the ſame, although they " touch us, or our heirs, or ſucceſſors, or other " whomſover.

" And that without that city neither they nor " any of them be made collectors or collector, " aſſeſſor, taxer, overſeer, or comptroller of the " tenths, fifteenths, taxes, tallages, ſubſidies, or " other charges, or impoſitions whatſoever, to us " our heirs, or ſucceſſors, hereafter to be granted " or given: and if they, or any of them, be " elected to any of the offices or charges afore- " ſaid, and that the ſaid mayor or aldermen do " deny, refuſe, or not do the offices or charges " aforeſaid, then they, or any of them, ſhall not " by any means incur any contempt, loſs, pain, " fine, impriſonment, or forfeiture, by occaſion " of their ſo refuſing or not doing; nor ſhall for " that cauſe forfeit any iſſues by any means: and " further, as we underſtand, lord Edward, ſome- " times king of England, the third, after the con- " queſt, our progenitor, with the aſſent of the pre- " lates, earls, barons, and commonalty of the realm " of England, aſſembled in parliament, holden at " Weſtminſter, in the firſt year of his reign, at the " petition of the then citizens of the ſaid city, " by his letters patents granted, for him and his " heirs, to the ſame citizens, the town of South- " wark, with the appurtenances, to have and to " hold to them and their ſucceſſors, citizens of the " ſame city, of the ſame our progenitors, and " their heirs for ever; paying unto him by the " year, at the exchequer of him and his heirs, at " the terms accuſtomed, the farm therefore due " and accuſtomed, as in the ſaid letters patents " more fully is contained. And now the mayor " and commonalty of the ſaid city, and their " predeceſſors, have and hold certain liberties and " franchiſes in the town aforeſaid by virtue of thoſe " letters patents; and do uſe the ſame as their " predeceſſors have had and held them, and have " uſed and enjoyed them; and they now fear that " divers doubts, opinions, varieties, ambiguities, " controverſies and diſſentions, may light, and " be likely to ſpring, grow, be imagined, holden, " and had in time to come, in and about the uſe " and exerciſe of ſuch liberties and franchiſes, " for want of more clear and full declaration and " expreſſing of the ſame; for that divers diverſly " interpret, judge, and underſtand: we therefore, " to the end to take away from henceforth and " utterly aboliſh all and all manner of cauſes, " occaſions, and matters, whereupon ſuch opi- " nions, ambiguities, varieties, controverſies, and " diſſentions may ſpring, be holden, and moved " in this behalf, have, of our ſpecial grace, and " from our meer motion, granted to the ſaid " mayor and commonalty of the ſaid city which " now be, and their ſucceſſors, mayor and com- " monalty and citizens of that city, which for the " time being ſhall be for ever, the town of South- " wark, with the appurtenances, with all chat- " tels, called waif * and eſtray †; and alſo treaſure " found

By the above recited charter, not only all the ancient rights and privileges of the city are confirmed; but it is likewiſe granted that the mayor, recorder, and the aldermen paſt the chair, ſhall be perpetual juſtices of the peace, and likewiſe juſtices of oyer and terminer, for the trying of all malefactors within their own juriſdiction; that the Lord-mayor and aldermen may, by the mouth of their recorder, declare, whether, when a plea is brought into any of the ſuperior courts, the controverted point be a cuſtom of the city or not: that the mayor and aldermen be for ever exempt from ſerving in all foreign aſſizes, juries, or attaints, and likewiſe from the offices of aſſeſſor, collector of taxes, overſeer or comptroller of all public duties without the juriſdiction of the city,

By this charter likewiſe, the grant of the borough of Southwark is confirmed; and the citizens are entitled to the goods and chattles of traitors, felons, &c. with the privilege of holding a fair annually in the ſaid borough, at the fee-farm rent of ten pounds.

In the year 1463, king Edward granted the citizens of London a ſecond charter, by which the tronage, weighing, meaſuring, laying up, placing, and houſing of wool, which uſed to be brought to the ſtaple at Weſtminſter, was ordered to be in Leadenhall, and in no other place within three miles of the city: and all fees, profits, and emoluments, ariſing from the ſaid laying-up, placing and houſing, were granted to the mayor, commonalty and citizens, for ever.

In the year 1465, a moſt abſurd cuſtom prevailed, of wearing ſhoes with toes of an enormous length; for the preventing of which proclamation was made, that, for the future, the beaks or toes of ſhoes and boots ſhould not exceed two inches in length, on the penalty of the wearer being excommunicated, and paying a fine of twenty ſhillings for each offence, to be equally divided between the king, the chamber of London, and the company of Cordwainers.

In the year 1468, we have a remarkable inſtance on record, of ſeveral of the London jury, who, having taken bribes to favour a priſoner who was to be tried before them, were apprehended and brought to their trials, before the Lord-mayor, for wilful and corrupt perjury; and being convicted on full evidence, they were ſentenced to ride from Newgate to Cornhill, with paper mitres on their heads, where they were expoſed to the deriſion of the public, and then carried back in the ſame manner to Newgate.

The Lord-mayor, aldermen and citizens entertained at a grand hunting match by the king. Proceedings of the duke of Glouceſter on the death of king Edward* IV. The king's reception into London. Lord Haſtings beheaded. Subſtance of the duke of Glouceſter's ſpeech to the mayor and aldermen at the Tower. The Lord-mayor made a privy counſellor. Dr. Shaw preaches at St. Paul's croſs. Duke of Buckingham's remarkable ſpeech at Guildhall. Duke of Glouceſter requeſted to accept the crown. His artful anſwer and final compliance.

IN the year 1472 there was only one pair of ſtocks in the whole city, at the place called ſtocks-market, where the Lord-mayor's manſion-houſe now ſtands; but Sir William Hampton, who was mayor in the year above-mentioned, iſſued his orders for erecting ſtocks in every ward, for the more effectual puniſhment of vagabonds.

In the following year it was ordained, that each of the ſheriffs of London and Middleſex ſhould have ſixteen ſerjeants, under whom ſhould be the like number of yeomen; together with ſix clerks, namely, a ſecondary, a clerk of the papers, and four inferior clerks; beſides thoſe of the under ſheriff's.

In the year laſt abovementioned the ſtreets of this city were extremely infeſted with diſorderly women; to remedy which nuiſance the Lord-mayor inflicted corporal puniſhment on the moſt notorious, and ordered them to be led through the principal ſtreets, and expoſed to the contempt of the public.

In the year 1475 the company of anſeatic merchants of London obtained a confirmation of a large houſe, or hall, then called Guyhallda Teutonicorum, (but at preſent known by the name of the Steel-yard,) to them and their ſucceſſors for ever, on the condition of paying ſeventy pounds per annum, to the mayor and citizens of London, and ſome trifling rents to the owners of certain tenements adjoining to the ſaid hall.

By an act of common-council which paſſed in this year, the election of the mayor and ſheriffs, which had hitherto been in the whole body of the citizens, was veſted in the maſters, wardens, and liverymen of the ſeveral companies of the city; and this mode of election has continued to the preſent day.

In the year 1476, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council came to a reſolution, that the walls of the city ſhould be repaired with bricks made of earth, dug, tempered, and burnt in Moorfields; and that the expence of theſe repairs ſhould be defrayed by the pariſhioners of the ſeveral pariſhes, each of whom ſhould pay ſixpence every Sunday, at church, toward the ſame.

It appears, however, that the ſums of money thus levied, did not diſcharge the whole expence of

of the repairs; for the ſeveral companies of drapers, ſkinners, and goldſmiths, repaired different parts of the wall at their private charges.

In the year 1479, the king granted a third charter to the city, in which he gave the citizens permiſſion to purchaſe lands in Mortmain, to the value of two hundred marks per annum: and for this charter his majeſty received a compliment of nineteen hundred and twenty-three pounds, nine ſhillings and eight-pence.

On the twentieth of June 1479, the very day on which this charter was granted, the citizens purchaſed a fourth charter of the king, on the conſideration of abating ſeven thouſand pounds, being part of a debt of twelve thouſand, nine hundred, and twenty-three pounds, nine ſhillings and eight pence, then due from the king to the city, as appeared in the receipt of the exchequer.

By this fourth charter "the offices or occupations of packing all manner of woollen cloaths, "ſheep-ſkins, calves-ſkins, veſſels of amber, and "all other merchandize whatſoever, to be packed, tunned, piped, barrelled, or any wiſe to "be incloſed;" and alſo "the office of portage "of all wools, ſheep-ſkins, tynn bails, and other "merchandize whatſoever; likewiſe the office of "guager within the ſaid city; the office of wine "drawers, to provide for the carriage of wines "brought to the port of the ſaid city, and laid on "land, and elſewhere to be carried;" together with "the office of coroner within the ſaid city "and ſuburbs thereof," were reſpectively granted to the mayor and commonalty of London, and their ſucceſſors.

In the ſame year that theſe charters were granted, a moſt dreadful peſtilence raged in this city, which beginning about the end of September in the preceding year, continued for near fourteen months; in which time an incredible number of the citizens fell ſacrifices to its devouring rage.

One Robert Deynys, having, in the year 1480, married an orphan in the city, without licence of the magiſtrates, was adjudged, by the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen, to pay a fine of twenty pounds for the ſaid offence.

In the ſame year a remarkable puniſhment was inflicted on four perſons, who, having been tried for robbing of churches, and convicted, were ſentenced to be hanged on Tower-hill, and their bodies burnt to aſhes, together with the gibbet on which they were hanged; which ſentence was accordingly carried into execution.

The Scots having invaded England in the year 1481, the citizens of London, at the requeſt of the king, advanced five thouſand marks, towards the ſupport of an army with which his majeſty marched againſt the invaders.

At this period the citizens of London were in ſuch favour with the king, that his majeſty treated the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and others, with a grand hunting match on Waltham foreſt, in which ſeveral deer were killed, and the entertainment was concluded with a ſumptuous and ſplendid feaſt, which the king cauſed to be provided in a beautiful arbour erected on the occaſion.

On the death of Edward the fourth, his eldeſt ſon Edward ought to have ſucceeded to the throne: but Richard, duke of Glouceſter, brother to the deceaſed king, ſeized the perſon of the young prince at Stoney-Stratford, as he was on his journey from Ludlow to London.

The citizens of London no ſooner heard of this extraordinary proceeding, than great numbers of them joined the nobility, who had already taken up arms, by way of defending themſelves, till they could learn the motives of the duke of Glouceſter's conduct in ſeizing their young ſovereign.

The duke of Glouceſter, unwilling to incenſe the Londoners, ſent lord Haſtings into the city, to aſſure them that his intentions were perfectly upright; that the king was in no danger, and that the earl Rivers, lord Grey, and others, who were apprehended with his majeſty, were arreſted for conſpiring againſt the dukes of Glouceſter and Buckingham, as would ſoon appear by a legal courſe of juſtice.

Lord Haſtings farther repreſented to the citizens, the danger they would plunge themſelves into if they did not lay down their arms, and return to their reſpective habitations, without preſuming to enquire into the conduct of their ſuperiors.

His lordſhip concluded with aſſuring them, that the duke of Glouceſter and other lords were conducting the young king to London, in order to celebrated his coronation.

This ſpeech produced the deſired effect; for the citizens, yielding an implicit belief to it, immediately retired to their reſpective habitations.

On the fourth of May following, the mayor, aldermen, and five hundred of the principal citizens of London, richly dreſſed in purple gowns, and mounted on fine horſes, met king Edward V. at Hornſey Park, and conducted him to the city, where he was received with every demonſtration of joy and affection, and lodged in the palace of the biſhop of London.

During this cavalcade the duke of Glouceſter acted the moſt hypocritical part imaginable; frequently calling out to the citizens "behold your "king and ſovereign" and even carried his hypocriſy ſo far, as to do homage to the king, and perſuade the nobility to follow his example.

This behaviour ſo entirely erazed from the minds of the citizens all ill impreſſions they had conceived of Glouceſter, that they unanimouſly joined with the nobility, in appointing him to be protector of the kingdom during the minority of the king.

The perfidious duke was no ſooner veſted with this authority, than he prevailed on the queen, who had taken ſanctuary at Weſtminſter, to deliver her younger ſon, the duke of York, alſo to his care.

Having thus poſſeſſed himſelf of the perſons of the two royal youths, he lodged them both in the Tower of London, and took up his own reſidence in Croſbie's place, near Biſhopſgate, now called Croſby-ſquare.

It appears that the duke was, at all events, determined to aſcend the throne: but dreading the influence of lord Haſtings, who was one of the king's moſt zealous adherents, he cauſed him to be ſeized, and dragged to the platform near the chapel chapel within the Tower, where he was beheaded without any legal form of trial.

Richard was not without apprehenſions that ſome diſagreable conſequences might reſult from the news of this murder being propagated in the city; whereupon himſelf, and the duke of Bucking ham his accomplice, clad themſelves in ſuits of ruſty armour, and inſtantly ſent for the mayor and aldermen: and on their arrival, Glouceſter addreſſed them to the following purpoſe:

" That the lord Haſtings had conſpired with " ſeveral perſons, and contrived ſuddenly to kill " him and the duke of Buckingham, that day, " in council: that he could not yet gueſs the " cauſe of the treaſon, and had not certain know- " ledge thereof before ten o'clock of the ſame " day; which had forced them to put on ſuch " filthy armour, as being next at hand, for " their own defence; and induced the lords of " the council to order him to be immediately " executed, to prevent inſurrections and at- " tempts of his lordſhips accomplices to reſcue " him from juſtice; and to preſerve the peace of " the nation.

" This, (continued Glouceſter,) is the naked " truth: and we have ſent for you to inform you " of it, that you may, as you ſee cauſe, ſatisfy " the people of the juſtice of lord Haſtings's " ſufferings: and though we are in no wiſe oblig- " ed to do it, yet, out of a deſire to pleaſe them, " we thus condeſcend to do it; and we require " you thus to report it."

The city magiſtrates appeared to approve of the duke's conduct, and teſtified an inclination to obey his commands: but their expreſſions to their fellow citizens, on their return from the Tower, did not exhibit all that ſatisfaction with the duke's behaviour, which he hoped and expected.

Glouceſter ſoon perceived that his ſtratagem had not produced the deſired effect; whereupon he ſent a herald at arms into the city, who, at all the uſual places made a proclamation to the effect following.

" That the lord Haſtings, with divers other " wicked conſpirators, had traiterouſly contrived " the ſame day to have ſlain the protector and " duke of Buckingham ſitting in council, with a " purpoſe and deſign to take upon him the go- " vernment of the king and kingdom, and rule " all things at his pleaſure, hoping that, when " they were dead, they ſhould meet no oppoſition " in their deſigns: and in how miſerable a con- " dition this nation had been, if God had left " them in his hands, appeared from the former " actions of the ſaid lord, who, being ſo ill a " man, could not make a good governor; for " he it was, that by his ill advice enticed the " king's father to many things much redounding " to his diſhonour, and the univerſal damage and " detriment of the realm, leading him into de- " bauchery by his exemplary wickedneſs, and pro- " curing lewd and ungracious perſons to gratify " his luſts, and particularly Shores wife, who was " one of his ſecret council in this treaſon; by " which lewd living the ſaid king not only ſhort- " ened his days, but alſo was forced to oppreſs " and tax his people, that he might have ſufficient " to gratify his expences; and ſince the death of " the ſaid king, he hath lived in a continual in- " continency with the ſaid Shore's wife, and lay " nightly with her, and particularly the very " night before his death; ſo that it was no mar- " vel, if his ungracious life brought him to as " unhappy a death, which he was put to by the " ſpecial command of the king's highneſs, and " of his honourable and faithful council, both " for his own demerits, being ſo openly taken in " his intended treaſon; and alſo, leſt any delay " of his execution might have encouraged other " miſchievous perſons, who were engaged in the " conſpiracy with him to make an inſurrection for " his deliverance, which being wiſely foreſeen, " and as effectually prevented, was the only " means under God's providence to preſerve the " whole realm in peace and quietneſs."

As this ſecond attempt to impoſe on the citizens met with no better ſucceſs than the former, it became neceſſary for Glouceſter, in purſuit of his ambitious plan, to have recourſe to other means to engage the Londoners in his favour; for, without their aſſiſtance, he apprehended it would be impoſſible to aſcend the throne.

Hereupon the duke made Sir Edmund Shaw, Lord-mayor of London, a privy-counſellor; by which means he gained the intereſt of Dr. Shaw, an eloquent and popular preacher, and brother to the Lord-mayor; who undertook to preach a ſermon on the following Sunday, at St. Paul's croſs, in ſupport of the protector's right to the crown.

The doctor's text, taken from the Wiſdom of Solomon, was, " baſtard ſlips ſhall take no deep " root;" and in the courſe of his ſermon he alledged, that the late king having promiſed marriage to the lady Elizabeth Lucy, and had a child by her, ſhe was his wife in the ſight of God; and of conſequence, that the children he had by his queen were a ſpurious and baſtard iſſue; ſo that no happineſs could be expected to this kingdom, under the reign of Edward V.

He then proceeded to accuſe the mother of Edward IV. of adultery; ſo that neither the late king nor the duke of Clarence, brother to Glouceſter nor their deſcendants had any juſt title to the crown.

This artful preacher then raiſed his voice, and ſaid, " but my lord protector, that noble prince, " the pattern of all virtue and heroic actions, " carries in his air, in his mein, and in his ſoul, " the perfect image of his illuſtrious father the " great duke of York!"

This unmeaning heap of abuſe and panegyric, both equally undeſerved, not producing the effect which had been expected from it, orders were ſent to the Lord-mayor, to ſummons the aldermen and citizens to meet at Guildhall, where the duke of Buckingham with ſeveral of the nobility, attended; and the duke, aſcending the huſtings, addreſſed himſelf to the citizens in the following artful ſpeech.

" Gentlemen, out of the zeal and ſincere af-

" fection we have for your perſons and intereſts, " we are come to acquaint you with a matter of " high importance, equally pleaſing to God and " profitable to the commonwealth, and to none " more than to you the citizens of this famous " and honourable city: for the very thing which " we believe you have a long time wanted and " wiſhed for; what you would have purchaſed at " a great rate, and gone far to fetch, we are " come hither to bring you, without any labour " trouble, coſt, or peril to you. And what can " this be but your own ſafety, the peace of your " wives and daughters, the ſecurity of your goods " and eſtates, which were all in danger until now? " who of you could call what he had his own? " there were ſo many ſnares laid to deceive you; " ſo many fines and forfeitures, taxes and impo- " ſitions, of which there was no end, and often " no neceſſity: or, if there was, it was occaſioned " by riots, and unreaſonable waſte, rather than " a juſt and lawful charge for defence or honour " of the ſtate: your beſt citizens were plundered, " and their wealth ſquandered by profuſe favour- " ites: fifteenths and the uſual ſubſidies would " not do; but, under the plauſible name of bene- " volence, your goods were taken from you by " the commiſſioners againſt your will; as if by " that name was underſtood, that every man " ſhould pay, not what he pleaſed, but what the " king would have him, who never was mo- " derate in his demands, always exorbitant, turn- " ing forfeitures into fines, fines into ranſoms, " ſmall offences into miſpriſon of treaſon, and " miſpriſon into treaſon itſelf. We need not give " you examples of it: Burdet's caſe will never be " forgot, who, for a word ſpoken in haſte, was " cruelly beheaded. Did not judge Markham re- " ſign his office, rather than join with his bre- " thren in paſſing that illegal ſentence on that " honeſt man? were you not all witneſſes of the " barbarous treatment one of your own body, " the worſhipful alderman Cook, met with? and " yourſelves know too well how many inſtances " of this kind I might name among you.

" King Edward gaining the crown by conqueſt, " all that were any ways related to thoſe that were " his enemies lay under the charge of treaſon. " Thus half of the kingdom became at once trai- " tors; for half of the kingdom were either " friends to king Henry, or relations or friends " to ſome that were ſo. Though open war with " invaders is terrible and deſtructive to a nation, " yet civil diſſentions are much more fatal, and " to be dreaded; with which his reign was more " diſturbed than the reigns of all his prececeſ- " ſors. But he is dead and gone; and God for- " give his ſoul! It coſt the people more blood " and treaſure to get the crown for this prince " than it had done to conquer France twice. " Half of the nobility of the kingdom loſt their " lives or eſtates in the quarrel; and, when the " diſpute was over, the peace that followed was " not much ſafer than the war: every rich and " landed man was in danger; for whom could he " truſt that diſtruſted his own brother? whom " ſpare, that killed his own brother? or who " could perfectly love him, whom his own brother " could not love? we ſhall, in honour to the " memory of one that was our ſovereign, forbear " to mention, who were the perſons, on which " he was ſo laviſh of his favours: only it is well " known that thoſe that deſerved them moſt had " the leaſt of them. Was not Shore's wife his " chief miniſter? was there not more court made " to her than all the lords of England, except " thoſe that were the ſtrumpet's favourites? who, " poor woman! was herſelf chaſte, and of good " reputation, till he deluded her to his luſt, and " tempted her from her huſband, an honeſt ſub- " ſtantial young man, whom you all know. In- " deed, I am aſhamed to ſay it, the king's appe- " tite in that point was inſatiable and intolerable. " No woman could eſcape him: young or old, " rich or poor, wife or virgin, all fell victims to " his luſt: by which means the moſt honourable " houſes were defiled, and the moſt honourable " families were corrupted.

" You of this renowned city ſuffered moſt: " you, who deſerved moſt from him, for your " readineſs to ſerve the houſe of York with your " lives and fortunes; which tho' he ill requited, " there is of that houſe, who, by God's grace, " ſhall reward you better. I ſhall not enlarge " on this ſubject: you have heard it from one, " whom ye will hearken to more, as you ought " to do: for I am not ſo vain as to think what " I can ſay will have ſo great authority with you " as the words of a preacher; a man ſo wiſe and " ſo pious, that he could not utter a thing, in " the pulpit eſpecially, which he did not firmly " believe it was his duty to declare. You re- " member, I doubt not, how he ſet forth, laſt " Sunday, the right of the moſt excellent Richard " duke of Glouceſter to the crown of this realm: " for, as he proved to you, the children of king " Edward IV. were never lawfully begotton, the " king leaving his lawful wife, the lady Lucy, " to contract an illegal marriage with the queen. " My noble lord the protector's reverence to the " dutcheſs his mother will not permit me to ſay " any thing further concerning what the worthy " doctor alledged of her familiarity with others " beſides her own huſband, for fear of offending " the duke of Glouceſter her own ſon: though, " for theſe cauſes, the crown of England is de- " volved to the moſt excellent prince the lord " protector, as the only lawful begotten ſon " of the right noble duke of York. This, and " the conſideration of his many high qualities, " has prevailed with the lords and commons of " England, of the northern counties eſpecially, " who have declared they will not have a baſtard " reign over them, to petition that high and " mighty prince to take on him the ſovereign " power, for the good of the realm, to which he " has ſo rightful and lawful a title. We have " reaſon to fear he will not grant our requeſt; " being a prince whoſe wiſdom foreſees the labour, " both of body and mind, that attends the ſu- " preme dignity; which is not a place for a child, " as that wiſe man obſerved, who ſaid, Væ regno " cujus rex puer eſt, i. e. Woe to the realm whoſe " king is a child. Wherefore we have reaſon to " bleſs God that the prince, whoſe right is to " reign over us, is of ſo ripe age, ſo great wiſdom " and experience, who, though he is unwilling to " take the government upon himſelf, yet the peti" tion

" tion of the lords and gentlemen will meet with " the more favourable acceptance, if you the wor- " ſhipful citizens of the metropolis of the king- " dom will join with us in our requeſt; which, for " your welfare, we doubt not but you will. How- " ever, I heartily entreat you to do it for the " common good of the people of England, whom " yuo will oblige by chuſing them ſo good a king, " and his majeſty by ſhewing early your ready diſ- " poſitions to his election; in which, my moſt dear " friends, I require you, in the name of myſelf " and theſe lords, to ſhew us plainly your minds " and intentions."

The citizens were ſtruck with ſuch horror and amazement at this ſpeech, that they remained entirely ſilent, as totally unable to expreſs their abhorrence at the injuſtice and abſurdity of the propoſal.

Hereupon Buckingham addreſſed himſelf to the mayor, enquiring the cauſe of their profound ſilence; to which the mayor anſwered, that, perhaps the citizens did not underſtand his grace: on which the duke repeated the ſubſtance of what he had ſaid, and enforced it with all the powers of his oratory.

But this ſecond effort making no deeper impreſſion on their minds than the firſt, the recorder was directed to addreſs the aſſembly on the ſame ſubject: which he at length undertook, though with great reluctance; repeating only the ſubſtance of what the duke had ſaid, without adding a ſingle word in favour of the protector.

Upon this Buckingham, having obſerved to the mayor that the people were amazingly obſtinate, once more addreſſed the citizens, in the following words.

" Dear friends, we came to acquaint you " with a thing which we needed not have " done, had it not been for the affection we " bear you. The lords and commons could " have determined the matter without you, " but would gladly have you join with us, " which is for your honour and profit, though " you do not ſee it, or conſider it: We re- " quire you therefore to give your anſwer one " way or another, whether you are willing, as " the lords are, to have the moſt excellent prince " the lord protector to be your king, or not?"

This ſhort addreſs produced almoſt a general murmur through the aſſembly; but a few ſervants of the protector and the duke of Buckingham, having aſſembled a number of apprentices and other rabble, they crouded into the hall, threw up their hats in the air, and cried out, " King " Richard! King Richard!"

Buckingham inſtantly ſeized this opportunity of making his acknowledgements; and, as if this teſtimony of approbation had been general, addreſſed the aſſembly as follows.

" 'Tis a goodly and joyful cry, to hear every " man with one voice agree to it, and nobody " ſay no. Since therefore, dear friends, we ſee " you are all, as one man, inclined to have this " noble prince to be your king, we ſhall report " the matter ſo effectually to him, that we doubt " not it will be much for your advantage. We " require you to attend us to-morrow, with our " joint petition to his Grace, as has been already " agreed on between us."

Buckingham and the reſt of the noblemen now retired, leaving the citizens in the utmoſt dejection of mind; who, not daring to expreſs in public their diſapprobation of this day's tranſactions, retired to their reſpective habitations, to vent their griefs in private.

However, the Lord-mayor, Sir Edmund Shaw, prevailed on the aldermen, and ſeveral of the common-council, to attend him, on the following day, at Baynard's caſtle, where the duke of Glouceſter then reſided; and there they found the duke of Buckingham, and ſeveral of the nobility.

A new farce was now acted. The duke of Buckingham ſent in a meſſenger to acquaint the protector, that a great number of the nobility and citizens deſired an audience, on an affair of the utmoſt importance.

Glouceſter appeared to be averſe to their admittance; upon which Buckingham hinted to the mayor and citizens, that the protector was totally ignorant of their deſign, nor knew any of what had paſſed at Guildhall.

It was now determined to ſend in another meſſenger, who, in the moſt earneſt and humble manner entreated the protector to grant the deſired audience, with which, with great apparent diffidence, he at length complied.

The company being introduced, the duke of Buckingham, in the name of himſelf and the company, apologized for the intruſion, in the moſt humble manner, and after enumerating the grievances of the people, begged the protector to aſſume the reins of government, as the only method to ſecure the public welfare.

Richard, with a degree of hypocriſy that would be aſtoniſhing in any other character than his own, anſwered, " That, though he knew the things " he alledged to be true, yet he loved king Ed- " ward and his children above any crown what- " ſoever; and therefore could not grant their " requeſt: however he pardoned their petition, " and thanked them for their love; but deſired " them to be obedient to the prince under whom " himſelf and they lived at that time; and whom " he would adviſe to the beſt of his capacity, as " he had already done, to the ſatisfaction of all " parties."

The duke of Buckingham affecting to receive this anſwer with the utmoſt diſſatisfaction, aſked the protector pardon for what he had farther to offer, but declared, " That they were all agreed " not to have any of king Edward's line to reign " over them; that they were gone too far to go " back; for which reaſon, if his grace would be " pleaſed to take the crown upon him, they hum- " bly beſeeched him to do it; or, if he would " give them a reſolute anſwer to the contrary, " which they ſhould be loth to hear, they muſt " and would look out ſome other perſon that " would accept of their propoſal."

Thus

Thus urged, the artful duke, as in obedience to the general wiſh of the people, complied with their demands in the following terms:

" Since we perceive that the whole realm is " bent upon it, not to have king Edward's chil- " dren to govern over them, of which we are " ſorry; and knowing that the crown can belong " to no man ſo juſtly as to ourſelf, the right heir, " lawfully begotten of the body of our moſt dear " father Richard, late duke of York; to which title " is now joined your election, the nobles and " commons of this realm, which we, of all titles " poſſible, take for the moſt effectual; we are " content, and agree favourably to receive your " petition and requeſt, and, according to the " ſame, take upon us the royal eſtate, prehemi- " nence, and kingdoms of the two noble realms " of England and France; the one, from this " day forward, by us and our heirs, to rule, " govern and defend; the other, by God's grace " and your good help, to get again, ſubdue, and " eſtabliſh for ever in due obedience to this realm " of England; and we aſk of God to live no " longer than we intend to procure its advance- " ment."

CHAPTER XXVI.

The young princes murdered in the Tower. Coronation of Richard III. Copy of the citizens claim of the office of chief butler. The earl of Richmond invades England. King Richard ſlain at the battle of Boſworth. King Henry VII. enters into London. The ſweating ſickneſs. The croſs in Cheapſide finiſhed. A mercenary act of common council. Henry and his queen enter into London, after the defeat of Simnel the impoſtor. Penalty on killing beaſts in London. The Flemiſh merchants baniſhed the city. Their conſpiracy and puniſhment. The king entertains the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and citizens. Laws to puniſh perjury in jurors. The artillery-ground formed from a part of Bunhill-fields. Remarkable plenty of corn. Twenty thouſand perſons deſtroyed by the plague, to avoid which, the king and queen retire to Calais. Kitchens firſt built at Guildhall. The aldermen, for the firſt time attend the mayor to the water-ſide on horſeback.

RICHARD duke of Glouceſter having thus uſurped the throne, prevailed on Sir James Tyrrell to murder the young king, and his brother, the duke of York, by ſmothering them between two beds, in the Tower of London.

On the ſixth day of July, 1483, Richard, accompanied by his queen, rode through the city in great ſtate, to Weſtminſter, where they were crowned in a very ſolemn manner: but it appears that this monarch had but little confidence in the affections of his new ſubjects; for he previouſly ſent for five thouſand men, from the north of England, to protect him againſt any accident that might happen at the coronation.

Previous to the coronation of Richard III. the citizens of London claimed the office of chief butler, in the following terms; from whence it ſeems probable that the citizens of Wincheſter had renewed their claim to that office, which they had made at the commencement of ſeveral preceding reigns.

To the Right High and Mighty Prince the Duke of Norfolk, Seneſchal of England.

" Shewen unto your good and gracious lord- " ſhip, the mair and citezeins of the citee of " London, that where, after the liberty and commendable cuſtomes of the ſaid citee, of time " that no man's mind is to the contrary, uſed, " enjoyed, and accuſtomed, the mair of the " ſame citee for the time being, by reaſon of the " office of mairalty of the ſaid citee, in his own " perſon, oweth of right and duty to ſerve the " kyng our ſouvereigne lord in the day of his " ful noble coronation, in ſuch place as it ſhall " pleaſe his highneſs to take his ſpices, and " the ſame cup, with the kevering belonging " thereunto, and a layer [ewer] of gold, the " ſaid mair to have, and with him to bear away " at the time of his departing, for his fee and " reward.

" And alſo that divers other citezeins, that " by the ſaid mair and citee ſhal thereto be " named and choſen, owen of right by the ſame " cuſtom, at the ſame day to ſerve in the office " of butlerſhip, in helping of the chief butler of " England, to the lords and eſtates that ſhall " be at the ſaid coronation, as well at the table " in the hall at meat, as after meat in the " chamber.

" Beſeeching your ſaid lordſhip, that Edmund " Shaa, now mair, and other citezeins of the " citee aforeſaid, to the ſaid office and ſer- " vice now choſen, whoſe names, in a ſce- " dule hereunto annexed, be ſpecified, may be " admitted to do the ſame ſervice, as their " predeceſſors mairs and citezeins of the ſaid " citee, in caſe ſemblable, have uſed in days " paſt.

" Alſo the ſaid mair and citezeins praying, " that they may ſit, in the day of the ſaid " coronation, at the table next the cupboard, " of the left ſide of the hall, lykes as of late " tyme it hath been uſed and accuſtomed; " and

" and that the ſaid mair may have and enjoy " the ſaid fee and reward, according to the " dutie."

In the year 1485, the earl of Richmond, who had been invited from his exile to invade England, in order to dethrone Richard, marched with his army from Wales towards London; upon which Richard gave immediate orders for the repair of the Tower of London, and immediately marched to meet his opponent.

The armies came to an engagement at Boſworth, in Leiceſterſhire, and, after a furious battle of near two hours, Richard was ſlain, and his crown, which he had worn during the fight, being found among the ſpoils of the field, was placed on the head of the earl of Richmond, who was ſaluted as king by the whole army.

Richmond, who was now acknowledged king by the name of Henry VII. immediately ſet out for London, which he entered on the twenty-ſeventh of Auguſt amidſt the ſhouts and acclamations of the people, who conſidered him as their deliverer from the moſt cruel of tyrants, that perhaps ever diſgraced the annals of any kingdom.

The new king, attended by the Lord-mayor and aldermen in ſcarlet robes, and a great number of citizens in violet colour'd gowns, proceeded directly to St. Paul's church, where he offered up the ſtandard he had taken in battle, and when divine ſervice was ended, he repaired to the palace of the biſhop of London; where, in a few days he aſſembled a council of all the nobility and gentry then in London, and ſolemnly renewed the oath he had formerly taken to marry the princeſs Elizabeth.

A moſt dreadful, and hitherto unheard of diſtemper broke out this year, in the city of London, and ſome other parts of the kingdom. It was a kind of malignant fever, called the ſweating ſickneſs, and carried off thoſe who were attacked with it in twenty-four hours; but thoſe who ſurvived that time generally recovered.

In the year 1486, the croſs at the weſt end of Cheapſide, (then called the Weſtcheap) was compleated and moſt curiouſly embelliſhed at the expence of a number of the citizens, among whom John Fiſher, a mercer, contributed no leſs than ſix hundred marks.

In the following year the court of common-council paſſed an act, whereby the citizens were enjoined, on the penalty of one hundred pounds, " not to carry any goods or merchandize to any " fair or market within the kingdom, for the term " of ſeven years."

This act was ſo unreaſonable in itſelf, and gave ſuch offence to the legiſlature, that it was repealed by an act of parliament paſſed in the following year, which empowered the citizens to carry on their commerce as uſual, to the ſeveral parts of the kingdom: and a penalty of forty pounds was laid on any perſon who ſhould preſume to moleſt any of the citizens in their ſaid trade.

In the year abovementioned, Lambert Simnel, * the famous impoſtor, who perſonated the ear of Warwick, having been defeated at Stoke, near Newark, the king and queen returned towards London; and on their arrival at Hornſey-park, were met by the mayor, aldermen, and principal citizens, mounted on fine horſes, and richly dreſſed in an elegant uniform.

In this manner they entered the city, the ſtreets of which were covered with new gravel on the occaſion; and paſſing through the ſeveral livery companies, dreſſed in their formalities, their majeſties went to St. Paul's Cathedral, where Te Deum was ſolemnly ſung, on occaſion of the late victory.

About this period the inhabitants of St. Gregory and St. Faith, having made complaint of the horrid ſtench ariſing from the blood and ordure running through the ſaid pariſhes from St. Nicholas's ſhambles; (now Newgate-market;) together with the noxious vapours ariſing from the ſcalding of ſwine; the parliament, to remedy ſuch grievances for the future; paſſed an act, in which it was ordained that " no butcher ſhould " preſume to kill any beaſt within the walls of " London, upon the penalty of one ſhilling for " every ox and cow ſo killed, and eight-pence for " every beaſt."

The king having, from ſome political cauſe, conceived an inſuperable averſion to the Flemiſh nation, baniſhed all the merchants of that country from the city of London, and prohibited all intercourſe with that people.

The anſeatic merchants, taking advantage of this circumſtance, imported large quantities of merchandize from Flanders, and the Engliſh merchant adventurers became great ſufferers by being deprived of the principal part of their commerce with the Flemiſh merchants.

Theſe circumſtances ſo highly incenſed the Flemings, that they entered into a conſpiracy againſt the anſeatic merchants; and being joined by the populace, broke open and plundered their hall, ſituated where the Steel-yard now ſtands, near Thames-ſtreet.

However, a great number of armed citizens coming acroſs the Thames to the aſſiſtance of the merchants, ſeveral of the conſpirators were taken, and committed to the Tower; and after a long impriſonment ſome were hanged, and others diſcharged.

On twelfth day, in the year 1494, the king entertained the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and others of the principal citizens, at Weſtminſter; where, after dinner, Ralph Auſtrey, the mayor, was dubbed knight; and in the evening ſeveral kinds of divertiſement were exhibited in the great hall, which was hung with tapeſtry and ſtaged on each ſide.

The morning following the king, queen, and divers of the nobility, being ſeated at a ſtone table, the king and queen's meſſes, conſiſting of ſixty diſhes each, were ſerved up by ſixty knights and eſquires; the mayor was alſo ſerved with twenty-four diſhes, and plenty of the choiceſt wines, and the citizens were ſo well pleaſed with their entertainment, that they did not get to London till the break of the next day.

Notwithſtanding the care which formerly had been taken to prevent improper perſons from being impannelled on juries, it was found neceſſary in the eleventh year of Henry's reign to enact as follows:

" That, for the future, no perſon or perſons " be impannelled, or ſworn into any jury or in- " queſt in any of the city courts, unleſs he be " worth forty marks; and if the cauſe to be tried " amount to that ſum, then no perſon to be ad- " mitted a juror worth leſs than 100 marks: and " that every perſon, ſo qualified, refuſing to ſerve " as a juryman, for the firſt default to forfeit 1s. " the ſecond 2s. and every one after, to double " the ſum. That when upon trial it ſhall be " found, that a petty jury have brought in an " unjuſt verdict, then every member of the ſame " to forfeit 20l. or more, according to the diſ- " cretion of the court of Lord-mayor and al- " derman, and to ſuffer ſix months impriſonment, " or leſs, at the diſcretion of the ſaid mayor, " and aldermen, without bail or main prize, and " for ever after to be rendered incapable of ſerv- " ing in any jury. And further, if upon en- " quiry, it ſhould be found, that any juror has " taken money as a bribe, or other reward, or " promiſe of reward, to favour either plaintiff or " defendant in the cauſe to be tried by him, that " then, and in every ſuch caſe, the perſon ſo of- " fending to forfeit and pay to the party by him " thus injured, ten times the value of ſuch ſum " or reward by him taken, and alſo to ſuffer im- " priſonment, as already mentioned; and beſides, " to be diſabled for ever from ſerving in that " capacity: and that every perſon or perſons " guilty of bribing any juror, ſhall likewiſe for- " feit ten times the value given, and ſuffer im- " priſonment as aforeſaid."

A parcel of grounds, conſiſting of gardens, orchards, &c. ſituate on the north ſide of Chiſwell Street, and called by the name of Bunhill-fields, was in the year 1498, converted into a ſpacious field, for the uſe of the London archers, which is now known by the name of the Artillery Ground.

In the year 1502, the city entertainments which till that time had been given at Grocer's-hall, were ordered by the Lord-mayor to be, in future, held at Guildhall, to which end kitchens were built at the latter place, by a ſubſcription of the ſeveral companies, where ſeveral of the aldermen and principal citizens were entertained with an elegant feaſt.

It was in this year, too, that the aldermen firſt accompanied the mayor to the water-ſide when he took barge for Weſtminſter.

The marriage of the princeſs margaret, by proxy to James IV. of Scotland was publiſhed on the twenty-fifth of January at St. Paul's-croſs, on which account the citizens made bonfires, illuminated their houſes, and gave every poſſible teſtimony of the high ſatisfaction with which they received the news.

CHAPTER XXVII.

The chapel of Henry VII. in Weſtminſter Abbey founded. A particular account of the Monuments and other curioſities in that noble pile of Antiquity.

IN the year 1502, a chapel dedicated to the Virgin Mary, and a tavern, both which were ſituated at the eaſt-end of Weſtminſter-abbey, were taken down, by the order of Henry VII. and on the ground where they ſtood was erected the chapel, which is known by the name of Henry VIIth's chapel to this day.

In this place, as the moſt proper for its introduction, we ſhall give a clear and accurate account of every intereſting particular relative to, and every curioſity in the abbey church of St. Peter, Weſtminſter, of which the chapel of Henry VII. now forms a part.

There are ſo many miraculous ſtories related of the foundation of this abbey, in the legends of monkiſh writers, that by this enlightened age the bare recital would hardly be excuſed: all that can with truth be ſaid, amounts only to this, that Sebert, king of the Eaſt-ſaxons, who died in 616, being by Auſtin's preaching, and his uncle Ethelbert's example, converted to chriſtianity, threw down the temple of Apollo, weſt of London, and there moſt devoutly erected a church, which he dedicated to the honour of St. Peter, prince of the apoſtles, and appointed Melitus, then biſhop of London, to conſecrate it accordingly. Ranulphus, indeed, does not particularly mention Sebert, but has theſe remarkable words, " that ſome one, at the inſtigation of Ethelbert, " built a church to the honour of St. Peter in " the weſt part of the city of London, in a place " called Thorney, which ſignifies an iſland of " thorns, but is now called Weſtminſter."

Fleet, a monkiſh writer, ſpeaks of the city of London, as worſhipping Diana, and the ſuburbs of Thorney, as offering incenſe to Apollo; ſo that it ſeems clear almoſt to demonſtration, that this church had the ruins of a Pagan temple, for its foundation.

We are not ignorant that Sir Chriſtopher Wren, whoſe opinion is by no means to be contemned, rejects as fabulous the notion of a temple to Apollo in Thorney iſland; and the rather, becauſe it is ſaid to be deſtroyed by an earthquake in the reign of Antoninus Pius, in order to make way for a chriſ-tian church to be erected by king Lucius upon its ruins. Sir Chriſtopher to ſtrengthen his opinion, declares, that when he was employed to ſurvey Weſtminſter-abbey, though he examined both the walls and ornaments about it with the niceſt care, yet he could neither diſcover the leaſt fragment of cornice or capital, to indicate the handy work of a Roman builder, which he thinks he muſt undoubtedly have done, had the fact been true, as earthquakes break few ſtones, though they overturn edifices.

For the ſame and other reaſons mentioned in their place, he diſbelieves the founding of St. Paul's upon the ruins of a temple of Diana; yet till his time both theſe facts were credited by the moſt learned antiquarians our nation ever produced, and reported by them upon the fulleſt evidence the nature of the ſubject would admit; evidence, we think, that added to one circumſtance, which they have omitted, carries conviction along with it; namely, that the Pagans muſt certainly have had temples in both theſe cities, and that the above places, and no other, being marked by tradition for the ſcites of them, no diſcoveries have yet been made during a courſe of 1700 years, in any other places, of the remains of any ſuch edifices.

The dedication of this ancient abbey is a matter as uncertain as the foundation of it; the church hiſtorians will have it miraculous, and none but St. Peter himſelf, though dead 500 years before, muſt be admitted to that honour.

The king, as has been hinted, had ordered Mellitus to perform the ceremony, but St. Peter, as the legend ſays, was beforehand with him; for over-night he called upon Edricus, a fiſherman, and deſired to be ferry'd over to Thorney, which happened to be then flooded round by the heavy rains that had lately fallen: the fiſherman obeyed, and the apoſtle (having conſecrated the church amidſt a grand chorus of heavenly muſic, and a glorious appearance of burning lights, of which Edricus was both an ear and an eye-witneſs) on his return diſcovered himſelf, and bid the fiſherman tell Mellitus what he had heard and ſeen; giving, at the ſame time, to Edricus, a ſpecimen of his divine miſſion, by a miraculous draught of ſalmon, of which kind of fiſh when in ſeaſon, the apoſtle aſſured him, none of his occupation ſhould ever want, provided they honeſtly made an offering of the tenth fiſh to the uſe of the newly conſecrated church; which cuſtom we find continued for more than 400 years after.

We ſhould hardly have ventured to inſert this ſtory, but that it is in part confirmed, or at leaſt believed, by two royal charters; the firſt, of king Edgar, who ſpeaking of it ſays, "this church "was dedicated by no leſs than St. Peter, the "prince of apoſtles, to his own honour;" the other is of Edward the Confeſſor, which is ſtill more full, affirming it to be "dedicated by St. "Peter himſelf with the attendance of angels, by "the impreſſion of the holy croſs, and the anoint-"ment of the holy chriſm."

As we have, in a great meaſure, ſettled the æra of the foundation and dedication of this church, it remains only for us to trace by what ſteps it gradually roſe to the grandeur in which it appears at preſent; for at firſt, only that part of it was built which forms the eaſt-angle.

The next who enlarged and repaired the church of Sebert's foundation, was Offa, the great king of Mercia; for Sebert's ſons relapſing into paganiſm, it had been long neglected, and was in a very ruinated ſtate.

When it was almoſt ruined by the incurſions of the Danes, Edgar was the firſt who revived its dying luſtre, by two charters in its favour; which were afterwards confirmed and enlarged by Edward the Confeſſor, the old church was pulled down, and a moſt magnificent one for that age erected in the room of it, in the form of a croſs, which afterwards became a pattern for that kind of building. When he had ſo done, he then granted a charter of his own, wherein he recites the account of St. Peter's conſecration, as has been ſaid; its deſtruction by the Danes, the grants and privileges of his predeceſſors, ſuch as Sac and Soc, and Sol, Thol and Theam, Intoll and Uttoll, and Infrangenthet, Githrich, Hamſoken, Murage, and Fenſtall; and adds his own. This laſt charter was cloſed with ſolemn imprecations on ſuch as ſhould infringe it, and was ſigned by the king, queen, two archbiſhops, ten biſhops, and many of the abbots and nobility, at a convention called by his majeſty's order, for that purpoſe.

The next prince who laid his hands to this great work, was Henry III. who built a chapel to the bleſſed Virgin, then called the new work at Weſtminſter, the firſt ſtone whereof he laid himſelf on the Saturday before his coronation, in the year 1220, being the fifth of his reign; but about twenty-five years after, finding the walls and ſteeple of the church decayed, he pulled them down likewiſe, with a deſign to enlarge and make the whole more regular, but did not live to accompliſh his deſign, which was not compleated till twenty-three years after the death of this monarch.

Sir Chriſtopher Wren, ſays, that this king's intention certainly was to make up only the croſs to the weſtward, for thus far it is built in a different manner from the reſt more weſtward, as the pillars and ſpandrils of the arches ſhew. The work muſt therefore, in all probability, have been carried on afterwards, during the reigns of the three ſucceeding kings, by the monks and abbots, which, though it proceeded but ſlowly, was yet more ſkilfully executed than the former part. Indeed, during the tumultuous and bloody wars between the houſes of York and Lancaſter, little could be expected to be done in works of genius, but upon the advancement of the Lancaſtrian line to the peaceable poſſeſſion of the throne, Henry the ſeventh reſumed the work very early, as appears by the key-ſtones of the vaulting of the very firſt bay of building that is extended beyond the old plan, being marked with the roſe of Lancaſter.

About the year 1502, this prince began that ſtately and magnificent ſtructure which is now generally called by his name, by firſt pulling down the chapel of Henry III. already-mentioned, and a houſe adjoining, called the White-roſe tavern; and then, marking out the foundation, on the 24th of January, 1507, he laid the firſt ſtone; ſtone: this chapel he dedicated, like the former, to the bleſſed Virgin, and deſigning it for a burial-place for him and his poſterity, in his will he expreſsly enjoins, that none but the blood royal ſhould be permitted to lie therein; and, for the health of his ſoul, he procured a bull from pope Leo, for uniting to this abbey the collegiate church of St. Martin's-le-Grand, and the manor of Tykill in Yorkſhire, to maintain a chauntry of three monks, who ſhould be prieſts, and two lay brothers; which we the rather mention, as it is but little known how the inhabitants of St. Martin's-le-Grand came firſt to be connected with thoſe of Weſtminſter. The prieſts were to ſay daily maſs for his ſoul, and the ſouls of his wife and children, for which ſervice, beſides their uſual ſalary, they were to be allowed 100 ſhillings a year. Before his death, over and above this, he is ſaid to have delivered into the hands of the Abbot of Weſtminſter 5000l. for maſſes and alms, whereof 10,000 maſſes were to be ſaid for him at 6d. each; and between his death and burial, 200l. to be given in alms.

No very material alterations have been made in the outward ſtructure of this church, ſince Henry's death till of late years; when, as it was the admiration and grief of all who beheld it, it became the object of parliamentary concern, to reſcue it from that ruin into which it was falling apace, by a thorough reparation at the national expence; and though the ravage that was made within it by Henry VIII. and the havock without and within it, during the unhappy civil commomotions that defaced the ancient beauty of all religious houſes in this kingdom, can never be recovered; yet it has lately, by the labour and ſkill of Sir Chriſtopher Wren, and thoſe that ſucceeded him, been decorated with ſome new ornaments, and by the addition of two ſtately towers, which are thought to exceed in point of workmanſhip any part of the ancient building, is now rendered more compleat than ever.

When the old abbey was examined in order to its being repaired, Sir Chriſtopher Wren found great defects both in the materials and in the workmanſhip. The ſtone, which was of the Ryegate kind, very eaſy to work, but ſubject to take in water, was decayed four inches deep; the roof was oak, mixed with Normandy cheſnut, badly wrought, and not properly ſecured from ſtretching, by which the walls were damaged, and ſtill rendered worſe by the water in the gutters being ill carried off. The four inner pillars of the croſs he found to be ſwayed inward conſiderably, the arches of the ſecond order cracked, the great weſt window feeble, and the gable end of the roof over it only weather boards painted. But what was worſt of all, a bold and ignorant architect having formerly undertaken to build the Monks a cloiſter, without knowing the principles upon which he ought to have proceeded, had joined the new work to the old in ſuch a manner, that, by the ſettling of the former, the wall above the windows of the latter was forced out ten inches, and the ribbs broken, ſo that it was amazing it had not quite fallen. This, however, Sir Chriſtopher cauſed to be amended inſtantly, and made ſtronger and more ſecure than ever the firſt builders had left it; the ragged Aſhlar he likewiſe cut away, and inveſted the building, ſo far as he lived to finiſh it, with a better ſort of ſtone from Burford in Oxfordſhire, which has ſince been continued by his ſucceſſors, and now near finiſhed; the timber of the roof of the nave, and of the croſs, was likewiſe ſubſtantially repaired under his direction. The four innermoſt pillars he reſtored to their perpendicular, and left a plan for erecting a tower and a ſpire that would ſerve rather to have ſtrengthened than to have over-loaded them. In Short, this great architect prepared and left behind him perfect draughts and models of all the additional ornaments that he thought neceſſary to complete this ſtately building; ſome of which, particularly the two lofty towers to the weſt, have been ſince erected in a maſterly manner; but the lofty ſpire, which he ſeems to have had moſt at heart, has been either thought not practicable or not neceſſary.

Having thus given an account of the foundation and gradual increaſe of this ancient ſtructure, we ſhall now proceed to a more particular deſcription of it, as well as of what curioſities are ſtill remaining.

A particular DESCRIPTION of the BUILDING.

THere is not perhaps a more venerable fragment of antiquity in the whole world than this noble fabric, which has lately been new coated as already hinted, on the outſide, except that part of it called Henry VIIth's chapel, which is indeed a ſeparate building, and will no doubt be repaired by a particular order, when the reparations of the ancient abbey are compleated. It muſt be owned, that by the two ſtately towers at the weſt end, lately added, and the great pains that have been taken in the coating, to preſerve the ancient Gothic grandeur, this church, as to its diſtant proſpect, has all the majeſty of its former ſtate; yet the beautiful carving and curious ſculpture that once adorned it, and upon a nearer view uſed to charm the beholder, is now irretrieveably loſt; the buttreſſes, once beautifully capped with Turrets, made into plain pyramidical forms, and topped with free-ſtone; and the ſtatues of our ancient kinds that formerly ſtood in nitches near the tops of theſe buttreſſes and attracked admiration, are for the moſt part removed, and their broken fragments lodged in the roof of Henry VIIth's chapel, where they are buried from the public eye for ever. Next the towers on the north ſide, ſome of theſe ſtatues are ſtill ſtanding; and indeed it is on this ſide that you are to take your outward view of the abbey, the other ſide being ſo encumbered with buildings, that even the exact ſituation cannot be diſtinguiſhed. The form of the church is that of a crucifix, in which you are to conſider Henry VIIth's chapel as no part. The ſouth-ſide anſwered exactly to the north in the original plan, by attending to which you will be able to form a true judgment of the whole. The cloiſters on the ſouth-ſide were added for the conveniency of the monks, and the contiguous buildings were erected a conſiderable time after.

In viewing the outſide of this building your attention tention will be principally engaged by the magnificent portico, leading into the north-croſs, which by ſome has been ſtiled the beautiful or Solomon's gate. It ſeems to have been founded by Richard II. his arms carved in ſtone being formerly over the door. This portico is of the gothic order, and is extremely beautiful; and over it is a moſt magnificent window of modern deſign, * but admirably well executed. On the ſouth-ſide may be ſeen a window ſet up in 1705, which is likewiſe very maſterly. Beſides theſe there is nothing in the outward appearance to dwell upon except the loftineſs of the roof, to exceed in which particular ſeems to have been the emulation of ancient architects; that of Weſtminſter-hall is indeed very high, but that of the abbey is a great deal more lofty.

In order to take the moſt advantageous view of the inſide, you muſt go in at the weſt door, between the towers; and the moment you enter, the whole body of the church opens itſelf at once to your eye, the pillars dividing the nave from the ſide iſles, being ſo curiouſly formed as not to obſtruct the ſide openings; nor is your ſight terminated to the eaſt, but by the fine painted window over the portico of Henry VIIth's chapel, which antiently (when the altar was low, and the glorioufly adorned ſhrine of Edward the confeſſor was included in the proſpect,) muſt have afforded one of the grandeſt ſights that ever was beheld.

The imagination is forcibly ſtruck by the awful ſolemnity of the place, cauſed by the loftineſs of the roof, and the happy diſpoſition of the lights, and of that noble range of pillars which ſupports the whole building.

It may not be improper to obſerve, that the open ſpace between the rows of pillars is called the nave of the church; the incloſed ſpace, the choir; the ſpace between the pillars and the walls, the iſles; and the enlarged ſpaces to the north and ſouth, the north croſs and ſouth croſs.

Theſe pillars terminate toward the eaſt by a ſweep, thereby encloſing the chapel of Edward the confeſſor in a kind of ſemi-circle, and excluding all the other chapels belonging to the abbey, of which there are no leſs than ten in number, beyond the avenue or walk, by which they are ſurrounded. And it is worth your obſervation, that as far as to the gates of the choir the pillars are filleted with braſs, but all beyond with free ſtone; from which circumſtance ſome take occaſion to determine the bounds of the different enlargements of this church at different times, but we think, with much uncertainty. Anſwerable to the middle range of pillars are columns adjoining to the walls, which as they riſe ſpring into ſemi-arches, and are every where met in acute angles by their oppoſites, thereby throwing the roof into a variety of intaglio's, as the term is, which are no other than little ornamental carvings at the cloſings and croſſings of the lines. On the arches of the pillars are galleries of double columns, 15 feet wide, covering the ſide-iſles, and enlightened by a middle range of windows, over which there is an upper range of larger windows; by theſe and the under range, together with the four capital windows, facing the N. S. E. and W. the whole fabric is ſo admirably enlightened, that in the day-time you are never dazzled with a glare, nor incommoded with darkneſs, in the walls between the columns were ſhallow niches, arched about eight or ten feet high, on which the arms of the original benefactors were depicted, and over them in ſaxon characters, their titles, &c. but theſe by the monuments of the dead, being placed before them, are almoſt all hid from the ſight.

The next objects truly worth obſervance, are the fine paintings in the great weſt window of Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob; Moſes and Aaron, and the twelve patriarchs; the arms of his late majeſty, king Sebert, and queen Elizabeth; king Edward the confeſſor; and and the late worthy dean, doctor Wilcox, biſhop of Rocheſter; this window was ſet up in the year 1733, and is very curious; to the left of which, in a leſſer window, is a painting of one of our kings (ſuppoſed of Richard II.) but the colours being of a water blue, no particular face can be diſtinguiſhed. In the window, on the other ſide the great window, you will ſee a lively repreſentation of Edward the confeſſor in his robes, and under his feet his arms painted. Theſe are the moſt perfect of many remains of this ancient art, to be ſeen in the different windows of the abbey.

After ſurveying the open parts of this church, the next thing to be viewed is the choir, which you can only ſee during the times of divine ſervice; the grand entrance into which is by a pair of iron gates finely wrought. The floor is paved with the fineſt black and white marble: the ancient ſtalls are covered with gothic acute arches, ſupported by ſmall pillars of iron, and painted purple; but what you ſhould particularly remark, is an ancient painting near the pulpit, of that moſt beautiful prince Richard II. ſitting in a chair of gold, and dreſſed in a veſt of green flowered with gold, having on ſhoes of gold powdered with pearls. This piece is in length ſix feet eleven inches, and, in breadth three feet ſeven inches; the lower part much defaced. The next thing to be remarked, is the fine altar encloſed with a curious balluſtre, within which is a pavement of Moſaic work, made at the charge of abbot Ware, and ſaid to be the moſt beautiful in its kind of any in the world. By ſome latin verſes it appears, that the ſtones whereof it is compoſed are of porphyry, and that it was laid in the year 1272, near 500 years ago. The altar, which had formerly ſtood in a chapel at Whitehall, is a ſtately and beautiful piece of marble, and was removed from the ſtores at Hampton-court in the year 1707, by order of her late majeſty queen Anne, who preſented it to this church. On each ſide the altar are marble doors opening into St. Edward's chapel, where at their coronation, our kings retire to refreſh themſelves.

Among the different aſcents to the roof of this church, there is one at the weſt corner of the north croſs, another at the eaſt corner of the ſouth croſs; and over the ſouth weſt tower are ſmall chambers ſaid to have been formerly the habitation of Bradſhaw, preſident of the rebels bloody court, where he ended his days before the reſtoration in deep melancholy and grief.

Deſcription of HENRY VIIth's Chapel.

HAVING ſaid every thing neceſſary with reſpect to the architecture of this ancient abbey, it remains ſtill to ſay ſomething of that famous building called Henry VIIth's chapel, which, as we have already hinted, is undoubtedly of much later date than the fabric we have been deſcribing. This wonder of the world, as it may well be ſtiled, is adorned without with ſixteen gothic towers, all beautifully ornamented with admirable ingenuity, and jutting from the building in different angles. It is ſituated to the eaſt of the abbey, to which it is ſo neatly joined, that at a ſuperficial view it appears to be one and the ſame building, It is enlightened by a double range of windows, that throw the light into ſuch a happy diſpoſition, as at once to pleaſe the eye and inſpire reverence, In the towers are niches, in which ſtood a number of ſtatues, that for expreſſion were hardly to be equalled; but theſe were removed by order of the rump parliament, leſt they ſhould tumble upon the heads of ſome of its members. Theſe towers are joined to the roof, by arches of the gothic order.

From the eaſt end of the abbey you aſcend to the inſide, by ſteps of black marble under a ſtately portico, which leads to the gates opening to the body or nave of the chapel, before you enter which you may obſerve a door on each hand, opening into the ſide iſles, for it is compoſed of a nave and ſide iſles, every way anſwering the plan of a cathedral. The gates by which you enter the nave are well worth your obſervation: they are of braſs moſt curiouſly wrought in the manner of frame work, having in every other open pannel a roſe and portcullis alternately. Being entered, your eye will naturally be directed to the loſty ceiling, which is wrought with ſuch aſtoniſhing variety of figures as no deſcription can reach; the ſtalls are of brown wainſcot with gothic canopies, moſt beautifully carved, as are the ſeats with ſtrange devices; more particularly the carving under the ſeats, are monſtrous repreſentations of beaſtly actions, but ſo ſtrongly expreſſed by the artificer, that nothing on wood is now remaining equal to it: the pavement is of black and white marble, done at the charge of Dr. Killigrew, once prebendary of this abbey, as appears by two inſcriptions, one on a plate of braſs infixed in the riſe towards the founder's tomb; the other cut in the pavement. The eaſt view from the entrance preſents you with the braſs chapel and tomb of the founder, and round it, where the eaſt end forms a ſemi-circle, are the chapels of the duke of Buckingham and Richmond, and the open ſpaces and windows, where is the tomb of Sheffield, duke of Buckingham, and the effigy of the counteſs of Richmond. The ſide-iſles open to the nave at the eaſt end on each ſide of the founder's tomb; and at the eaſt end of the ſouth iſle is the royal vault; and of the other, the monuments of the princes murdered; the walls, as well of the nave as of the ſouth iſles, are wrought into the moſt curious imagery imaginable, and contains 120 large ſtatues of patriarchs, ſaints, martyrs, and confeſſors, placed in niches, under which are angels ſupporting imperial crowns, beſides innumerable ſmall ones, all of them eſteemed ſo curious, that the beſt maſters have travelled from abroad to copy them. The windows which are thirteen on each ſide above, and as many below, in the north and ſouth iſles, beſides the ſpacious eaſt window, jut out into the gothic towers, and were formerly of painted or diapered glaſs, having in every pane a white roſe, the badge of Lancaſter, or an H the initial letter of the founder's name, and portculliſſes, the badge of the Beaufort's crowned, of which there are ſome now remaining. The roof is flattiſh, and is ſupported on arches between the nave and the ſide iſles, which turn upon twelve ſtately gothic pillars curiouſly adorned with figures, fruitage, and foliage. The length of this chapel within is 99 feet, the breadth 66, and the height 54.

We ſhall now proceed to ſuch curioſities in Weſtminſter-abbey, as deſerve the reader's notice.

Deſcriptive account of the TOMBS and other MONUMENTS in the ſeveral CHAPELS.

IT has been already obſerved, that there are ten encloſed chapels belonging to Weſtminſter-abby, including Henry VIIth's, juſt now deſcribed; but as it would be a tedious work to enter minutely into a deſcription of each, we ſhall rather chuſe to go hand in hand with your guides, in giving you an account of their contents.

The following are the names of the ſeveral chapels beginning from the ſouth croſs, and ſo paſſing round to the north croſs: 1. St. Benedict; 2. St. Edmund; 3. St. Nicholas; 4. Henry VII. 5. St. Paul; 6. St. John the Baptiſt; 7. Iſlip's Chapel; 8. St. John the Evangeliſt; 9. St. Michael; and 10. St. Andrew: beſides which, the chapel of Edward the Confeſſor, which, as has been ſaid, is incloſed in the body of the church, ſtands in the center.

Account of the TOMBS in the Chapel of St. BENEDICT.

THERE is in St. Benedict's chapel, an ancient tomb of free-ſtone, railed with iron on the ſide next the area, having formerly a canopy of wood, now quite demoliſhed and broken away; on which lies the image of archbiſhop Langham, who was firſt a monk, afterwards a prior, then an abbot of Weſtminſter, and laſtly archbiſhop of Canterbury. There is a Latin epitaph round his tomb, ſetting forth, "That he "was monk, prior, and abbot of this abbey; "afterwards elected biſhop of London; but Ely "being then alſo vacant, he made choice of that "ſee; that he was primate and chancellor of "England; prieſt-cardinal, afterwards biſhop-"cardinal of Preneſte; and nuncio from the "pope; and that he died on the feaſt of St. "Mary Magdalene, in the year 1376, on whoſe "ſoul God have mercy, and grant him the joys " of heaven for the merits of Chriſt." He was made cardinal by pope Urban V. with the title of St. Sextus, but was deprived of his archbiſhoprick by king Edward the third, for being promoted without his conſent: in 1369 he was made biſhop cardinal of Preneſty, by pope Gregory XI. and had the profits aſſigned him of the archdeaconries of Taunton and Wells; founded a houſe of Carthuſians at Avignon in Province, at which place he was firſt interred, and afterwards removed to the chapel of St. Benedict.

The next object worthy of attention is a moſt elegant monument of black and white marble, on which are two images in a cumbent poſture, repreſenting an ancient nobleman in his robes, with his lady. This monument was erected in memory of Lyonel Cranfield, earl of Middleſex, by his relict lady Anne: a tranſlation of the latin inſcription on this monument is as follows:

" Sacred to the memory of Lyonel lord Cran-
" field, earl of Middleſex, who by that diſcern-
" ing prince king James I. being called to court,
" was for his excellent parts bountifully rewarded
" both with honours and fortune; being made
" maſter of the requeſts, and of the wardrobe,
" preſident of the court of wards and privy
" counſellor. The new and illuſtrious, as well as " difficult province of lord treaſurer of Eng" land, he fill'd; which ſervices, (how indefa-
" tigably he underwent) his titles of knight,
" baron Cranfield, and laſtly earl of Middleſex,
" with various other honours, abundantly teſtifiy.
" From hence envy ſwelling, its utmoſt efforts
" were exerted to raiſe ſtorms againſt him. Whilſt
" he boldly ſtanding on his guard, encouraged
" by the conſciouſneſs of his innocence, was
" ſhamefully toſſed about; but happily eſcaping
" ſhipwreck, in a compoſed winter of life, caſt
" anchor and finiſhed his courſe in a retired lei-
" ſure. Here lying concealed, being wearied
" out firſt, and waſted afterwards, this pilot was
" rouſed up to undertake a ſafer voyage, and " made the port of Heaven. He died the 6th
" of Auguſt, 1645, aged about ſeventy, he was " twice married; by his firſt wife he had three " daughters, Elizabeth late counteſs of Mul-
" grave; Martha, counteſs of Monmouth; and
" Mary, who died unmarried. By the the ſe-
" cond, who ſurvived him, he had three ſons and " two daughters, James, heir to the honour of " earl Middleſex; Lyonel and Edward; Frances,
" lady Buckhurſt; and Suſannah, who died an
" infant."

There is another tomb near biſhop Langham's, about eighteen inches from the ground, on which is engraved on a braſs plate the figure of an old man in a doctor's habit, deſigned for doctor William Bill, dean of Weſtminſter, maſter of Eaton college, head of Trinity in Cambridge, and chief almoner to queen Elizabeth, as appears by his inſcription. He died July 5, 1561. On a braſs plate are ſome latin verſes, ſetting forth, " that he was a good and learned man, and a " friend to thoſe that were ſo; that he was juſt " and charitable; and that the poor, as well as " the three colleges over which he preſided, " ſuſtained an irreparable loſs by his death."

There is a very fine monument on the eaſt (on the ſpot where St. Benedict's altar ſtood) compoſed of various kinds of marble, to the memory of lady Frances, counteſs of Hertford, who is here repreſented in her robes in a cumbent poſture, with her head reſting on an embroidered cuſhion, and her feet on a lion's back. The ſculpture of this monument is extremely curious, and well worth attention. It ſeems to repreſent a ſtately temple, where the enſigns and devices of the noble families of Somerſet and Effingham, appear to be the chief ornaments. The Latin inſcriptions ſet forth, " that ſhe was wife to the " noble earl of Hertford, ſon to the renowned " prince Edward, duke of Somerſet, earl of " Hertford, viſcount Beauchamp, and baron Sey-" mour: that ſhe was daughter to the noble lord " William, baron Howard, of Effingham, knight " of the garter, high admiral to queen Mary, " and lord chamberlain and privy ſeal to queen " Elizabeth, &c. That for her many graces " both of mind and body, ſhe was highly fa-" voured by her gracious ſovereign, and dearly " loved by her noble lord; who, in teſtimony of " his inviolable affection, conſecrated to her me-" mory this monument. She died in the forty-" fourth year of her age, May 14, 1598."

A monument is affixed to the wall, on the ſouth ſide of this chapel, to the memory of Dr. Gabriel Goodman, who is repreſented in his proper habit, and kneeling. The Latin inſcription intimates, " that he was the fifth dean of this " church, over which he preſided for forty " years with much applauſe; that he founded " an hoſpital, and inſtituted a ſchool, at Ruthin, " in Denbighſhire, where he was born; that he " was a man of a regular and devout life; and " that he died in 1601, aged 73." This Dr. Goodman was the firſt who raiſed the learned Cambden from obſcurity, by defraying the expences of ſeveral of his journies in ſearch of antiquities, and making him ſecond maſter of Weſtminſter ſchool.

There is alſo, on the ſame ſide, and under the adjoining arch, a neat table monument of white marble, to the memory of George Sprat, ſecond ſon of Dr. Thomas Sprat, biſhop of Rocheſter, and dean of Weſtminſter, by his wife Helena, deſcended from the ancient and honourable family of the Wolſleys in Staffordſhire, who lies interred in the chapel of St. Nicholas. He died in the year 1608, being an infant only one year old.

In this chapel, Catherine, daughter to Dr. Dolben, biſhop of Rocheſter, dean of Weſtminſter, and afterwards archbiſhop of York, lies interred; as does alſo a counteſs of Kildare in Ireland; and Dr. John Spotſwood, lord archbiſhop of St. Andrews, primate and lord chancellor of Scotland, who departed this life in the year 1640.

A monument is affixed in the wall, between this chapel and the next, of Moſaic work, the ſides in plain pannels, but the top of the table wrought in figures, ſaid to be done with the ſame kind of ſtones as the floor before the altar, and erected for the children of Henry I. and Edward I. Over this tomb is ſomething which ſeems to have been a piece of church perſpective, but now almoſt defaced. This certainly was once a rich and coſtly monument; for in the records of the Tower, there is the king's order for erecting ſuch a one in this place, and for allowing maſter Simon de Wells five marks and a half, to defray his expences in bringing from the city a handſome braſs image to ſet upon his daughter Catharine's tomb; and for paying to Simon de Glouceſter, the king's goldſmith, for a ſilver image for the like purpoſe, the ſum of ſeventy marks.

Of the TOMBS, &c. in the CHAPEL of St. EDMUND.

THE next curioſity that follows in order is the chapel of St. Edmund, at the entrance of which, on your left hand, is a monument ſacred to the memory of John of Eltham, ſecond ſon of king Edward II. and ſo called from Eltham in Kent, the place of his nativity, where our Engliſh kings had once a palace. His ſtatue is of white alabaſtar, the head encircled in a coronet of greater and leſſer leaves, remarkable for its being the firſt of the kind; his habit is that of an armed knight. He died in Scotland at the age of nineteen, unmarried; though three different matches had been propoſed to him; the laſt of which, to Mary daughter of Ferdinand king of Spain, he accepted; but lived not to conſummate it. His funeral was ſo magnificent and coſtly, that the prior and convent demanded 100l. (a vaſt ſum then) for horſe and armour preſent there on the day of his burial. This monument is by ſome authors ſaid to belong to H. Holland, duke of Exeter, who in the reign of Edward IV. loſt his life at ſea.

There is at the feet of this a handſome monument of white marble, with the following inſcription.

In this chapel lies interred all that was mortal of the moſt illuſtrious and moſt benevolent John Paul Howard, earl of Stafford, who in 1738 married Elizabeth, daughter of A. Ewens of the county of Somerſet, eſquire, by Elizabeth his wife, eldeſt daughter of John St. Albin, of Alfoxton, in the ſame county, eſquire.

His heart was as truly great and noble
As his high deſcent:
Faithful to his God,
A lover of his country,
A relation to relations,
A deteſter of detraction,
A friend to mankind:
Naturally generous and compaſſionate:
His liberality and his charity to the poor were without bounds.
We therefore piouſly hope that at the laſt day,
His body will be received in glory
Into the everlaſting tabernacles.
Being ſnatched away ſuddenly by death,
Which he had long meditated and expected with conſtancy,
He went to a better life the firſt of April, 1762;
Having lived ſixty-one years, nine months, and ſix days.
The counteſs dowager, in teſtimony of her great Affection and reſpect to her lord's memory,
Has cauſed this monument to be placed here.

The figures of the ancient badges of honour belonging to the Stafford family, who deſcend by ten different marriages from the royal blood of England and France, are placed round this inſcription.

Invented and ſtained by Robert Chambers.

The next is a ſmall table monument, on which lie the figures of William of Windſor, ſixth ſon of Edward III. who died in his infancy; and of Blanch of the Tower, ſiſter to William, who likewiſe died young, having obtained their ſurnames from the places of their nativity. What is remarkable, they are dreſſed in the habits of their time, the boy in a ſhort doublet, of the indecency whereof Chaucer's parſon complains; the girl in a horned head-dreſs, which Stow ſays was frightful.

Againſt the eaſt wall between the monuments of lady Frances, dutcheſs of Suffolk, and John of Eltham, earl of Cornwall, is a monument erected to the memory of Nicholas Monck, provoſt of Eton, biſhop of Hereford, and brother to George Monck duke of Albemarle, &c. he died December, the 11th, 1661, aged fifty. In the year 1723, his grandſon Chriſtopher Rawlinſon, eſquire; of Cark in Lancaſhire, cauſed this to be erected.

The effigy of lady Frances dutcheſs of Suffolk, in her proper robes, lies on an adjoining tomb raiſed from the floor, ſhe was daughter of the famous Charles Brandon, by Mary the French queen, daughter to Henry VII. and became herſelf dutcheſs of Suffolk, by marrying Henry Grey, then marquis of Dorſet, but upon her father's deceaſe created duke of Suffolk, and afterwards beheaded for being concerned in Wyat's attempt for dethroning the bloody queen Mary: by the duke ſhe had two daughters, lady Jane and Catharine; lady Jane was married to lord Guildford Dudley, ſon to the duke of Northumberland, and afterwards proclaimed queen, but not being properly ſupported, fell a ſacrifice to the reſentment of her ſucceſſors, who cut off the heads of her huſband and father-in-law, as well as that of her father; lady Catharine was more fortunate, and married firſt lord Herbert, ſon to the earl of Pembroke, and afterwards Edward, earl of Hertford.—Being now deprived of a huſband and daughter, the dutcheſs herſelf fell under the diſpleaſure of the court on account of her religion, and was charged with dreſſing a cat in a rochet in ridicule of the epiſcopal dignity; this charge was vigorouſly proſecuted againſt her by the ſecret direction of Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter; who being under confinement in the Tower in the preceding reign, and ſeeing the dutcheſs paſs under his window, made her a very courteous reverence: but her grace, inſtead of returning the compliment, told him with an air of contempt, "it was well "for the lambs, now the wolves were ſhut up;" which ſlight he never forgave: ſo that, not being able to foreſee the conſequences, ſhe judged it moſt prudent privately to retire into the country, where ſhe ſoon after married one Adrian Stock, eſq; and with him lived unknown and unnoticed, till the acceſſion of queen Elizabeth to the crown, when when ſhe again appeared at court, and became a great favourite, inſomuch, that the queen, in regard ſhe was lineally deſcended from Henry VII. diſtinguiſhed her with an augmentation of the arms of England, viz. a Border Gaubony, Gold and Azure; which at her funeral was placed with her anceſtors arms in banners, banner rolls, lozenges, and ſcutcheons; and quartered on the monument we are now deſcribing. The time of her death is no where to be found, but it is certain ſhe died before her ſecond huſband:——In Fox's Martyrology the ſufferings of this great lady, for the reformed religion, are fully related; and, if we may credit what is there ſet down, ſhe was once reduced to ſuch miſery, as after wandering up and down till ſhe was faint, to be obliged to lie a long winter's night in a churchyard. On her tomb are two inſcriptions; the firſt in latin verſe, deſcribing her virtues and accompliſhments, the ſecond in Engliſh, which is little more than an account of her ſeveral marriages.

The next monument to this is a very grand one of white marble, repreſenting a youth in Grecian armour, ſitting on a greek altar; and erected, as the latin inſcription ſets forth, to the memory of Francis Hollis, by John, earl of Clare, his afflicted father. This brave youth, after returning home from making a campaign in Flanders, died Auguſt 12th, 1622, in his nineteenth year. The following is his epitaph.

What ſo thou haſt of nature or of arts,
Youth, beauty, ſtrength, or what excelling parts
Of Mind and Body, letters, arms and worth,
His eighteen years, beyond his years, brought forth;
Then ſtand and read thyſelf within this glaſs,
How ſoon theſe periſh, and thyſelf may paſs;
Man's life is meaſured by the work not days,
No aged ſloth, but active youth hath praiſe.

You are next preſented with a white alabaſtar of lady Elizabeth Ruſſel, in a ſleeping poſture. This lady was daughter to lord Ruſſel; and is ſaid to have died with a prick of her finger, which circumſtance is apt to raiſe pity in the minds of the ſpectators; but this ſtory has no other foundation, than the miſapprehenſion of the ſtatuary's deſign; for having repreſented her as aſleep, and pointing with her finger to a death's head under her right foot, it has been ſuppoſed that her finger bled, and that the bleeding had cloſed her eyes in death; whereas the deſign of the artiſt ſeems rather to allude to the compoſed ſituation of her mind at the approach of death, which ſhe conſidered only as a profound ſleep, from which ſhe was again to wake in a joyful reſurrection; of which the motto under her feet is a clear illuſtration; Dormit, non mortua eſt; "ſhe is not dead, "but ſleepeth." The latin inſcription on the ſcroll beneath, only tells that her afflicted ſiſter Ann erected this monument to her memory. The device is an eagle, the emblem of eternity, ſtanding on a florilege of roſes, &c.

There is another moſt magnificent monument within the rails which encloſe this laſt; it is compoſed of marble and alabaſter of various colours, painted and gilt; and erected to the memory of John lord Ruſſel, (ſon and heir to Francis earl of Bedford) and his ſon Francis by Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Anthony Cook, knight and widow of Sir Thomas Hoby, knight. He is repreſented in a cumbent poſture, habited in his coronation robes, with his infant ſon at his feet. His lady was eſteemed the Sappho of her age, being well verſed in the learned languages, and an excellent poet; five of the epitaphs on this tomb are of her compoſition, of which three are in latin, one in greek, and the other in Engliſh, which is here tranſcribed as a ſpecimen, the purport of the others being the ſame.

Right noble twice, by virtue and by birth,
Of Heaven lov'd, and honour'd on the Earth;
His country's hope, his kindred's chief delight,
My huſband dear, more than this world's light,
Death hath me reft. But I from death will take His memory, to whom this tomb I make.
John was his name (ah was!) wretch muſt I ſay;
Lord Ruſſel once, now my tear-thirſty clay.

Near this monument there are two others, affixed to the wall, one to the memory of lady Seymour, daughter to Edward duke of Somerſet, who died March the 19th, 1560, aged nineteen; the other to the right honourable the lady Catharine Knollys, chief lady of the queen's bed-chamber, and wife to Sir Francis Knollys, knight, treaſurer of her highneſs's houſhold. She died January the 15th, 1568. This lady Knollys and lord Hunſdon, her brother, were the only children of William Carey, eſq; by lady Mary his wife, one of the daughters and heirs of Thomas Boleyn, earl of Wiltſhire and Ormond, and ſiſter to Anne Boleyn, queen of England, wife to Henry VIII. father and mother to queen Elizabeth. What is farther remarkable, the only daughter of lady Knollys, was the favourite earl of Eſſex's mother.

There is a very ancient monument juſt under the window fronting the entrance, which repreſents a gothic chapel, and in it the figure of a knight in armour, in a cumbent poſture, with his feet reſting on a lion's back. This was erected for Sir Bernard Brocas, of Baurepaire in the county of Hants (Gutherie calls him Brokehouſe) chamberlain to Anne, queen to Richard II. But this princeſs dying, and Richard falling under the diſpleaſure of his people, who depoſed him, Sir Bernard ſtill adhered to his royal maſter in his misfortunes, which coſt him his life; for being concerned with many others in an unſucceſsful attempt to reſtore him to the crown, he ſhared the common fate of almoſt all the leaders in that conſpiracy, and was in the month of January, 1399, publickly beheaded on Tower-hill.

On the weſt ſide, adjoining to this, is the monument of Sir Richard Peckſall, knight, maſter of the Buck-hounds to queen Elizabeth; firſt married to Alianer, the daughter of William Paulet, marquis of Wincheſter, by whom he had four daughters; and afterwards to Alianer, daughter to John Cotgrave, who erected this monument to his memory, as appears by the inſcription: on the baſis of the pillars are the following verſes tranſlated from the latin.

Death can't disjoin, whom Chriſt has join'd in love,
Love leads to death, and death to life above.
In heaven's a happier place, frail things deſpiſe,
Live well, to gain in future life the prize.

At a ſmall diſtance from this is an ancient monument of grey marble, on which, in plated braſs, is the figure of a knight in armour; his head reclined upon his helmet, and one of his feet placed upon a leopard, the other on an eagle. By the Latin inſcription this knight was Humphry Bourchier, ſon and heir to John Bourchier, lord Barners; who, eſpouſing the cauſe of Edward IV. againſt the earl of Warwick, was ſlain in the battle of Barnet-field, on Eaſter-day, in the year 1471.

On the entrance to this chapel, on the right hand is the ancient monument of William de Valence, lying in a cumbent poſture on a cheſt of wainſcot placed upon a tomb of grey marble; the figure is wood, covered originally with copper gilt, as was the cheſt in which it lies, but the greateſt part has been filched away; and of 30 ſmall images that were placed in little braſs niches round it, ſcarce one remains entire. This William de Valence was earl of Pembroke, and ſon to the earl of March, by Iſabel, widow to king John; and being half brother to Henry III. was made prime miniſter to that prince, which brought upon him the odium of the barons. Being unable to maintain his poſt, he was at length, in 1237, forced to fly, leaving his lands in mortgage to one Aaron, a Jew, at York, for ninety marks in gold; which ſeems to have been a conſiderable ſum, by the account given of the ſplendor of his equipage at his departure. About two years after, having ſquandered his money abroad, the king intereſted himſelf in his favour; and having ſollicited his return, beſtowed upon him the government of Hertford-caſtle, of which he made a wanton uſe; for, being a foreigner, and for that reaſon hated by the Engliſh, he ſlipt no opportunity to mortify them; Matthew Paris gives one inſtance among many of his inſolent behaviour to the biſhop of Ely, whoſe Park at Hatfield lying contiguous to his government, Valence forcibly entered it without the biſhop's leave, and having hunted till he was tired, broke open the biſhop's houſe, pantries and cellars, and feaſting himſelf and followers till they were gorged and drunk, committed the moſt tumultuous outrages, pulling out the taps of the caſks that were empty, and broaching thoſe that were full, ſuffering what they left to run about the cellars, and beating the ſervants unmercifully that oppoſed their riot. This done, they went off laughing at their miſchief. In the year 1258, he was again baniſhed, together with many other foreigners, who had made themſelves obnoxious to the Engliſh barons; however, in 1264, we find him once more in England, at the battle of Eveſham, where the king was taken priſoner by the barons, and he, with four hundred cuiraſſiers, fled to the caſtle of Pevenſy, till they found means to tranſport themſelves into France, where, in 1296, he was ſlain treacherouſly at Bayonne. His body was afterwards brought to England, and honourably buried in this chapel, and many devout perſons expreſſing a deſire to offer up their prayers for the welfare of his ſoul, one hundred days were granted them for that purpoſe.

Not far from the tomb of Valence, is a moſt magnificent monument, partly encloſed, to the memory of Edward Talbot, eighth earl of Shrewſbury, who died February the 8th, 1617, aged fifty-ſeven, and his lady Jane, eldeſt daughter and coheireſs of Cuthbert baron Ogle, whoſe effigies in their robes lie on a black marble table, ſupported by a pedeſtal of alabaſter. This monument is finely ornamented, and the carving on the various coloured marble is exquiſite. The inſcription contains nothing more than his titles and character, which is indeed very high: he was honourable without pride: potent without oſtentation: religious without ſuperſtition: liberal both in mind and bounty: warded ever againſt fortune, his whole life was a path of juſtice; and his innocence eſcaping envy; continued through the whole courſe of his life.

There is a tomb two feet high on the floor of this chapel, on which is a lady in a widow's dreſs with a barb and veil cut in braſs, round which is an inſcription in old French, importing that Alianer de Bohun, daughter and heireſs of Sir Humphry de Bohun, earl of Hertford, Eſſex, and Northampton, and wife to the mighty and noble prince of Woodſtock, duke of Glouceſter, earl of Eſſex and Buckingham, ſon to Henry III. lies interred here.—This lady, who was the greateſt heireſs in England, was deprived of her huſband by the cruelty of his nephew, Richard II. who, jealous of his popularity, moſt treacherouſly betrayed him by a ſhew of friendſhip; for coming to viſit him at Plaſby, a pleaſant ſeat of his in Eſſex, and ſtaying ſupper, in duty he thought to attend his majeſty to town; but at Stratford was ſuddenly ſurrounded by an ambuſh of armed men, who privately hurried him on board a ſhip, and carried him to Calais, where, by the king's order; he was ſtifled between feather-beds. After this melancholy accident his lady ſpent the reſt of her days in the nunnery at Barking, and died October 3, 1399; from whence her remains were brought, and here interred. In the year 1397, the duke her huſband was murdered.

Near the above is, a white marble table monument of Mary counteſs of Stafford: who died in January 1693, and who was wife to the unfortunate viſcount Stafford, beheaded in the reign of king Charles II. on Tower-hill. She was lineally deſcended from the noble perſonages juſt mentioned, and from the barons and earls of Stafford, and was daughter and heireſs to the noble houſe of Buckingham.

Above the duke of Suffolk's monument againſt the wall is one erected to the memory of Mary counteſs of Stafford, and of Henry earl of Stafford her ſon, who died abroad in 1719, and was buried here.

There are ſeveral perſons interred in this chapel of leſs note than thoſe already mentioned; particularly Henry Ferne, D. D. biſhop of Cheſter, who, dying March 16, 1662, enjoyed his biſhopric but five weeks.

An archbiſhop is alſo buried here, as appears by by a very antique figure in a maſs habit, engraven on a braſs plate, and placed on a flat ſtone in the pavement, over the remains of Robert de Walby; who, as appears by the inſcription, was firſt an Auguſtin monk, and attended Edward the black prince into France, where, being young, he proſecuted his ſtudies, and made a ſurprizing progreſs in natural and moral philoſophy, phyſic, the languages, and in the canon law; and being likewiſe an eloquent preacher and ſound divine, was made divinity profeſſor in the univerſity of Thouloufe; where he continued till called by Richard II. to the biſhopric of Man, from whence he was removed to the archbiſhopric of Dublin; but not liking that ſituation, he was advanced to the ſee of Chicheſter, and afterwards to the archbiſhopric of York. From an inſcription ſcarce legible we are informed he died May 29, 1397.

On the weſt ſide of this chapel there is another grave ſtone of black marble, ſacred to the memory of Edward lord Herbert, who died December 9, 1678, aged 46. He was baron of Cherbury in England, and of Caſtle-Ireland in Ireland.

Deſcription of the TOMBS in St. NICHOLAS'S CHAPEL.

ON the left hand as you enter is a monument of black marble, finely poliſhed, and adorned with cherubims. The ſcroll and figures are in alabaſter; the former of which has a long inſcription on it in Engliſh, deſcribing the deſcent and marriage of lady Jane Clifford, youngeſt daughter to the duke of Somerſet, and wife to Charles lord Clifford and Dungarvon, who died the 23d of November, 1679.

On the ſame ſide, near the door, is a monument of alabaſter erected for lady Cecil, lady of the bedchamber to queen Elizabeth, and daughter of lord Cobham; who having married Sir Robert Cecil, ſon to William lord Burleigh, treaſurer of England, died in child-bed, two years after, which was in the year 1591. There is a dialogue in latin, deſcribing the mutual affection that ſubſiſted between the happy pair.

From this the beholders are particularly ſtruck with admiration at viewing a moſt ſuperb temple of various coloured marble, erected to the memory of Anne, dutcheſs of Somerſet, wife to Edward duke of Somerſet, brother to the third wife of king Henry VIII. queen Jane Seymour and uncle to Edward VI. and ſome time regent during his minority. He was afterwards diſgraced, accuſed of treaſonable and felonious practices againſt the king and council, tried by his peers, and acquitted of treaſon, but condemned of felony in levying armed men contrary to law. In conſequence of which he was ſentenced to be hanged, but in reſpect to his quality, was beheaded on Tower hill, the 22d of January, in the year 1551. The inſcription on the tomb is in latin and Engliſh, and deſcribes the noble lineage of this great lady, who was daughter to Sir Edward Stanhope, by Elizabeth daughter of Foulke Bourchier, lord Fitz-Water, her alliances and iſſue. She died at Hamworth in the nineteenth year of her age, April 16, 1587.

The next is a beautiful monument to the memory of lady Elizabeth Fane, the inſcription of which repreſents her ancient deſcent, but in a particular manner her virtues. She was daughter to Robert baron Spencer, of Wormleighton, and wife to Sir George Fane, of Buſton in Kent. She died in the 28th year of her age 1618.

Under this, adjoining to the wall, is an antique monument of grey marble beautifully wrought, placed over Nicholas baron Carew, and the lady Margaret his wife, daughter of John lord Dinham, and, as 'tis imagined, mother to Sir Nicholas Carew, who was beheaded in the time of Henry VIII. for holding a correſpondence with cardinal de la Pole, and ſpiriting up a rebellion on account of religion. They both died in the year 1470: he on the 6th of December, ſhe on the 13th.

Beneath this tomb, engraven on braſs, is the portrait of Sir Humphrey Stanley, who died the 12th of March, 1505, He was knighted by Henry VII. for his gallant behaviour under his couſin lord Stanley, at the battle of Boſworthfield.

Near to this is a moſt ſuperb monument, erected by the great lord Burleigh, to the memory of Mildred his wife, and their daughter lady Anne, counteſs of Oxford. It repreſents a ſtately temple made of porphyry, and other kinds of marble gilt. It is divided into two compartments, one raiſed over the other. In the lower lies lady Burleigh with her daughter lady Jane in her arms; and at her head and feet are her children and grand children kneeling. In the upper compartment is the figure of a venerable old man, in the robes and enſigns of the garter, kneeling, as if at prayers. It is ſuppoſed to be deſigned for lord Burleigh. There is a long latin inſcription ſetting forth their reſpective virtues, and explaining the figures. This amiable lady, after being 40 years married, died the 4th of April 1589.

Adjoining is a monument erected to the memory of William de Dudley, alias Sutton, ſon of John lord Dudley, who died in the year 1483. He was archdeacon of Middleſex, dean of Windſor, and, in 1476, lord biſhop of Durham.

There is another beautiful monument erected to the memory of lady Winifred, who was firſt married to Sir Richard Sackville, knt. and afterwards to John Paulet, marquis of Wincheſter. Before this monument, on the baſe, are the figures of a knight armed and kneeling; oppoſite him is a lady in deep mourning, in the like attitude; behind whoſe back, on a baptiſmal font, lies an infant with its head ſupported by a pillow. The inſcription implies, that ſhe was deſcended of illuſtrious parents, and married firſt a gentleman whoſe anceſtors were renowned before the conqueror's time, and that her ſecond huſband was of noble blood.

On the weſt ſide of this chapel againſt the wall, is a gothic monument with the effigy of a lady in robes. By the inſcription, this lady appears to be Philippa, ſecond daughter and coheir to John lord Mohun, of Dunſtar, who died in the year 1433.

1433. She was firſt married to Edward Plantagenet, duke of York, and afterwards to Sir Walter Fitz-Walter, knt. by neither of whom ſhe appears to have had iſſue.

There are two beautiful pyramids in this chapel; the largeſt erected to the memory of Nicholas Bagenall, a child of two months old, that was overlaid by his nurſe the 7th of March, 1688: the other to the memory of Anna Sophia Harley, a child of a year old, daughter to the honourable Chriſtopher Harley, ambaſſador from the French king, who died in the year 1605. The inſcription informs us, that the heart of this child is placed in a cup on the top of the pyramid.

There is a fine raiſed moument of poliſhed marble in the middle of this chapel, to the memory of Sir George Villars and his lady, Mary Beaumont, created counteſs of Buckingham in 1618. She died the 19th of April 1632, aged 62. Her ſon was advanced to the dignity of duke of Buckingham, by the favour of king James I. and in the third year of king Charles I. owing to the hatred he incurred from the public, was ſtabbed by Felton in the council-chamber at St. James's.

The marquis of Hamilton, who died in 1638, lies interred near this tomb. After a life of ſtrange viciſſitude, being engaged in the long and civil bloody wars during the reign of Charles I. he was, at length, after the murder of his royal maſter, cut off by the uſurper; and, together with the lords Capel and Holland, fell a ſacrifice to the policy of thoſe unhappy times.

Juſt by lies Elizabeth counteſs of Derby, who died in 1626. She was the wife of William Stanley, earl of Derby, eldeſt daughter of Edward de Vere, earl of Oxford, and grand-daughter to lord Burleigh.

Algernon Seymour, duke of Somerſet, lies interred in this chapel. He died the 7th of February 1750. Over the monument of lady Roſs hang his banners, &c. Frances, relict of the above duke, eldeſt daughter and coheireſs of the honourable Henry Thynne, eſq; died the 7th of July 1754. Her banners hang over Elizabeth dutcheſs of Somerſet's. In the ſame place is likewiſe interred George lord viſcount Beauchamp, who died of the ſmall pox in France the 11th of September 1744.

Sir Henry Spelman, who died in a very advanced age, was buried at the door of this chapel in the year 1641. He was ſuppoſed to be the moſt learned antiquary of his time.

Account of the tombs in the chapel of king HENRY VII.

THE original intent of this chapel was as a ſepulchre, in which none but the royal family was to be interred; nor indeed have any been admitted but thoſe of the higheſt deſcent.

In this chapel ſtands the magnificent tomb of Henry VII. and Elizabeth his queen. It is incloſed in a curious chauntry of caſt braſs, beautifully deſigned, and well executed: it is ornamented with ſtatues, of which thoſe only of St. George, St. James, St. Bartholomew and St. Edward are now remaining. Within it are the effigies of the royal pair, in their robes of ſtate, lying cloſe to each other on a tomb of black marble; the head of which is ſupported by a red dragon, the enſign of Cadwallader, the laſt king of the britons, from whom king Henry VII. was fond of tracing his deſcent. There are various devices alluding to his family and alliances; ſuch as portculliſſes, ſignifying his relation to the Beauforts by his mother's ſide; roſes twiſted and crowned in memory of the union of the two royal houſes of Lancaſter and York; and at each end a crown in a buſh, referring to the crown of Richard III. found in a hawthorn, near Boſworthfield. He died the 21ſt of April 1509, in the 53d year of his age. This monument was not erected till ſome time after his interment.

The remains of Edward VI. grandſon to Henry VII. lie depoſited at the head of this chauntry. A ſtately monument was originally erected to his memory by queen Mary, his ſiſter and ſucceſſor, but having ſome curious ſculpture, repreſenting the paſſion and reſurrection of our Saviour, with two angels on the top kneeling, it was entirely demoliſhed by the puritan party, during the grand rebellion, as a relict of romiſh ſuperſtition. He died in the 16th year of his age, and ſeventh of his reign.

In a ſmall chapel on one ſide of the tomb of Henry VII. is a monument of caſt braſs, in which are the effigies of Lewis Stuart, duke of Richmond and Francis his wife. They are repreſented as lying on a marble table under a canopy of braſs curiouſly wrought, and ſupported by the figures of faith, hope, charity, and prudence. There is on the top a beautiful figure of fame taking her flight and reſting only on her toe. This illuſtrious nobleman died the 16th of February 1623. His lady the 8th of October 1639. There is likewiſe a pyramid of black and white marble ſupporting a ſmall urn, in which is contained the heart of Eſme Stuart, ſon to the duke of Richmond and Lenox, who died in France the 14th of Auguſt 1661, in the eleventh year of his age.

There is a very antique monument on the north ſide of Henry VIIths chapel, which is decorated with ſeveral emblematical figures in braſs gilt with gold, the moſt material of which is Neptune in a penſive poſture with his trident reverſed, and Mars with his head cruſhed. Theſe figures ſupport the tomb on which lies the effigy of George Villars, duke of Buckingham, the great favourite of king James I. and king Charles I. who fell a ſacrifice to national reſentment, and periſhed by the hands of an aſſaſſin. The dutcheſs, who cauſed this monument to be erected to his memory, lies in effigy by his ſide on the ſame tomb. There is a latin inſcription, which repreſents his high titles and honours, and alludes to the unhappy cauſe of his death.

Not inferior to the above is a monument erected about thirty years ago to the memory of John Sheffield, late duke of Buckingham, where, on an altar of the moſt beautiful marble, lies in a half raiſed poſture, his grace's effigy in a roman habit, with his dutcheſs Catharine, natural daughter of the duke of York, afterwards king James II. ſtanding at his feet weeping. On each ſide are enrichments of military trophies, and over all a beautiful figure of Time holding ſeveral buſtos in relievo, being the portraits of their graces children. In the early part of his life he was a moſt excellent poet, and in the latter part, perhaps one of the firſt writers of his time. Over his grace's effigy is a latin inſcription, importing the affection he bore to his king and country, and his reſignation to the will of providence. He died the 24th of February 1720, in the 75th year of his age. He left his literary productions to the care of Mr. Pope. His grace had three wives: the firſt Urſula, counteſs of Conway; the ſecond Catharine, counteſs of Gainſborough, who died in 1704, and lies here interred; and the third Catharine, counteſs of Angleſey, who died the 14th of March 1743.

You now enter the north iſle, where is fixed on the eaſt wall a beautiful altar raiſed by king Charles II. to the memory of Edward V. and his brother, who by their treacherous uncle Richard III. were murdered in the Tower. The inſcription is in latin, the tranſlation of which runs thus: "Here lie the reliques of Edward V. king "of England, and Richard, duke of York; "who being confined in the Tower, and there "ſtifled with pillows, were privately and meanly "buried by order of their perfidious uncle "Richard the uſurper: their bones, long en-"quired after and wiſhed for, after lying 201 "years in the rubbiſh of the ſtairs, (thoſe lately "leading to the chapel of the White Tower) "were on the 7th of July 1674, by undoubted "proofs diſcovered, being buried deep in that "place. Charles II. pitying their unhappy fate, "ordered thoſe unfortunate princes to be laid "amongſt the reliques of their predeceſſors, in "the year 1678, and the 20th of his reign." What is very ſingular, Edward was born the 4th of November 1470, in the ſanctuary belonging to this church, whither his mother took refuge during the conteſt between the houſes of York and Lancaſter. His father dying, he was proclaimed king when but eleven years of age, and was murdered, as has been related about two years after, on the 23d of June 1483. Richard his brother, was born May 28, 1474, and was married in his infancy.

There is a lofty and beautiful monument in this iſle, erected to the memory of queen Elizabeth, by her ſucceſſor king James I. The inſcription deſcribes her character thus: "That ſhe "was the mother of her country, and the pa-"troneſs of religion and learning: ſhe was ſkilled "in many languages, adorned with every excel-"lence of mind and perſon, and endowed with "princely virtues beyond her ſex; that in her "reign religion was refined to its primitive pu-"rity; peace was eſtabliſhed; money reſtored "to its juſt value; domeſtic inſurrections quell-"ed; France delivered from inteſtine troubles; "the Netherlands ſupported; the Spaniſh arma-"da defeated; Ireland, almoſt loſt by the ſecret "contrivance of Spain, recovered; the revenues "of both univerſities improved by a law of pro-"viſions; and, in ſhort, all England enriched; "that ſhe was a moſt prudent governeſs, forty-"five years a virtuous and triumphant queen; "truly religious and bleſſed in all her great af-"fairs; and that after a calm and reſigned death "in the ſeventieth year of her age, ſhe left her "mortal part to be depoſited in this church, "which ſhe eſtabliſhed on a new footing, till by "Chriſt's word ſhe is called to immortality." She died the 24th of March, in the year 1602. In this ſame place lies interred the bloody queen Mary, whoſe reign preceded that of the above valuable queen.

There is in this iſle a pyramid of a conſiderable height, ſupported by two griffins of braſs gilt, on a pedeſtal of the moſt curious marble, erected to the memory of Charles Montague, the firſt of this family who bore the title of lord Hallifax. He died the 19th of May 1715.

In the ſame iſle, at the eaſt end, is a vault, in which are depoſited the remains of king James I. and his queen, who was daughter to Frederick II. king of Denmark. This prince reigned over Scotland fifty-nine years, and England twenty-two. After a long and peaceful reign, he died the 16th of March 1625, aged ſixty.

There is a ſmall tomb over this vault with the figure of a child, erected to the memory of Mary, third daughter to king James I. born at Greenwich in the year 1605; and ſoon afterwards committed to the care of lady Knevet, in whoſe houſe, at two years old, ſhe died the 16th of December 1607.

To the memory of Sophia, fourth daughter of the ſame king, is another monument repreſenting a child in the cradle. She died in three days after her birth, which was at Greenwich in the year 1606.

There is a table monument in the ſouth-iſle of of this chapel, on which is the effigy of Margaret, counteſs of Richmond, mother to Henry VII. She was a great encourager of the art of printing when firſt brought into England. The inſcription deſcribes her to be of a very charitable diſpoſition. She died during the reign of her grandſon Henry VIII. in the month of July 1509.

Incloſed with iron rails at the weſt-end of this iſle is a handſome table monument on which lies finely robed, the effigy of Margaret Douglas, daughter of Margaret queen of Scots. Agreeable to the Engliſh inſcription this lady had to her great grand-father king Henry VII. to her uncle king Henry VIII. to her couſin-german king Edward VI. to her brother king James V. of Scotland; to her ſon king Henry I of Scotland; to her grand-ſon king James VI. having to her great grand-mother and grand-mother two queens, both named Elizabeth; to her mother Margaret queen of Scots; to her aunt, Mary the French queen; to her couſins-german, Mary and Elizabeth, queens of England; to her niece and daughter-in-law, Mary queen of Scots. She was privately married to Thomas Howard, ſon of the duke of Norfolk, in the year 1537; on which account both of them were committed to the Tower by king Henry VIII. her uncle. Her huſband died in priſon, but ſhe being releaſed, was ſoon after married to Matthew earl of Lenox, by whom ſhe had the handſome lord Darnly, father to king James I. whoſe effigy is the foremoſt on the tomb in a kneeling poſture, with the crown over his head. There are ſeven children beſides round the tomb of Margaret. She died the 10th of March 1577.

There is a magnificent monument near this tomb, erected to the memory of the unhappy Mary, queen of Scots, who was beheaded on the 8th of February 1587, at Fotheringhay-caſtle in Northamptonſhire, on a ſcaffold erected in the hall of that caſtle. She was afterwards pompouſly interred by order of queen Elizabeth in the cathedral church of Peterborough, but on the acceſſion of her ſon to the throne of England, her remains were removed from thence, and placed near this monument amongſt her anceſtors.

The royal vault, as it is called, is at the eaſt end of this iſle, in which are depoſited the coffins of king Charles II. king William III. and queen Mary his conſort; queen Anne and prince George's. In a wainſcot preſs over them is the effigy of king Charles II. in wax-work, reſembling life, and dreſſed in the robes he wore at the inſtallation of the knights of the garter at Windſor.

There is likewiſe a monument erected to the memory of George, and Chriſtopher Monk his ſon, both dukes of Albemarle; alſo Elizabeth, dutcheſs dowager of Albemarle and Montague.

Near this is a figure erected to the memory of Catharine lady Walpole, eldeſt daughter of John Shorter, eſq; of Rybrook, in Kent, and firſt wife of Sir Robert Walpole, afterwards earl of Orford. The figure was brought from Italy by her ſon Horace. She died the 20th of Auguſt in the year 1737.

At the corner of the great eaſt window is another wainſcot preſs, in which is placed the effigy of lady Mary, dutcheſs of Richmond, relict of Charles Stuart, duke of Richmond, who died in 1672. The figure is dreſſed in the very robes her grace wore at the coronation of queen Anne. She was daughter of Walter Stuart, who died October the 15th, 1702, and is interred in the Richmond vault. She left her fortune to Walter Stuart, lord Blantyre in Scotland, who died June the 23d. 1713.

In a handſome wainſcot preſs near this monument is the effigy of Catharine, relict of John duke of Buckingham and Normanby, and natural daughter of king James II. by Catharine counteſs of Dorcheſter. She is dreſſed in the robes ſhe wore at his late majeſty's coronation. Likewiſe by her ſtands the effigy of her ſon, the marquis of Normanby, who died the firſt of February, 1714, in the fourth year of his age.

As you paſs out of the left iſle, in another wainſcot preſs, is the effigy of general Monk, who had ſo great a ſhare in the reſtoration of king Charles II. to the throne of his anceſtors. This great man was ſon to Sir Thomas Monk of Potheridge, deſcended by the mother's ſide from the royal line of the Plantagenets. As a reward for his eminent ſervices in the reſtoration, he was created duke of Albemarle, earl of Farringdon, Baron Monk, of Potheridge, Beauchamp, and Teys, captain general of all his majeſty's forces, knight of the moſt noble order of the garter, maſter of the horſe, and privy counſellor. He died January the 4th, 1669, and was buried in a vault in this iſle, which is ſtill called Albemarle vault. He is repreſented in armour, and the perſon who deſcribes him generally preſents his ducal cap for the acceptance of the obſerver's bounty.

The inſtallation of the knights of the moſt honourable order of the Bath is performed in this chapel. This order was revived in the reign of king George I. in the year 1725. In their ſtalls are placed braſs plates of their arms, &c. and over them hang their banners, ſwords, and helmets.

Deſcription of the MONUMENTS, &c. in St. PAUL'S CHAPEL.

AS you enter this chapel, on your left hand is a monument erected to the memory of Sir John Puckering, knight, remarkable for his knowledge in the laws, as well as piety, wiſdom, and many other virtues. He was lord keeper of the great ſeal of England four years in the reign of queen Elizabeth, in which office he died the 20th of April 1596.

There is a monument very much decayed adjoining to this, on which are the effigies of Sir James Fullerton, and his lady. On a table of black marble there is an epitaph, which has a certain quaintneſs in it peculiar to thoſe times, and runs thus:

" Here lie the remains of Sir James Fullerton,
" knt. firſt gentleman of the bedchamber to
" king Charles the firſt (prince and king) a gene" rous rewarder of all virtue, a ſevere reprover
" of all vice, a profeſſed renouncer of all vanity.
" He was a firm pillar to the commonwealth, a " faithful patron to the catholic church, a fair
" pattern to the Britiſh court. He lived to the " welfare of his country, to the honour of his
" prince, to the glory of his God. He died
" fuller of faith than of fear, fuller of reſolu-
" tion than of pains, fuller of honour than of
" days."

There is a table monument in the middle of this chapel, which is railed in. On it lie the effigies of Sir Giles Daubeny, and dame Elizabeth his wife. In the reign of Henry VII. he was lord lieutenant of Calais in France, lord chamberlain to his majeſty, knight of the moſt noble order of the garter, and father to Henry lord Daubeny, the firſt and laſt earl of Bridgewater.

His lady died in the year 1500, and he the 22d of May, 1507.

On the table of a moſt beautiful monument of alabaſter, with pillars of lydian marble gilt, lies the effigy of an old man in a chancellor's habit, with four ſons and four daughters kneeling on the baſe. It appears by the inſcription that this monument was erected to the memory of Sir Thomas Bromley, knight, privy-counſellor to queen Elizabeth, and eight years chancellor, in which office he died the 12th of April, 1587.

The next is a lofty but plain monument, on which is placed, in a half raiſed poſture, the effigy of Sir Dudley Carleton, afterwards made viſcount Dorcheſter, for his great ſervices to king Charles I. and his father, both at home and abroad. The inſcription informs us he was well acquainted with the language and cuſtoms of moſt of the European nations, and was, both by king James I. and his ſucceſſor, entruſted with the moſt moſt important foreign negotiations. He was twice married; firſt to Ann Gerrard, who died the 18th of April 1627, with whom he lived twenty years, and afterwards to Ann, viſcounteſs Bayning, who died the 15th of February 1631, by both of whom he had iſſue.

There is another beautiful monument of alabaſter to the eaſt of this, erected to the memory of Frances counteſs of Suſſex, whoſe effigy lies in a cumbent poſture with a coronet on her head, reſting on an embroidered cuſhion, and her body beautifully robed. Her ladyſhip was the wife of Thomas Ratcliffe, earl of Suſſex, lord-deputy of Ireland, and knight of the garter; and daughter to Sir William Sidney of Penſehurſt, knight. Having outlived her huſband, at her deceaſe ſhe inſtituted a divinity lecture in this abbey, gave five thouſand pounds towards the building of a new college in Cambridge, now called Sidney Suſſex college, and left a ſufficient yearly revenue for the maintenance of one maſter, ten fellows, and twenty ſcholars, either in the ſaid new college, or in Clare-hall. She died the 15th of April, 1589, in the 58th year of her age. The inſcription tells us, that to her relations ſhe was moſt kind, to the poor and priſoners moſt liberal, and to the miniſters of the word of God moſt charitable.

Next to this is a monument erected to the memory of Sir Henry Belaſyſe, knt. lieutenant-general, ſome time governor of Galway in Ireland, and afterwards of Berwick upon Tweed, in the reign of king William III. He died the 16th of December 1717, in the 69th year of his age.

In this chapel is a monument of black touch-ſtone, which differs, in a very peculiar manner, from any other in the abbey. There is, on the top of it, a circular frame of gilt braſs, encloſing the buſt of Ann, lady Cottington, wife to Francis lord Cottington. She died the 22d of February 1633, in the 33d year of her age. Her iſſue were four daughters and a ſon, all of whom died before their father, who, on a table monument beneath, lies in effigy, reſting on his left arm, and over the head of a ſatyr is the following inſcription: "Here lies Francis lord Cottington, "of Hanworth, who, in the reign of king Charles "I. was chancellor of his majeſty's exchequer, "maſter of the court of wards, conſtable of the "Tower, lord high-treaſurer of England, and "one of the privy-council. He was twice am-"baſſador in Spain, once for the ſaid king, and "a ſecond time for king Charles II. now reign-"ing, to both which he moſt ſignally ſhewed his "allegiance and fidelity, during the unhappy "civil broils of thoſe times; and for his faithful "adherence to the crown (the uſurper prevailing) "was forced to fly his country, and, during his "exile, died at Valadolid in Spain, June 19th "1652, in the 74th year of his age, whence his "body was brought and here interred by Charles "Cottington, eſq; his nephew and heir, in 1679." This great man was ſecretary to Charles, prince of Wales, whom he attended on his journey to viſit the Infanta when on the point of marriage with that princeſs. After the death of the duke of Buckingham, he roſe to ſuch honour as even to be conſulted in all the principal affairs of the nation; and ſuch was his conduct, that he acquitted himſelf of that popular odium which fell on many much inferior to himſelf.

Here is alſo a very gothic monument erected to the memory of Lewis Robert, or Robſert, a foreigner, but ſtandard-bearer to Henry V. firſt, knight of the bath, and then of the garter, and afterwards created lord Bouchier.

Deſcription of the TOMBS, &c. in St. ERASMUS'S CHAPEL.

AS you enter this chapel, on the right hand, is an elegant monument erected to the memory of Mrs. Mary Kendall, daughter of Thomas Kendall, eſq; who died at Epſom the 4th of March, 1700, in the 33d year of her age. The epitaph deſcribes her character thus: "Her great "virtues rendered her every way worthy of that "cloſe union and friendſhip in which ſhe lived "with lady Catharine Jones; and in teſtimony "of which, ſhe deſired that even their aſhes, "after death, might not be divided; and there-"fore ordered herſelf here to be interred, where "ſhe knew that excellent lady deſigned one day "to reſt, near the grave of her beloved and re-"ligious mother, Elizabeth, counteſs of Rane-"lagh."

Near this is a monument erected to the memory of colonel Edward Popham, and his lady, the ſtatues of whom are in white marble, as big as the life, and ſtand under a lofty canopy, reſting their arms in a thoughtful poſition on a marble altar, on which lie the gloves of an armed knight. He was an active officer in Cromwell's army, and his atchievements were inſcribed on his tomb. At the time of the reſtoration this incription was ordered to be defaced, and the whole monument deſtroyed, but at the interceſſion of ſome of the relations of his lady, who had been of particular ſervice to his majeſty, the ſtone, on which the inſcription was engraved, was only turned inwards, and the monument received no other injury. The time of this gentleman's death is entirely uncertain, as the inſcription is irrecoverable.

In this chapel is a monument erected to the memory of Thomas Carey, ſecond ſon to the earl of Monmouth, who died in the year 1648. It is ſaid he died of grief at the age of 33, on account of the unhappy fate of his royal maſter king Charles the firſt, to whom he was of the bedchamber. He was ſon to Robert lord Carey, of Leppington, who was created earl of Monmouth in 1625, and died the 5th of February 1639. His eldeſt ſon Henry ſucceeded him in his titles, but died without iſſue in the year 1661, in conſequence of which the title became extinct.

There is an ancient monument in this chapel, erected to the memory of Sir Thomas Vaughan, knt. chamberlain to Edward, prince of Wales, and treaſurer to king Edward the fourth.

In the middle of this chapel is a large table monument, erected to the memory of Thomas Cecil, earl of Exeter, baron Burleigh, knight of the garter, and privy-counſellor to king James; on which is his effigy in his robes with a lady on his right ſide, and a vacant ſpace for another on his left. Dorothy Nevil, his firſt wife, who was daughter daughter and coheir to the noble lord Latimer, lays on his right ſide; and the place that is vacant was left for his ſecond wife Frances Bridges, who was of the noble family of Chandois. This lady gave expreſs orders in her will, that as the right ſide was taken up, her effigy ſhould not be placed on the left; notwithſtanding which, agreeable to the inſcription, they are all buried together in one vault.

Affixed to the eaſt wall is the moſt ſuperb monument in this chapel. It is in the very place where ſtood the altar of St. John Baptiſt, and was erected to the memory of Henry Carey, firſt couſin to queen Elizabeth, created baron of Hunſdon, in Hertfordſhire, in the year 1558, ſome time governor of Berwick, lord chamberlain to queen Elizabeth, privy-counſellor, and knight of the garter, who died the 23d of July 1596, in the ſeventy-ſecond year of his age. It is ſaid, that not meeting with preferment agreeable to his expectations, he laid the diſappointment ſo much to heart, that he languiſhed for a long time on a ſick bed, at which the queen being moved too late, created him an earl, and ordered the patent and robes to be laid before him, but without effect.

There is a ſtone monument, very antique, againſt the ſouth wall, where, under a gothic canopy, lies the figure of a biſhop properly habited, and is ſuppoſed to be Thomas Ruthal, made biſhop of Durham by king Henry VIII. He had been ſecretary of ſtate to Henry VII. and was made a privy-counſellor, and ſent abroad on various embaſſies by Henry VIII. He died in the year 1524. Biſhop Goodwin relates the following circumſtance relative to the diſcovery of his poſſeſſions: That being commanded to write down a true ſtate of the kingdom in general for his majeſty's private information, he took great pains in the performance, and having fairly tranſcribed it, cauſed the book to be bound in vellum, gilt, and variouſly ornamented; and at the ſame time having taken an account of his own private eſtate, with an inventory of his jewels, plate and money, he cauſed that likewiſe to be bound and ornamented exactly like the other, and laid them both carefully together in his cloſet. However, it ſo fell out, that the king, upon ſome occaſion, ſent cardinal Wolſey in haſte for the national tract, which he had ſo long expected from Ruthal, but by miſtake Wolſey received the book which contained the ſchedule of the biſhop's own wealth. The cardinal ſoon diſcovered the miſtake, but being willing to do Ruthal, to whom he had no liking, a ſhrewd turn, he delivered the book to the king, juſt as he received it, telling his majeſty that now if he wanted money, that book would inform him where he might command a million; for ſo much did the biſhop's inventory amount to. When the biſhop diſcovered his error, it touched him ſo near, that he died ſoon after.

An ancient ſtone monument is erected in this chapel, to the memory of William of Colcheſter, on which lies his effigy properly habited, the feet ſupported by a tomb, and the head by an angel.

Another antique monument is that of George Flaccet, abbot of Weſtminſter, in the reign of Henry VII. who died about the year 1414. The ſtone coffin of Thomas Mything, biſhop of Hereford, ſtands on this monument: he was ſome time abbot of Weſtminſter, and privy-counſellor to king Edward IV.

Account of the TOMBS in the Chapel of ISLIP, otherwiſe called St. JOHN BAPTIST.

THERE are but two monuments in this chapel that admit of any particular notice; the one is that of John Iſlip, abbot of Weſtminſter, the founder. It is a plain marble table, ſtanding in the center, ſupported with four ſmall pillars of braſs; over which on the roof was anciently a fine painting of our Saviour on the croſs, deſtroyed no doubt by the puritans in the time of Cromwell, who were enemies to every thing that tended to popiſh idolatry. This man was employed by Henry VII. in decorating his new chapel, and in repairing and beautifying the whole abbey; to which he added ſeveral embelliſhments, eſpecially the ſtatues of our kings along the buttreſſes, which ſince that are almoſt all demoliſhed. He likewiſe projected a moſt ſuperb dome or lanthorn to be erected in the center of the croſs, but the pillars were found too weak to ſupport it. His own chapel he dedicated to St. John, and died the ſecond of January 1510.

The other monument is that of Sir Chriſtopher Hatton, knight of the bath, ſon and heir of John Hatton, and the neareſt kinſman of the male line to Chriſtopher Hatton, chancellor of England in the reign of queen Elizabeth. He died, according to the inſcription, the 10th of September 1619. The principle figures on this tomb are a knight in armour, and a lady in deep mourning, both reſting on the aſcending ſides of a triangular pediment, ſeparated in the middle by a trunkleſs helmet. There is a neat piece of architecture over their heads, in the center whereof is a ſcroll with their arms, held up by naked boys, one whereof, over the knight, holds a torch put out and reverſed, to ſhew that Sir Chriſtopher died firſt; the other over the lady holds his torch erect, and burning, to ſignify that ſhe ſurvived him. After the death of Eſſex, in the reign of queen Elizabeth, Sir Chriſtopher, the chancellor, became the chief favourite. He was preferred to the chancellorſhip for the reputation he had of clear judgment and ſtrict integrity. Though he was rooted in the queen's favour, yet 'tis ſaid he died through her unkindneſs; for having run into her debt, ſhe demanded her money with ſome ſeverity; which, preſuming on her favour, he hoped would have been remitted; but finding his miſtake, he ſickened, and during his illneſs Elizabeth, by viſits and other expreſſions of friendſhip, ſtrove to heal the ſpirit ſhe had broken, but in vain; for he died the 23d of July 1596, in the ſeventy-ſecond year of his age.

There is a chauntry over this chapel, in which are two large wainſcot preſſes, containing the effigies of royal perſonages, and others of the higheſt diſtinction. Theſe effigies reſembled the deceaſed as near as poſſible, and were uſually expoſed at the funerals of our princes, in open chariots, with their proper enſigns appended of royalty and honours. What are here laid up, are in a ſad mangled condition; ſome ſtripped, others in tattered robes, and all of them maimed or broken. Thoſe that are the moſt ancient are leaſt damaged, by which it appears that the richneſs of their cloaths had been the occaſion of this ravage; for the robes of Edward VI. which were of crimſon velvet, but now appears like leather, are left entire; but thoſe of queen Elizabeth and king James I. are entirely ſtripped.

The eye is particularly ſtruck at the effigies of king William and queen Mary, and queen Anne, which are in good condition placed in two handſome wainſcot preſſes, in this chapel. Here is likewiſe a new figure of queen Elizabeth.

Deſcription of the TOMBS of St. JOHN the EVANGELIST'S CHAPEL.

THere is an elegant monument in the center of this chapel, erected to the memory of Sir Francis Vere, a gentleman well ſkilled both in learning and arms; but being brought up from his youth in the camp, he dedicated his ſtudy to the art of war, in which he was equalled by few, not excelled by any. He commanded in front under prince Maurice, at the battle of Newport, againſt the Spaniſh army, who came to the relief of that town, under the command of the archduke Albert, then governor of the low countries. Vere, in poſting the Engliſh ſoldiers advantageouſly had occaſion to paſs a ford, in order to which the ſoldiers were preparing to ſtrip; but he prevented that delay, by telling them that what they were going to do was entirely uſeleſs, for in a few hours they might either have dry cloaths, or need of none. By this ſeaſonable encouragement the enemy's horſe that had left their foot behind, were beat back, and the Engliſh, who were not above 1500 in number, gained the eminence of the downs, ſupported by a body of Frieſland foot, ready to ſuſtain the firſt ſhock of the enemy's fire. Though this was a deſperate enterprize, in which Vere himſelf was wounded, his horſe ſhot under him, and half the Engliſh ſlain, yet it proved the cauſe of victory on the part of the Dutch; for prince Maurice advancing ſuddenly with his freſh troops, while the Spaniards were yet greatly exhauſted by their full diſcharge upon this ſmall body, found it eaſy to put them to the rout, and thereby obtained a compleat victory. The monument is a table ſupported by four knights kneeling, on which lie the ſeveral parts of a compleat ſuit of armour, and underneath the effigy of Sir Francis, laying, as if undreſſed, in a looſe gown, on a quilt of alabaſter.—There is a ſhort deſcription on the baſe of the monument in latin, ſignifying that he was nephew to the earl of Oxford, and that this was conſecrated to his memory by his diſconſolate widow. He died in the fifty-fourth year of his age, the 28th of Auguſt, 1608.

Adjoining to the wall, eaſtward of this, is a monument, on the pedeſtal whereof is repreſented in relief the ſiege of a town; alluding, in all probability, to the ſiege of Newport. The principal figure is a general on horſeback holding a batton, and having a blemiſh in one eye. It is reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that as the monument was erected to the memory of Sir George Hollis, nephew to Sir Francis Vere, and major-general under him, that this piece of ſculpture is intended to perpetuate the ſtory of that memorable battle in which Sir Francis was wounded, and acquired ſo much honour. The cannon, which is very viſible, ſeems to point that out as the inſtrument by which his horſe was killed, and the blemiſh in the general's eye, the hurt he might have received on falling. There is a Pallas ſitting on one ſide of the pedeſtal, and on the other Bellona, lamenting the the death of the great warrior repreſented above in a Roman habit, ſtanding erect upon a lofty altar with a cherub ſupporting the plinth on which he ſtands, Sir George died in the fiftieth year of his age, the ſixteenth of May, in the year 1626.

Not far from the tomb of Sir Francis lies Aubrey de Vere, the laſt earl of Oxford of that name; which title had continued in a direct line to his noble family ever ſince the year 1155. He was the twentieth and laſt earl, and enjoyed the title ſeventy years. He died without iſſue male the 12th of March, 1702.

There were formerly many ancient monuments in this chapel; only one of which is now remaining. It has the image of an abbot, in his maſs habit, curiouſly engraved on braſs, repreſenting John de Eaſtny, who died the 4th of March 1498. He appears, by the records of the church, to have been a great benefactor to it. He adorned the weſt window with many grand paintings in glaſs, a ſmall quantity of which ſtill remains: he built the ſcreen to this chapel, and preſented two images gilt for the altars of St. Peter and St. Paul; and one for the Chapter-houſe. 'Tis very ſingular that in breaking up a grave, the body of this abbot was diſcovered in a coffin quilted with yellow ſattin, having on a gown of crimſon ſilk girded round him with a black girdle; on his legs were white ſilk ſtockings, and over his face a clean napkin doubled up and laid corner-wiſe.

The face was in ſome degree diſcoloured, but the legs were firm. This diſcovery was made the 17th of Auguſt 1706.

Before the door of this chapel there is a grey marble which bears the figure of an armed knight, and is ſaid, by the regiſter, to repreſent Sir John Harpedon, knt. who died in the year 1457. He is reſting his head on a greyhound, and his feet on a lion.

On the north ſide of this chapel, within the door, is another ancient tomb of free-ſtone, under which lies the body of Sir Thomas Parry, knt. who died the 15th of December, 1560. He was treaſurer of the houſhold, and maſter of the court of wards and liveries to queen Elizabeth.

Deſcription of the TOMBS, &c. in St. MICHAEL'S CHAPEL.

THere is a moſt ſuperb monument lately erected in this chapel, and executed by that great maſter of ſculpture Mr. Rubiliac. Above is repreſented a lady expiring in the arms of her huſband; and beneath, ſlily creeping from a tomb, the king of terrors preſents his grim viſage, pointing his unerring dart to the dying figure, at which ſight the huſband, ſuddenly ſtruck with aſtoniſhment, horror and deſpair, would willingly ward off the fatal ſtroke from the diſtreſſed object of his care. This monument was erected to the memory of Joſeph Gaſcoigne Nightingale and his lady, and has on it the following inſcription: "Here reſt the aſhes of Joſeph Gaſcoigne Nightingale, of Mamhead, in the county of Devon, eſq; who died July the 20th, 1752, aged 56; and of lady Elizabeth his wife, daughter and coheireſs of Waſhington earl Ferrers, who died Auguſt the 17th, 1734, aged 27. Their only ſon Waſhington Gaſcoigne Nightingale, eſq; deceaſed, in memory of their virtues, did, by his laſt will, order this monument to be erected.

Inclining to the north, there is a monument erected to the memory of Sarah, dutcheſs of Somerſet, relict of John Seymour, duke of Somerſet, who died the 5th of October 1692. On the baſe of this monument ſit two charity boys, one on each ſide, bewailing the death of their great benefactreſs, who is repreſented in a modern dreſs, reſting upon her arm, under a canopy of ſtate, and looking earneſtly up at a group of cherubs, iſſuing from the clouds above her. Underneath is a latin inſcription to this purpoſe: "Here lies the late illuſtrious dutcheſs of Somerſet, celebrated for charity and benevolence, who erected a grammar-ſchool for boys at Tottenham, in Middleſex, enlarged the income of the green-coat hoſpital at Weſtminſter, largely endowed Brazen-Noſe college in Oxford, and St. John's in Cambridge, for the education and inſtruction of youth in piety and good literature. She was likewiſe an encourager of trades and handycrafts, and had a tender regard to old age, by erecting an alms-houſe in Froxfield in Wiltſhire, for thirty widows: ſhe was very charitable to the poor of St. Margaret's, Weſtminſter, where ſhe inſtituted a lecture, and gave many ſtately ornaments to the church."

There was formerly a monument in this chapel erected to the memory of Catharine, lady St. John. It was broken in pieces at the time of repairing the church, but the effigy may be ſtill ſeen in the chapel of St. Andrew. This lady was relict of John lord St. John, of Bletſoe in Bedfordſhire, and daughter of Sir William Dormer, of Eyethorpe in Bucks.

Account of the TOMBS in St. ANDREW'S CHAPEL.

A Moſt beautiful monument is erected in the center of this chapel, to the memory of Sir Henry Norris, his lady, and ſix ſons. It has a fine repreſentation of an encampment in relief, and is otherwiſe elegantly ornamented; but as there is no inſcription, the date is left uncertain. This great man was anceſtor to the preſent earl of Abington, who is baron Norris of Rycot, and for his valour in the low countries in the reign of queen Elizabeth, was created lord Norris of Rycot. He was the firſt who diſcovered the project of the Spaniſh invaſion, which he did by means of the provoſt-marſhal of Paris, whom he entertained as a ſpy.

There was formerly againſt the eaſt wall, a table monument erected to the memory of Sir John Burgh, who was twice honoured with knighthood; once in the Netherlands by the earl of Leiceſter, captain-general of her majeſty's forces, and afterwards by Harry IV. of France, at the victory of St. Adrian. He died the 10th of March, 1594. The inſcription informs us, that endeavouring to take and bring into England a large Spaniſh ſhip laden with jewels, gold, ſilver, Indian ſpices, &c. a prize of infinite value, by an unhappy ſecurity of mind, deſpiſing the enemy, though far ſuperior in force, he met with an untimely death at the age of 32, to the irreparable loſs of his country.

A monument is ſtill remaining erected to the memory of Ann, daughter of Henry Bodenham, and of Catharine his wife, wife of James Kirton, of Caſtel-Cary, in the county of Somerſet, who died the 7th of September 1603.

There is in one corner of this chapel the ancient monument of abbot Kirton, who died the third of October, 1466. It is worthy of obſervation, having ſeveral labels of black letter all round the portrait, which ſtands upon eagles crowned, alluding, perhaps to his high deſcent, from the ancient and illuſtrious family of Codilbic. He was an excellent orator, and appears to have been a man of great reputation.

Deſcription of the TOMBS in the AREA.

ON the north ſide, as you paſs round the area, were formerly three ancient monuments, all of which are now almoſt obliterated. The firſt of free-ſtone, made like a cloſe bed, was walled up, and the tomb of biſhop Duppa, tutor to king Charles I. placed againſt it. This tomb was covered with an ancient gothic arch, the ſides whereof were adorned with vine branches in relief, the roof within, ſpringing into many angels, under which lies the image of a lady in a very antique dreſs, her feet reſting upon lions, and her head on pillows ſupported by angels, ſitting on each ſide the effigy, gilt and painted. On the ſide of the tomb are ſix niches, on which ſeem to have been painted monks, and on the pedeſtal are ſtill to be ſeen ſome remains of paintings. This monument covered the remains of Aveline, counteſs of Lancaſter, who died the 4th of November 1293, the very year of her marriage. She was daughter to William de Fortibus, earl of Albemarle, and Holderneſſe, and married Edmund earl of Lancaſter, ſon to king Henry the third.

Adjoining to this is another ancient monument of grey marble, to the memory of Aymer de Valence, ſecond and laſt earl of Pembroke of this family, who was poiſoned in France, by the ſecret contrivance of the earl of Arundel, the 23d of June 1324. He had been three times married, but had no iſſue by either of his wives. He was a tall, pale man, on which account Gaveſton uſed to call him Joſeph the Jew. In the time of Edward I. he was a great general, and not only attended that prince in his expedition to Flanders, but likewiſe accompanied him to Scotland, where that king died. He is ſaid to have been one of the judges who gave ſentence againſt the great earl of Lancaſter.

Another ancient monument in this area is that of of Edmund Crouchback, fourth ſon to Henry III. ſo called, as is ſuppoſed by many, from the deformity of his perſon; others imagine it aroſe from his attending his brother in the holy wars, where they wore a crouch or croſs on their ſhoulders, as a badge of chriſtianity. On the baſe of this tomb, towards the area, is the remains of a curious, and perhaps the moſt antique painting extant, but much defaced, being ten knights armed with banners, ſurcoats of armour, and croſs-belted, repreſenting, undoubtedly, his expedition to the holy land, the number exactly agreeing with what Prior ſays, namely, Edward and his brother, four earls, and four knights, of whom ſome are ſtil' to be diſcovered. It has been a very lofty monument, painted, gilt, and inlaid with ſtained glaſs. The inſide of the canopy has been a ſky with ſtars, but by age changed into a dull red. From this prince the houſe of Lancaſter claimed their right to the crown. He was made earl of Leiceſter and ſteward of England at the age of nineteen, and at twenty-one he took the title of the earl of Lancaſter, and marrying Aveline already mentioned, became poſſeſſed of the eſtates of Albemarle, Devon, and the Iſle of Wight, together with that of Derby and Campaign. His ſecond wife was Blanch, queen of Navarre, widow of Henry, by whom he had three ſons, Thomas earl of Lancaſter, who was executed; John of Monmouth; and another John, who lived in France. In the reign of his brother Edward I. he commanded an army in France with great ſucceſs at firſt; but being ill ſupported, and his ſoldiers ill paid, they deſerted him, which he laid ſo much to heart, that he died of grief at Bayonne.

In the chapel of St. Eraſmus, on the weſt ſide of the door, is a monument erected to the memory of Juliana, only daughter of Sir Randolph Crew, knt. lord chief juſtice of England, who died unmarried the 22d of April 1621.

There is a monument in this area erected to the memory of biſhop Duppa, tutor to king Charles II, He was born at Greenwich, and educated firſt at Weſtminſter ſchool, and then at Chriſt-Church college, Oxford, of which he was afterwards dean, and being appointed preceptor to the then prince of Wales, was firſt made biſhop of Chicheſter, from thence tranſlated to Saliſbury, and, after the reſtoration, to the ſee of Wincheſter. He died in the 74th year of his age, the 26th of March 1662. This great man was of ſuch exemplary piety and lively converſation, that when king Charles I. was a priſoner in Cariſbrook-caſtle, his afflictions were alleviated by the converſation of the biſhop. Such an aſcendancy had he over the prince his pupil, that when he came to be king, he retained ſuch a reverence for his piety, that hearing he was dangerouſly ill at Richmond, he went thither to pay his devotions to him, and received his laſt benediction from him on his bended knees.

At St. Eraſmus's chapel, on the eaſt ſide of the door, is a monument erected to the memory of Jane, daughter and coheireſs of Sir John Poultney, and wife to Sir Cleppeſby Crew, knt. who died the ſecond of December, 1639, in the 29th year of her age.

Near this, on the ſame ſide, is a monument erected to the memory of admiral Holmes. He is repreſented in a Roman warlike habit, with his right-hand reſting on a cannon mounted on a carriage. Behind is an anchor, a flag-ſtaff, and other naval decorations. Under which is an inſcription running thus: "To the memory of "Charles Holmes, eſq; rear-admiral of the white. "He died the 21ſt of November 1761, com-"mander in chief of his majeſty's fleet ſtationed "at Jamaica, aged fifty. Erected by his grate-"ful nieces Mary Stanwix, and Lucretia Sowle."

Another monument in the area is well worth obſervation. It is that of Eſther de la Four, the lord Eland's lady, who died in the 28th year of her age, in the year 1694. It is of curious white marble, repreſenting a lady on her death-bed, with two mourners weeping over her, done beautifully in relief. There is an inſcription in Latin and Engliſh, which contains an encomium on her many excellent virtues.

In the area there is a monument erected (between thoſe of Henry III. and queen Eleanor) to the memory of Mrs. Chriſtian Kerr, who died the 16th of May, 1694, aged 40. She was wife to William Kerr, eſq; and daughter to Sir William Scott, bart. both of the kingdom of Scotland.

In the corner of Henry the fifth's chapel, there is a neat monument erected to the memory of Sir Robert Aiton, knt. who, in the reign of king James I. was highly eſteemed for his writings, particularly as a poet. He died in the year 1638. The monument is of black marble, with a buſt of braſs, having the figures of Apollo and Minerva holding a laurel wreath over it, very beautifully deſigned.

Not far from this, in the pavement, is an ancient flat ſtone; formerly inſcribed to the memory of Sir John Galofre, called lord of Langley, natural ſon of Sir John Galofre, by Johannet Pulham. He was famous in the reign of Richard II. for his wiſdom and valour, and was proſecuted by the diſcontented lords; but being then ambaſſador in France, he thought it moſt prudent to remain there till the ſtorm, in which Burley and others ſuffered ſhipwreck, was appeaſed. After which he returned home, and died in the year 1336, at Wallingford, in Berkſhire.

There is a large monument between the chapel of St. Nicholas and the ſteps going to Henry VIIth's chapel, erected to the memory of Sir Thomas Ingram, knt. chancellor of the dutchy of Lancaſter, and privy-counſellor to king Charles the ſecond. It was erected by Frances his widow, daughter of Thomas viſcount Falconberg. He died the 13th of February, in the year 1671.

In this place is an old grave-ſtone plated with braſs, repreſenting John of Windſor, nephew to Sir William of Windſor, lord-lieutenant of Ireland in the reign of Edward the third, who died the 4th of April, 1414. He had been a great ſoldier in his youth, and in many battles had been victorious; particularly at that of Shrewſbury under Henry IV. but being ſtung with remorſe for the innocent blood he had been the means of ſhedding, he retired from the world, and finiſhed his life in penitence.

There

There is a monument between the chapels of St. Nicholas and St. Edmund, erected to the memory of Richard Tufton, third ſon of Sir John Tufton, bart. who died the 4th of October, 1631. It was erected to his memory by his brother Sir Humphrey Tufton, knt.

The remains of many other perſons lie in this area, particularly Anne of Cleve, ſiſter to the duke of Cleve, who was contracted in marriage to king Henry VIII. and received with great pomp on Blackheath, the 3d of January 1539, married to the king on the 9th of the ſame month, and in July following divorced, with liberty to marry again; but being ſenſibly touched with indignation at the affront put upon her, ſhe lived retired in England, with the title of lady Anne, of Cleve, and ſaw her rival that ſupplanted her in the king's affection ſuffer a worſe fate. She died in the year 1557. ſurviving the king only four years.

Near the aſhes of Anne of Cleve lies a ſtill more unfortunate queen, viz. Anne, queen to Richard III. and daughter to Nevil the great earl of Warwick. She was poiſoned by her huſband, to make way for a marriage with Elizabeth, daughter to his brother Edward IV. and ſiſter to the unhappy youths he had cauſed to be murdered in the Tower. This marriage was never conſummated, he being ſlain at the battle of Boſworth-field, where he was ſtripped naked, and expoſed to the multitude as a mark of that contempt his cruelty deſerved.

In this place are the remains of an ancient monument erected to the memory of Sebert, king of the Eaſt-ſaxons, who firſt built this church, and died in July 616. Likewiſe Athelgoda, his queen, who died the 13th of September 615.

Many other people have been interred in this place, whoſe mementos are either obliterated by time, or they are too inſignificant to need recital.

Deſcription of the TOMBS in St. EDWARD'S CHAPEL.

IN the centre of this chapel ſtands that ancient and venerable ſhrine dedicated to St. Edward. It was once of moſt exquiſite beauty, but through time and neglect is now much defaced. It was erected by Henry III. on the canonizing Edward king of England, by pope Alexander the third, who cauſed his name to be placed in the catalogue of ſaints, and iſſued his bull to the abbot Laurence and convent of Weſtminſter, enjoining, "that his body be honoured here on "earth, as his ſoul is glorified in heaven." A cloiſtered life was his ſole happineſs; and though he was married eighteen years to one of the moſt accompliſhed women of her time, daughter to earl Godwin, yet 'tis ſaid ſhe confeſſed on her death-bed he ſuffered her to live and die a virgin. Before this ſhrine was a lamp kept continually burning, on one ſide whereof ſtood an image of the Bleſſed Virgin, wrought in ſilver, which, with two jewels of immenſe value, queen Eleanor preſented here as an offering; and on the other ſide ſtood another image of the Virgin, wrought in ivory, preſented by Thomas Becket, Archbiſhop of Canterbury. To this ſhrine Edward the firſt offered the Scotch regalia, and chair, which is ſtill preſerved. Alphonſo, about the year 1280, offered here the golden coronet of Llewellyn prince of Wales, and other jewels. It is ſaid that Henry IV. being upon his knees before it, was ſeized with an apoplexy, and for ſpeedy relief removed to the abbot's houſe, where coming to himſelf, he could not recollect where he was; but upon enquiring was told the room bore the name of Jeruſalem. To which he replied, "the Lord have mercy upon me then, "for here I muſt die;" having been formerly told by a magician that he ſhould die at Jeruſalem. This ſhrine was originally compoſed of various coloured ſtones, beautifully enriched with all the coſt and art that human imagination could project: ſome of the curious moſaic work that adorned it is ſtill to be ſeen, but ſo ſtripped as to afford little or no ſatisfaction to common beholders. The ſtonework is hollow within, and now encloſes a large cheſt, which Mr. Keep, ſoon after the coronation of James II. found to contain the remains of St. Edward; for being broken by accident, he diſcovered, upon turning up the bones, a crucifix richly ornamented and enamelled, and a gold chain of twenty inches long, both which he preſented to his majeſty, who ordered the bones to be replaced in the old coffin, and encloſed in a new one made very ſtrong. Edward the confeſſor died in 1066, and was canonized in 1269.

The remains of Editha, daughter to Godwin, earl of Kent, and queen to St. Edward, lie interred on the ſouth ſide of this ſhrine. This lady ſurvived her huſband eight years, and beheld all the miſeries conſequent upon his death. William the conqueror, however, treated her with great reſpect, allowing her an apartment in the palace at Wincheſter, where ſhe died. She was buried, by expreſs orders, with all the pomp of royalty.

Not far from this lie the remains of queen Maud, ſurnamed the Good, daughter of Malcolm Conmair, king of Scotland, and wife to Henry I. of England, to whom ſhe was eſpouſed to unite the Saxon and Norman lines. She died the firſt of May, 1118. The greateſt happineſs ſhe enjoyed was in relieving the diſtreſſes of the poor. That ſhe was charitable, the hoſpitals of St. Giles, and the Leper's hoſpital in London, are remaining monuments. There is part of a latin epitaph on this excellent princeſs, the tranſlation of which runs thus:

Succeſs ne'er ſat exulting in her eye,
Nor diſappointment heav'd the troubled ſigh;
Proſperity ne'er ſadden'd o'er her brow,
While glad in trouble ſhe enjoy'd her woe:
Beauty nor made her vain, nor ſcepters proud,
Nor titles taught to ſcorn the meaner croud.
Supreme humility was awful grace,
And her chief charms a baſhfulneſs of face.

There is an ancient tomb of very curious workmanſhip on the north ſide of this chapel. The pannels are of poliſhed porphyry, and the moſaic work round them of gold and ſcarlet.

The

The effigy of Henry III. upon it is of gilt braſs finely executed; and the corners of the table are twiſted pillars gilt and enamelled. After a troubleſome reign of 56 years, he died in 1272, aged 65. He was interred by the knights templars, of whoſe order his father was the founder, with all the ſplendor becoming a royal character.

An ancient table monument of grey marble is at the feet of Henry III. on which lies the effigy of Eleanor, queen to Edward I. It is very ſingular that the body of this queen lies here interred, and her heart in the choir of the friars predicants in London. On the ſides of this monument are engraven the arms of Caſtile and Leon quarterly, and thoſe of Ponthieu hanging on vines and oak-trees. Round the copper verge is emboſſed, in Saxon characters, the following inſcription: "Here lies Eleanor, formerly queen "of England, wife to king Edward the firſt."

In this chapel is a large plain coffin of grey marble, compoſed of ſeven ſtones, four make the ſides, two the ends, and one the cover. It encloſes the body of the glorious king Edward I. who was ſon to Henry III. He was named Edward in honour of St. Edward his father's patron and predeceſſor, and afterwards Long Shanks, from his tall and ſlender body. He reigned 34 years, and died the 7th of July, 1307, aged 68.

Not far from Henry III. is a ſmall monument covered with a ſlab of lydian finely poliſhed, erected to the memory of Elizabeth Tudor, ſecond daughter of king Henry VII. who died at Eltham in Kent, the 14th of September 1495, aged three years.

Another table monument is likewiſe here in memory of Margaret, daughter to Edward IV. by Elizabeth Woodville, his queen, who died the 19th of April, 1472. There is part of an inſcription on it, ſetting forth her name, quality, and age, which was only nine months.

The chapel of Henry V. is parted from this only by an iron ſcreen, on each ſide of which are images as big as the life, and guarding, as it were, the ſtair-caſe aſcending to the chauntry over it. In this place is a magnificent tomb of that glorious and warlike prince Henry of Monmouth, ſo called from the place of his nativity. On the advancement of this prince to the crown, he made a moſt excellent king, and by the memorable battle of Agincourt, acquired to himſelf and the Engliſh nation immortal glory. His ambition leading him on to the purſuit of farther conqueſts, he was taken off by the hand of providence, and died in France in the tenth year of his reign, and thirty-fourth of his age. He was laid at the feet of St. Edward, in a place ſet apart for keeping reliques, where his queen erected a monument over him of grey marble, whereon was placed his ſtatue; the body whereof was heart of oak, and the head beaten ſilver; as were the ſcepter, and other ſigns of royalty that adorned it. All which were deſtroyed at the time of Oliver Cromwell. This tomb was encloſed with grates and gates of iron by Henry VII. and and over it in a chauntry chapel the weapons, armour, and capariſons of Henry V. were carefully laid up, where they remain to this day.

In an old wooden cheſt, near this tomb, lie the remains of Catharine, queen to the above prince. She was youngeſt daughter to Charles VI. of France. After the death of her huſband, ſhe entered into an illegal marriage with Owen ap Tudor, a welſhman, and underwent a ſevere proſecution. In conſequence of which ſhe retired to the monaſtry of Bermondſey, in Southwark, where ſhe died, as it is thought of grief, the ſecond of January 1437, in the thirty-eighth year of her age. She left three ſons by this marriage; Edmund, who was afterwards earl of Richmond; Jaſper, who was created earl of Pembroke by Henry VI. and duke of Bedford by Henry VII. but died without iſſue; and Owen, who took upon him the religious habit, died a monk of, and was interred in, this abbey. Queen Catharine received an honourable interment in the chapel of Henry III. but when her grandſon pulled down that to build his own, her body was taken up, the bones whereof were firmly united, and thinly covered with fleſh, but the coffin being decayed was put into a wooden cheſt, and removed to the place where it now is.

There is an ancient tomb in this chapel erected to the memory of Philippa, third daughter to William, earl of Heinault, and queen to king Edward III. It is of black marble, and round it are placed as ornaments, the brazen ſtatues of no leſs than thirty kings, princes, and noble perſonages, her relations. This queen was married forty-two years, in which time ſhe had fourteen children, and died the 15th of Auguſt 1369.

Near this is a very ancient tomb covered with a gothic canopy, erected to the memory of Edward III. The effigy of this prince lies on a table of grey marble, though his corpſe was depoſited in the ſame grave with the queen's. The tomb was ſurrounded, like the former, with ſtatues, particularly thoſe of his children, and at the head of it is placed the ſhield and ſword carried before him in France. After a reign of fifty years, he died the 21ſt of June, 1377, aged 64. In the latter part of his life he grew weary of government, and devoted himſelf entirely to the pleaſure of a woman, who, after rendering him ridiculous to all the world, ſhamefully deſerted him in his laſt moments, and left him to expire without a friend to cloſe his eyes.

Adjoining to this is another tomb erected to the memory of Richard II. over which is a canopy of wood remarkable for a curious painting of the Virgin Mary and our Saviour. This prince was murdered in Pomfret-caſtle, in Yorkſhire, where he was a priſoner, at the inſtigation of Henry IV. by one Sir Pierce of Exon, on St. Valentine's day, in the year 1399. His body was brought from thence to St. Paul's cathedral, where it was expoſed to public view, and afterwards removed to Langley. In which place it remained till Henry V. ordered it to be brought in all the pomp of royalty, and depoſited near the remains of his great predeceſſor and patron St. Edward. The robing of the effigy is curiouſly wrought with peaſe-cod ſhells open, and the peaſe out, alluding, in all probability, to his being once in full poſſeſſion of ſovereignty, but at laſt reduced to an empty title. In the ſame tomb with this prince lies his queen, Anne, daughter to Charles IV. and ſiſter to Wenceſlaus, emperor and king of Bohemia. This lady brought him neither dowry nor iſſue; and yet, ſo great was his love for her, that he curſed the place of her death, and cauſed the buildings thereon to be deſtroyed. After being married twelve years, ſhe died at Shene the 7th of June, 1394.

Between the tomb of queen Philippa and the ſhrine of St. Edward, under a large ſtone, once beautifully plated with braſs, lies the great Thomas of Woodſtock, duke of Glouceſter, uncle to Richard II. by whom he was murdered the 8th of September, 1397. He was brother to the black prince, and ſixth and youngeſt ſon to Edward III.

In this chapel was interred the heart of Henry d'Almaine, ſon to the king of the Romans, and brother to Henry III. who, in paſſing through Viterbo, in an expedition to the holy land, was ſacrilegiouſly aſſaſſinated in the church of St. Silveſter, as he was performing his devotions before the high altar. The year after the murder, in 1271, his body was brought to England, and buried in the monaſtery of St. Helen's; but his heart was put in a cup, and placed near the ſhrine of S. Edward.

In a handſome wainſcot preſs, in this chapel, is the effigy of Edmund Sheffield, duke of Buckingham, who was the ſecond and laſt duke of this family. He died at Rome in the twentieth year of his age, October 30, 1735, and was buried in Henry VIIth's chapel January 31, 1736.

In the north area is a monument erected to the memory of William Pulteney, earl of Bath, who died the 7th of June, 1764, aged 81. It is of beautiful marble, repreſenting wiſdom and poetry, over which is a medallion.

Having now deſcribed the various monuments in the encloſed part of this building, we ſhall proceed to the TOMBS in the open parts of this ABBEY, beginning at the weſt door.

ON the right hand as you enter is the monument of

Sir THO. HARDY, Knt.

Behind this monument is a lofty pyramid, of a bluiſh coloured marble, at the bottom of which is the effigy of the deceaſed reclining upon a tomb of elegant workmanſhip, with a naked boy on his left ſide weeping over an urn: the enrichments round the pedeſtal are juſt and proper, and the inſcription is to the following purport:

" Sir Thomas Hardy, to whoſe memory this " monument is erected, was bred in the royal " navy from his youth, and was made a captain " in 1693. In the expedition to Cadiz, under " Sir George Rooke, he commanded the Pembroke; and when the fleet left the coaſt of " Spain, to return to England, he was ordered " to Lagos bay, where he got intelligence of the " Spaniſh galeons being arrived in the harbour " of Vigo, under convoy of ſeventeen French " men of war. By his great diligence and judgment he joined the Engliſh fleet, and gave the " admiral that intelligence which engaged him " to make the beſt of his way to Vigo, where " all the aforementioned galeons and men of " war were either taken or deſtroyed. After the " ſucceſs of that action, the admiral ſent him " with an account of it to the queen, who ordered him a conſiderable preſent, and knighted " him. Some years after he was made a rear-" admiral, and received ſeveral other marks of " favour and eſteem from her majeſty, and from " her royal conſort prince George of Denmark, " lord high-admiral of England." He died the 16th of Auguſt, 1733, aged 66.

From this monument we proceed regularly on to the eaſt door, from thence round the choir to the north door, and return to the place where we firſt began. To effect which the next is

Capt. JAMES CORNWALL.

This is a moſt beautiful monument, the height of which is thirty-ſix feet: it has a bold baſe and pyramid of rich Sicilian marble. There is a rock againſt the pyramid, embelliſhed with naval trophies, ſea-weeds, &c. in which are two cavities: in the one a latin epitaph; in the other, a view of the ſea-fight before Toulon, in baſſo relievo; on the fore-ground whereof, the Marlborough of 90 guns, is ſeen fiercely engaged with admiral Navarro's ſhip the Real, of 114 guns, and her two ſeconds, all raking the Marlborough fore and aft. On the rock ſtand two figures, the one repreſents Britannia under the character of Minerva, accompanied with a lion; the other figure is expreſſive of Fame, who having preſented to Minerva a medallion of the hero, ſupports it, whilſt exhibited to public view. The medallion is accompanied with a globe, and various honorary crowns, as due to valour. Behind the figures is a lofty ſpreading palm-tree, whereon is fixed the hero's ſhield or coat of arms, together with a laurel-tree; both which iſſue from the naturally-barren rock, as alluding to ſome heroic and uncommon event. The inſcription is as follows:

Amongſt the monuments of ancient merit,
In this ſacred cathedral, let the name of

JAMES CORNWALL

Be preſerved, the third ſon of Henry Cornwall,
Of Bradwardin Caſtle, in the county of Hereford, Eſq;
Who from the very old and illuſtrious ſtock of the Plantagenets,
Deſiring a truly ancient ſpirit, became
A naval commander of the firſt eminence,
Equally and deſervedly honoured by the tears and Applauſe of Britons, as a man
Who bravely defending the cauſe of his country in that ſea-fight off Toulon;
And being by a chain-ſhot deprived
Of both his legs at a blow, fell unconquered
On the 27th of Feb. 1743, in the 45th year of his age, Bequeathing his animated example to his fellow ſailors,
As a legacy of a dying Engliſhman,
Whoſe extraordinary valour could not be recommended
To the emulation of poſterity in a more ample eulogy
Than by ſo ſingular an inſtance of honour;
Since the parliament of Great Britain, by an unanimous ſuffrage,
Reſolv'd that a monument at the public expence ſhould be conſecrated to the memory of this moſt heroic perſon.

The

The Right Hon. JAMES CRAGGS, Eſq;

On this monument is finely repreſented the ſtatue of this gentleman, large as the life, leaning on an urn, which has upon it in golden characters, an inſcription, implying, that he was a man univerſally beloved; which is there particularly marked, becauſe as he was of low extraction, being only a ſhoe-maker's ſon, it is the more ſingular, that in the high ſtation to which his merit had raiſed him, he ſhould eſcape envy, and acquire the general eſteem. He was made ſecretary at war in April 1717, and one of his majeſty's privy-council and ſecretary of ſtate in March 1718. On the baſe of the monument is the following epitaph, written by Mr. Pope:

Stateſman, yet friend to truth, of ſoul ſincere,
In action faithful, and in honour clear!
Who broke no promiſe, ſerv'd no private end;
Who gain'd no title, and who loſt no friend;
Ennobled by himſelf, by all approv'd,
Prais'd, wept, and honour'd by the muſe he lov'd.

WILLIAM CONGREVE, Eſq;

On a pedeſtal of the fineſt egyptian marble, in an oval frame, is a half length marble portrait of this gentleman: it is enriched with emblematical figures alluding to the drama, and under it is the following inſcription:

"Mr. William Congreve died January the "19th 1728, aged 56, and was buried near this "place. To whoſe moſt valuable memory this "monument is ſet up by Henrietta, dutcheſs of "Marlborough, as a mark how dearly ſhe re-"members the happineſs ſhe enjoyed in the ſin-"cere friendſhip of ſo worthy and honeſt a man, "whoſe virtue, candour, and wit, gained him the "love and eſteem of the preſent age; and whoſe "writings will be the admiration of the fu-"ture."

JOHN FREIND, M. D.

This gentleman was a phyſician of the firſt rank in his profeſſion; nor was he leſs ſucceſsful in his practice than ingenious in his writings. His buſt ſtands on a pedeſtal of fine white-veined marble, and under it a long latin inſcription, ſetting forth his great and diſtinguiſhing acquirements. He died the 26th of July 1728.

Sir LUMLEY ROBINSON, Bart.

The deſign of this monument is neat; the columns are ſupported by deaths heads, and the arms upon the baſe by a cherub. On the top is a vaſe, and riſing to the pediment, enrichments of laurel branches, &c. He was of Kentwell-hall in Suffolk, and by an untimely death ended his life the 6th of Auguſt 1684, aged 36.

THOMAS SPRATT, D. D.

Underneath this monument is the arms of the defunct, and on the top his arms, with that of the ſee of Rocheſter, quarterly; between enrichments of books, &c. It ſeems to have been principally deſigned for the ſake of the inſcriptions; the firſt of which informs us, that Dr. Spratt was the ſon of a clergyman in Dorſetſhire; that he was educated at Wadham college, Oxford; that he firſt applied himſelf to poetry, but quitted that ſtudy to purſue the beauties of proſe, and poliſh the Engliſh language; that he was ſoon made known to George duke of Buckingham, and by him recommended to king Charles, who made him a prebendary of Weſtminſter, and of Windſor; from which preferments he ſoon roſe to be dean of Weſtminſter, and biſhop of Rocheſter; but at length for his firm integrity to the church and monarchy, was brought in danger of his life, he died in 1713, aged 77. The ſecond inſcription ſignifies, that the remains of Thomas Spratt, A. M. (ſon to the biſhop) archdeacon of Rocheſter, and prebendary of the churches of Rocheſter, Winchelter, and Weſtminſter, lie near thoſe of his father. He died the 10th of May 1720, aged 41. The laſt inſcription tells us that John Freind, M. D. to ſhew his reſpect for thoſe two worthy perſonages, had cauſed this monument to be erected jointly to their memories.

Dr. JOSEPH WILCOCKS.

This gentleman was formerly chaplain to the Britiſh factory at Liſbon, afterwards made preceptor to the princeſſes, and prebendary of this church. In 1721 he was conſecrated lord biſhop of Glouceſter; in 1731 tranſlated to Rocheſter, and alſo made dean of this church, and of the moſt hon. order of the Bath. He died the 9th of March 1756, aged 84, and is buried in a vault in the eccleſiaſtical court, with his wife Jane, daughter of John Milner, Eſq; conſul at Liſbon. She died the 27th of March 1725, aged 28. In the ſame vault lies Ann, their daughter, who died in her infancy.

HENRY WHARTON.

It is remarkable only for the great name inſcribed on it. He was rector of Chatham in Kent, vicar of the church of Minſter, in the iſle of Thanet, chaplain to archbiſhop Sancroft, and one of the greateſt writers of his time. He was ſo univerſally reſpected by the biſhops and clergy, that archbiſhop Tillotſon, and ſeveral other prelates, with the choir and king's ſcholars, attended his funeral in the moſt ſolemn proceſſion, ſinging anthems compoſed for the occaſion. He died the 3d of March 1624, aged 31.

KATHERINE BOVEY.

This monument was erected to the memory of the above lady, by Mrs. Mary Pope, who lived with her in the greateſt friendſhip near forty years. The principle figures are Faith with her book cloſed, and Wiſdom lamenting the death of her patroneſs patroneſs, between which is a lady's head in an anulet of black marble curiouſly veined. Over it is an inſcription, deſcribing the virtues of the deceaſed, who died the 21ſt of January, 1726, aged 72.

Over this monument is that of

Lord Viſcount HOWE,

The principal figure repreſents the genius of the province of Maſſachuſet's bay, in a mournful poſture, lamenting the fall of this hero; over which are the family arms ornamented with military trophies. In large characters underneath is the following inſcription: "The province of "Maſſachuſet's bay in New England, by an or- "der of the great and general court, bearing "date Feb. 1, 1752, cauſed this monument to "be erected to the memory of George lord viſ- "count Howe, brigadier general of his majeſty's "forces in North America, who was ſlain July "the 6th, 1758, on his march to Ticonderago, "in the 34th year of his age: in teſtimony of "the ſenſe they had of his ſervices and military "virtues, and of the affection their officers and "ſoldiers bore to his command. He lived re- "ſpected and beloved: the public regretted his "loſs; to his family it is irreparable."

ROBERT CANNON, D.D.

This monument, though plain, is yet very neat. It was erected to the memory of the above gentleman, who was dean of Lincoln, and prebendary of this church. He died the 28th of March, 1722, in the 59th year of his age.

Gen. GEORGE WADE,

In the center is a beautiful marble pillar, enriched with military trophies exquiſitely wrought: the principal figures repreſent Fame puſhing back Time, who is eagerly approaching to pull down the pillar with the enſigns of honour that adorn it. The general's head is in medallion, under which is the following inſcription:

"To the memory of George Wade, field- "marſhal of his majeſty's forces, lieutenant-ge- "neral of the ordnance, colonel of his majeſty's "third regiment of dragoon guards, governor "of Fort William, Fort Auguſtus, and Fort "George, and one of his majeſty's moſt honour- "able privy council. He died March 14, 1748, "aged 75."

Col. JOHN DAVIS.

We can ſay no more of this gentleman than what ariſes from the inſcription; which is, that he was preſident of the council of the iſland of St. Chriſtopher's, and died the 13th of December 1725, in the ſixty-third year of his age.

CAROLINA HARSNET.

This monument was erected to the memory of the ſecond wife of Samuel Morland, knt. and bart. who died in child-bed of her ſecond ſon the 10th of October, 1674, aged 23. On the tomb are two learned inſcriptions; one in hebrew, the other in greek: the tranſlation of the hebrew runs thus: "Bleſſed be the Lord, my wife was "precious: bleſſed be thy remembrance, O vir- "tuous woman."—The greek thus: "When I "think of thy mildneſs, patience, charity, mo- "deſty and piety, I lament thee, O moſt excel- "lent creature, and grieve exceedingly: but "not like ſuch as have no faith; for I belive and "expect the reſurrection of thoſe who ſleep in "Chriſt."

JOHN SMITH, Eſq;

This monument is ſaid to be highly finiſhed. The deſign is a pyramid and altar, in which ſits a lady veiled, mournful and diſconſolate, and reſting her right arm on a curious buſto in relief. On the baſe is a latin inſcription, ſetting forth his deſcent from the Smiths of Lincolnſhire; and likewiſe his iſſue, which were two daughters, Ann, the eldeſt, firſt marrried to Sir Henry Parker of Warwickſhire, and afterwards to Michael lord Dunkellin, eldeſt ſon to the earl of Clanrickard; and Mary, the youngeſt, married to Edward Deſboverie, of Lanford, in Wilts, bart. The above John Smith died the 6th of July 1718.

ANN FIELDING.

This tomb was erected to the memory of the firſt wife of Samuel Morland, knt. and bart. who ſeems to have been a man of great learning; particularly in the eaſtern languages. On it are two inſcriptions; the one in hebrew, the other in ethiopic, the tranſlation of the firſt runs thus:

"O thou faireſt among women! O virtuous "woman! The hand of the Lord hath done "this. The Lord gave, and the Lord hath "taken away, and bleſſed be the name of the "Lord."

The Ethiopic thus:

"Come let us lament o'er this monument of a "beloved huſband for thee; but in certain hope "that thou art united with Chriſt.

"This lady was truly religious, virtuous, faith- "ful, mild as a dove, and chaſte: while ſhe con- "tinued in life, ſhe was honoured; and is happy, "through mercy, in death."

Under the Ethiopic is the following:

"Ann, daughter to George Fielding, Eſq; "and of Mary his wife, the truly loving (and "as truly beloved) wife of Samuel Morland, "knt. and bart. died Feb. 20, Anno Dom. "1679-80."

Over this is a monument erected to the memory of

JAMES FLEMING,

Major-general of his majeſty's forces, and colonel of a regiment of foot, who, having ſerved as a commiſſioned officer 44 years, died the 17th of March, 1750, in the ſixty-eighth year of his age.

DIANA

DIANA TEMPLE.

This monument by its antiquity, ſeems to have been originally intended for the whole family of Sir William Temple, as appears by the inſcription, which tells us, that Diana Temple died at the age of fourteen. Dorothy Oſbourn, (in all probability Sir William's lady) aged 66; William Temple, aged ſeventy; and Martha Gifford, Sir William's ſiſter, aged 84.

Sir CH. HARBORD, and CLEM. COTTREL, Eſq;

Theſe two young gentlemen of the moſt promiſing expectations, both periſhed in the Royal James, with the earl of Sandwich, who commanded in her as vice-admiral againſt the Dutch in that memorable fight off the coaſt of Suſſex, in the time of king Charles II. The Royal James being ſet on fire, Sir Charles Harbord, firſt lieutenant, though he might have ſaved himſelf by ſwimming, yet, out of pure affection to his worthy commander, choſe to die with him. Young Cottrel was a volunteer, and having returned to his ſhip unwounded, from being the firſt man that had boarded a Dutchman of ſeventy guns, and pulled down her enſign with his own hands, periſhed alſo with his friends. This gentleman, though but twenty-two years of age, underſtood ſeven languages. On the baſe of the monument is repreſented in relief a dreadful ſea fight, and on the top, in a wreath of laurel, is this inſcription: "preſerve and unite the memory "of two faithful friends, who loſt their lives at "ſea together, May the 28th 1672."

SIDNEY, Earl GODOLPHIN.

This is a fine buſt, repreſenting the above gentleman, who died the 15th of September, 1712, aged 67. In the year 1661, he was member of parliament, and groom of the bedchamber to king Charles II. In 1679 he was made commiſſioner of the treaſury. In 1684, ſecretary of ſtate, and the ſame year created baron of Rialton, in Cornwall, by king James II. by whom alſo he was made firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, and ſoon after lord high treaſurer; which office, according to the inſcription, together with that of chief miniſter, he held during the firſt nine years of the reign of queen Anne.

Over theſe, againſt the wall, is a flat marble monument erected to the memory of

WILLIAM HARGRAVE, Eſq;

Lieutenant general of his majeſty's forces, colonel of the royal Engliſh fuzileers, and governor of Gibraltar; who having been a commiſſioned officer 57 years, died January 21, 1748, aged ſeventy-nine.

Col. ROGER TOWNSEND.

On the front of a ſarcophagus, ſupported by two Indians, is repreſented, in baſſo relievo, the fall of this brave commander, with his officers attending him in his expiring moments. The monument is adorned with military trophies, and under it is the following inſcription:

"This monument was erected by a diſconſo-
"late parent, the lady viſcounteſs Townſend,
"to the memory of her fifth ſon, the honourable
"lieutenant colonel Roger Townſend, who was "killed by a cannon ball, on the 25th of July,
"1759, in the 28th year of his age, as he was
"reconnoitring the French lines at Ticonderago,
"in North America. From the parent, the bro"ther and the friend, his ſocial and amiable
"manners, his enterprizing bravery, and the in"tegrity of his heart, may claim the tribute
"of affliction. Yet, ſtranger, weep not, for "though premature his death, his life was glo-
"rious: enrolling him with the names of thoſe
"immortal ſtateſmen and commanders, whoſe
"wiſdom and intrepidity in the courſe of this
"comprehenſive and ſucceſsful war, have ex"tended the commerce, enlarged the dominion,
"and upheld the majeſty of theſe kingdoms, be"yond the idea of any former age."

Over this monument, againſt the pillar is that of

Mrs. BRIDGET RADLEY.

It is ſmall, but very neat, and was erected to her memory by her huſband Charles Radley, eſq; gentleman uſher daily waiter to king James II. She died the 20th of November 1679.

Major RICHARD CREED.

This is a table monument againſt the wall, enriched with military trophies; and on it is the following inſcription:

"To the memory of the honoured major
"Richard Creed, who attended his majeſty king
"William III. in all his wars, every where ſig-
"nalizing himſelf, and never more himſelf, than "when he looked an enemy in the face. At the "glorious battle of Blenheim, Ann. Dom. 1704,
"he commanded thoſe ſquadrons that began the "attack; in two ſeveral charges he remained
"unhurt; but in a third, after many wounds re"ceived, ſtill valiantly fighting, he was ſhot
"through the head: his dead body was brought "off by his brother, at the hazard of his own "life, and buried there. To his memory his
"ſorrowful mother erects this monument, plac-
"ing it near another, which her ſon, when living,
"uſed to look upon with pleaſure, for the worthy
"mention it makes of that great man Edward,
"earl of Sandwich, to whom he had the honour
"to be related and whoſe heroic virtues he was "ambitious to imitate. He was the eldeſt ſon
"of John Creed of Oundel, eſq; and Elizabeth
"his wife, only daughter of Sir Gilbert Picker-
"ing, bart. of Tichmarſh, in Northampton-
"ſhire."

Sir PALMES FAIRBORNE.

This monument, which is very beautiful, is fixed between two ſtately pyramids of black marble ſtanding on cannon balls, adorned in the middle with emblematical devices in relief, and having two Mooriſh emperors heads in profile on their tops. The enrichments on the pyramids repreſent the manner of his glorious death. On one ſide he is viewing the enemy's lines before the town, and is ſhot: on the other is a hearſe and ſix horſes bringing him off wounded to the caſtle. On a lofty dome is the deceaſed's arms, with this motto underneath: tutus ſi fortis; and over it a Turk's head on a dagger, by way of creſt, which he won by his valour in fighting againſt that people in the German war. On the monument is the following inſcription:

" Sacred to the immortal memory of Sir " Palmes Fairborne, knt. governor of Tangier, " in execution of which command he was mor- " tally wounded by a ſhot from the Moors then " beſieging the town, in the 46th year of his " age, October 24, 1680."

His epitaph, which was written, by Mr. Dryden, runs thus.

Ye ſacred reliques which your marble keep,
Here, undiſturb'd by wars in quiet ſleep:
Diſcharge the truſt, which, (when it was below)
Fairborne's undaunted ſoul did undergo,
And be the town's palladium from the foe.
Alive and dead theſe walls he will defend:
Great actions, great examples muſt attend.
The Candian ſiege his early valour knew,
where turkiſh blood did his young hands imbrue;
From thence returning with deſerv'd applauſe,
Againſt the Moors his well-fleſh'd ſword he draws,
The ſame the courage and the ſame the cauſe.
His youth and age, his life and death combine,
As in ſome great and regular deſign,
All of a piece throughout, and all divine.
Still nearer heaven his virtues ſhone more bright,
Like riſing flames expanding in their height,
The martyr's glory crown'd the ſoldier's fight.
More bravely Britiſh gen'ral never fell,
Nor gen'ral's death was e'er reveng'd ſo well,
Which his pleas'd eyes beheld before their cloſe,
Follow'd by thouſand victims of his foes.
To his lamented loſs, for times to come,
His pious widow conſecrates this tomb.

Over the monuments of major Richard Creed and Sir Palmes Fairborne, is one erected to the memory of Sir JOHN CHARDIN, Bart.

It is emblematical, and alludes to the travels of this gentleman, by which, as his motto expreſſes, he acquired his fame. The globe, round which a number of geographical inſtruments are repreſented, exhibits a view of the different countries through which he travelled, and the motto beneath refers to the dangers he providentially eſcaped, for which he aſcribes to God the glory. He was created baronet May the 28th, 1720.

Captain WILLIAM JULIUS.

There is not any thing remarkable in this monument; nor have we any other information of this gentleman, than that he was captain of the Colcheſter man of war, and that he died October the 3d. 1608, aged 33.

GEORGE CHURCHILL.

This is a ſtately and elegant monument. The inſcription on it informs us that this great man was ſecond ſon to Sir Winſton Churchill, of Dorſetſhire, knt. and brother to John duke of Marlborough. He was early trained to military affairs, and ſerved with great honour at ſea and land under king Charles II. king James II. king William, and queen Anne. He was captain of the Engliſh fleet at the burning the French at La Hogue, in king William's reign; and for his bravery there was made one of the commiſſioners of the admiralty. In the ſucceeding reign he was made admiral in chief, and was for 20 years together of the bedchamber to the prince of Denmark. He died the 8th of May 1710, in the 58th year of his age.

Sir RICHARD BINGHAM.

Againſt the wall, on a plain marble ſtone, is an inſcription deſcribing the military glories of the above gentleman, who was of the ancient family of the Binghams, of Bingham Melcomb, in Dorſetſhire; and ſerved in the reign of queen Mary, at St. Quintin; in the reign of queen Elizabeth, at Leith, in Scotland; in the iſle of Candy, under the Venetians; at Cabo Chaio, and the famous battle of Lepanto againſt the Turks; in the civil wars of France in the Netherlands, and at Smerwick, where the Romans and Iriſh were vanquiſhed. After this he was made governor of Connaught, where he overthrew the Iriſh and Scots, expelled the traiterous Orourke, ſuppreſſed divers rebellions, and was finally made marſhal of Ireland, and governor of Leinſter. He died at Dublin January 19, 1598, aged 70; from whence he was brought, and here interred by Sir John Bingley, ſome time his ſervant.

GEORGE STEPNEY, Eſq;

This gentleman was deſcended from the Stepneys of Pendergraft, in Pembrokeſhire, but born at Weſtminſter in 1663, and entered of Trinity-college, Cambridge, in 1682. In 1692 he was ſent envoy to the elector of Brandenburgh; in 1696 and 1697, to the electors of Mentz, Triers, Cologne, Palatine, Landgrave of Heſſe, and to the congreſs of Frankfort: in 1697, on his return, he was made commiſſioner of trade; in 1698, was ſent a ſecond time envoy to the elector of Brandenburgh; in 1699, in the ſame quality to the king of Poland; in 1701, a ſecond time to the emperor of Germany; and laſtly, in 1706, to the ſtates general. All theſe ſeveral embaſſies he conducted with ſuch integrity, application, and eaſe, that he generally exceeded the expectations of his ſovereigns, William and Anne, by whom he was employed. He died greatly lamented at Chelſea, in the year 1706.

to

THOMAS KNIPE. S. T. P.

In memory of the above gentleman, this monument was erected by Alice his ſecond wife. He was for fifty years employed in Weſtminſter-ſchool, ſixteen whereof as head maſter. He was likewiſe a prebendary of this cathedral. The latin inſcription, which is long, only deſcribes his many great virtues, and that he died the 8th of Auguſt 1711, aged 73.

Above theſe two laſt, is a monument erected to the memory of

JOHN METHUEN, Eſq;

Who died in the ſervice of his country in Portugal, July 13, 1706, and was here interred September 17, 1708. Alſo the right honourable Sir Paul Methuen, of Biſhops-Caning in Wilts, ſon of the ſaid John Methuen, eſq; one of his majeſty's moſt honourable privy-council, and knight of the moſt honourable order of the Bath, who died the 11th of April 1757, aged 86.

Sir CLOUDESLEY SHOVEL, knt.

On the baſe of this monument is repreſented in bas relief the ſhip Aſſociation, in which the admiral ſailed, as ſtriking againſt a rock, with ſeveral others periſhing at the ſame time; and at the top are two boys blowing trumpets. This great man received the honour of knighthood the 16th of May 1689. The inſcription on the monument runs thus: "Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, knt. rear-"admiral of Great Britain; and admiral and "commander in chief of the fleet, the juſt re-"ward of his long and faithful ſervices. He was "deſervedly beloved of his country, and eſteem-"ed, though dreaded, by the enemy who had "often experienced his conduct and courage.— "Being ſhipwrecked on the rocks of Scilly, in "his voyage from Thoulon the 22d of October "1707, at night, in the 57th year of his age, "his fate was lamented by all, but eſpecially by "the ſea-faring part of the nation; to whom he "was a generous patron, and a worthy example. "—His body was flung on the ſhore, and buried "with others in the ſand; but being ſoon after "taken up, was placed under this monument, "which his royal miſtreſs had cauſed to be erect-"ed to commemorate his ſteady loyalty, and "extraordinary virtues."

ANN WEMYS.

Adjoining to the wall is a ſmall oval tablet, with the following inſcription: "Near theſe ſteps "lies the body of Mrs. Ann Wemys, daughter "of Dr. Locowick Wemys, ſometime preben-"dary of this cathedral, and of Mrs. Jane Bar-"grave his wife, who departed this life, Decem-"ber the 19th 1698, in the ſixty-ſeventh year of "her age."

SOPHIA FAIRHOLM.

This monument repreſents an ancient ſepulchre, over which is raiſed a ſtately edifice ornamented at top with the family arms. She was marchioneſs of Anandale, born in Scotland, and was mother to the marquis of Anandale, who, as a mark of his duty and gratitude, cauſed this monument to be erected to her memory. She died the 13th of December 1716, aged 49.

Againſt the pillars on this ſpot, are two table monuments, the one erected to the memory of

According to the inſcription this gentleman was remarkable for learning, ſedateneſs and piety; an indefatigable preacher, and a ſmooth and florid orator. He was born at Wittenberg in Zealand, but educated at Queen's college, Oxford; was king's divinity-profeſſor and chaplain, a prebendary to this church, and preacher at the Savoy. He died of the ſtone January the 31, 1696, aged fifty-ſix.

The other monument is erected to the memory of

Dr. SAMUEL BARTON.

By the inſcription he appears to have been a prebendary of this church, and a perſon of admirable genius and learning. He died September 1715, aged 62.

WILLIAM CAMDEN.

On this monument the above gentleman is repreſented in a half-length in the habit of his time, with his left hand holding a book, and in his right his gloves, reſting on an altar, on the body of which is a latin inſcription, ſetting forth his indefatigable induſtry in illuſtrating the Britiſh antiquities, and his candour, ſincerity, and pleaſant good humour in private life. He was ſon to Sampſon Camden, Citizen of London, and painter-ſtainer, was born in the Old Baily, May 2, 1551, and received the firſt rudiments of his education at Chriſt-church hoſpital. In 1566 he entered himſelf of Magdalen college, Oxford, but afterwards removed to Pembroke, where he became acquainted with Dr. Goodman, dean of Weſtminſter, by whoſe recommendation, in 1575, he was made ſecond maſter of the abbey-ſchool, and began the laborious work of his antiquities, encouraged thereto and aſſiſted by his patron. In 1588 he was made prebend of Ilfracombe, in the church of Sarum, which he held till his death. In 1593 he was made head maſter of Weſtminſter ſchool. In 1596, Richmond Herald, and next day Clarencieux king at arms. In 1619 he founded his his hiſtory lecture in Oxford. In Auguſt 1622, he fell from his chair at his houſe in Chiſſelhurſt in Kent, and hurt himſelf in ſuch a manner, that he lingered till the 9th of November 1623, and then died, aged 74.

The above monument has lately been repaired and beautified at the charge and expence of the univerſity of Oxford.

ISAAC

ISAAC CASAUBON.

Though this gentleman was a native of France, and in his younger years royal library-keeper at Paris, yet he was ſo diſſatisfied with the ceremonial part of the Romiſh worſhip, that upon the murder of his great patron Henry IV. he willingly quitted his native country, and at the earneſt entreaty of king James I. ſettled in England; where, for his uncommon knowledge, he became the admiration of men of learning. He died in 1614, aged 55.

This ſmall but neat monument was erected to his memory by the learned Dr. Moreton, biſhop of Durham.

JOHN ERNEST GRABE.

Robert Harley, earl of Oxford and Mortimer, erected this monument to the memory of the above gentleman, who died the 3d of November 1711, aged 46, and was buried at Pancraſs, near London. He is repreſented by a curious figure, large as the life, ſitting upon a marble tomb in a thoughtful poſture, as contemplating the ſorrows of death, and the horrors of the grave. He was remarkably well ſkilled in the oriental languages.

Sir RICHARD COX.

This gentleman was taſter to queen Elizabeth and king James I. to the latter of which he was ſteward of the houſhold. His epitaph commends him in a high degree for his religion, humanity, chaſtity, temperance, friendſhip, beneficence, charity, vigilance and ſelf-denial. He was third ſon to Thomas Cox, of Beymonds in Hertfordſhire, and died a batchelor the 13th of December 1623, in the 60th year of his age.

THOMAS TRIPLET.

Was educated at Chriſt-church in the univerſity of Oxford, where he was eſteemed a wit, a good grecian, and a poet. In 1645 he was made prebend of Preſton in the church of Sarum, and had alſo a living, which being ſequeſtered in the rebellion, he fled to Ireland and kept a ſchool in Dublin, where he was when king Charles I was beheaded. Diſliking Ireland, he returned to England, and kept ſchool at Hayes in Middleſex, till the reſtoration, when he was made prebend of Weſtminſter, and of Fenton, in the church of York. He died at a good old age the 18th of July 1670.

ISAAC BARROW.

On the top of this monument is a remarkable fine buſt repreſenting this truly great man, who, as the inſcription informs us, was chaplain to king Charles II. head of Trinity college, Cambridge, geometry profeſſor of Greſham college, in London, and of greek and mathematicks at Cambridge. He was a great divine, and in his youth travelled through moſt parts of Europe. He died the 4th of May 1677, in the 47th year of his age.

Over this is a handſome monument erected to the memory of

EDW. WETTENHALL, M.D.

This gentleman was, perhaps, one of the moſt eminent phyſicians of his time; he was ſon to biſhop Wettenhall, and died the 29th of Auguſt 1733. His father was Dr. Edward Wettenhall, who was firſt advanced to the ſee of Cork in Ireland, which he filled with great dignity for twenty years; but was afterwards tranſlated to Killmore and Roſs, which he held fourteen years. He died in the ſeventy-eighth year of his age, November 12, 1713.

WILLIAM OUTRAM.

The inſcription on this monument is in latin, the tranſlation of which runs thus: "Near this "place lies William Outram, D. D. born in "Derbyſhire, fellow of Trinity and Chriſt-church "colleges in Cambridge, cannon of this abbey, "and archdeacon of Leiceſter; an accompliſhed "divine, a nervous and accurate writer, an ex-"cellent and diligent preacher, firſt in Lincoln-"ſhire, afterwards at London, and laſtly at St. "Margaret's Weſtminſter; where he finiſhed his "life with great applauſe, and no leſs ſucceſs; "but in the courſe of ſo much labour and in-"tenſeneſs of mind, being inflamed with the "ſtudy of ſcripture and the holy fathers, he "grew much diſtempered with the gravel, with "which, being long afflicted, and at length "worn out, he ended his life with the utmoſt "compoſure of mind Auguſt 22, 1678 aged 54."

On the pedeſtal is another inſcription, which tells us, that, "after a long and religious life, and 42 "years widowhood, here reſts Jane, wife of Dr. "Outram, who died October 4, 1721."

Above this is a monument erected to the memory of that eminent divine and philoſopher.

Dr. STEPHEN HALES.

Here are two beautiful figures in relief; the one repreſenting Botany, the other, Religion. The firſt is preſenting a medallion of this great explorer to public view; the latter is deploring the loſs of the divine: at the feet of Botany the winds are diſplayed on a globe, which alludes to his invention of the ventilators. The inſcription which is in latin, is as follows:

"To the memory of Stephen Hales, doctor "in divinity, Auguſta, the mother of that beſt "of kings, George the third, has placed this "monument; who choſe him when living, to "officiate as her chaplain; and after he died, "which was on the 4th of January 1761, in "the 84th year of his age, honoured him with "this marble."

About the tomb of Hales whoſe fair deſign
And poliſh great Auguſta caus'd to ſhine, Religion,

Religion, hoary faith, and virtue wait,
And ſhed perpetual tears in mournful ſtate.
But o'er the preacher, render'd to his clay,
The voice of wiſdom ſtill as this to ſay:
" He was a man to hear affliction's cry,
" And trace his maker's works with curious eye:
" O Hales! thy praiſes not the lateſt age,
" Shall e'er diminiſh, or ſhall blot thy page,
" England, ſo proud of Newton, ſhall agree,
" She has a ſon of equal rank in thee."

GEORGE FREDERICK HANDELL.

The whole of this figure is well executed, and the face is a ſtrong likeneſs of its original. The left arm is reſting on a groupe of muſical inſtruments, and the attitude is very expreſſive of great attention to the harmony of an angel playing on a harp in the clouds over his head. Before it lies the celebrated Meſſiah, with that part open, where is the much admired air, I know that my Redeemer liveth. Underneath is the following ſhort inſcription: " George Frederick Handell, eſq; born " February 23, 1684, died April 14, 1729." This is the laſt monument which that eminent ſtatuary Rubiliac lived to finiſh. 'Tis ſaid he firſt became conſpicuous, and afterwards finiſhed the exerciſe of his art with a figure of this extraordinary man; the firſt of which was erected in the gardens at Vauxhall.

Sir EDWARD ATKINS.

This gentleman was one of the barons of the exchequer in the reigns of king Charles I. and II. He was of ſuch integrity, that he reſiſted many honours that were offered him by the chiefs of the grand rebellion. He died in the year 1669, aged eighty-two.

Sir Robert Atkins, his eldeſt ſon, was created knight of the bath at the coronation of king Charles II. afterwards lord chief baron of the exchequer under king William, and ſpeaker of the houſe of lords in ſeveral parliaments. He died in 1709, aged 88.

Sir Edward Atkins, his youngeſt ſon, was likewiſe baron of the exchequer, but retired, upon the revolution, from public buſineſs, to his ſeat in Norfolk, where he died in the year 1698, aged ſixty-eight.

Sir Robert Atkins, eldeſt ſon of the above Sir Robert, was a gentleman well verſed in polite literature, and in the antiquities of this country. He died in 1711, aged 65.

Edward Atkins, eſq; late of Kitteringham in Norfolk, ſecond ſon of the laſt named Sir Edward, cauſed this monument to be erected in memory of his anceſtors, who ſo honourably preſided in the courts of juſtice in Weſtminſter-hall. He died the 20th of January 1750, in the 79th year of his age.

Over this is a flat white marble monument erected to the memory of

MARY HOPE,

Daughter of Eliab Breton, of Forty-hall, Middleſex, and was married to John Hope, of London, merchant. She died at Brockhall, in the county of Northampton, the 25th of June 1767, aged 25. Under which is the following epitaph:

Though low in earth her beauteous form decay'd,
My faithful wife, my lov'd Maria's laid;
In ſad remembrance the afflicted raiſe,
No pompous tomb, inſcrib'd with venal praiſe;
To ſtateſmen, warriors, and to kings belong,
The trophied ſculpture, and the poet's ſong;
And theſe the proud, expiring, often claim;
Their wealth bequeathing, to record their name;
But humble virtue, ſtealing to the duſt,
Heeds not our lays, or monumental buſt.
To name her virtues ill befits my grief,
What was my bliſs can now give no relief;
A huſband mourns, the reſt let friendſhip tell;
Fame ſpread her worth, a huſband knew it well.

JOHN Duke of ARGYLE and GREENWICH.

This is a moſt beautiful and ſtately monument, encloſed with rails. The figure of Minerva is on one ſide the baſe, and that of Eloquence on the other; the one looking ſorrowfully up at the principal figure above, the other pathetically diſplaying the public loſs at his death. On the top is the figure of Hiſtory, with one hand holding a book, the other writing on a pyramid of finely coloured marble the titles of the hero, whoſe actions are ſuppoſed to be contained in the book; on the cover of which, in letters of gold, are inſcribed the date of his grace's death, and age. On the pyramid is the following epitaph:

Briton, behold! if patriot worth be dear,
A ſhrine that claims thy tributary tear;
Silent that tongue, admiring ſenates heard,
Nerveleſs that arm oppoſing legions fear'd.
Nor leſs, O Campbell, thine the power to pleaſe,
And give to grandeur all the grace of eaſe.
Long from thy life, let kindred heroes trace,
Arts which ennoble ſtill, the nobleſt race;
Others may owe their future fame to me,
I borrow immortality from thee.

Under this is written in large letters,

JOHN DUKE OF ARGYLE AND GR.

at which point the pen of Hiſtory ſtops.

The inſcription on the baſe of the monument runs thus: " In memory of an honeſt man, a " conſtant friend, JOHN the great duke of Ar- " gyle and Greenwich, a general and orator ex- " ceeded by none in the age he lived. Sir Henry " Farmer, bart. by his laſt will left the ſum of " five hundred pounds towards erecting this mo- " nument, and recommended the above in- " ſcription."

JOHN GAY.

This beautiful monument was erected to the memory of the above gentleman, by the bounty and favour of the duke and dutcheſs of Queenſborough, who were the great encouragers of his genius, and rewarders of his merit. The maſks, tragedy-dagger, and inſtruments of muſic, which are blended together in a groupe, are emblematical devices, alluding to the various ways of writing in which he excelled; namely, Farce, Satire, Fable, and Paſtoral. The following ſhort epitaph was written by himſelf:

Life is a jeſt, and all things ſhow it,
I thought ſo once, but now I know it.

Underneath are the following verſes written by Mr. Pope:

Of manners gentle, of affections mild;
In wit, a man; ſimplicity, a child:
With native humour, temp'ring virtuous rage,
Form'd to delight at once, and laſh the age:
Above temptation in a low eſtate,
And uncorrupted, e'en among the great.
A ſafe companion and an eaſy friend;
Unblam'd thro' life, lamented in thy end.
Theſe are thy honours, not that here thy buſt
Is mix'd with heroes, or with kings thy duſt;
But that the worthy and the good ſhall ſay,
Striking their penſive boſoms—Here lies Gay.
——He died December 4, 1732, aged 45.

NICHOLAS ROWE, Eſq;

This gentleman was poet-laureat, and author of ſeveral fine tragedies; and juſt before his death had finiſhed a tranſlation of Lucan's Pharſalia. The monument, which is a very fine one, was erected to the memory of him and his only daughter. On a pedeſtal about twenty inches high, which ſtands on an altar, is a moſt beautiful buſt; near it is the figure of a lady in the deepeſt ſorrow, and between both, on a pyramid behind, is a medallion, with the head of a young lady in relief. On the front of the pedeſtal is this inſcription: "To the memory of Nicholas Rowe, "eſq; who died in 1718, aged 45. And of Char- "lotte, his only daughter, wife of Henry Fane, "eſq; who inheriting her father's ſpirit, and "amiable in her own innocence and beauty, "died in the 23d year of her age, 1739." Under which, on the front of the altar, is the following epitaph:

Thy reliques, Rowe! to this ſad ſhrine we truſt,
And near thy Shakeſpear place thy honour'd buſt.
Oh! ſkill'd next him to draw the tender tear,
For never heart felt paſſion more ſincere:
To nobler ſentiments to fire the brave,
For never Briton more diſdain'd a ſlave!
Peace to thy gentle ſhade and endleſs reſt,
Bleſt in thy genius, in thy love too bleſt!
And bleſt, that timely from our ſcene remov'd,
Thy ſoul enjoys that liberty it lov'd.
To theſe ſo mourn'd in death, ſo lov'd in life,
The childleſs mother, and the widow'd wife,
With tears inſcribes this monumental ſtone,
That holds their aſhes, and expects her own.

JAMES THOMSON.

This monument was erected in the year 1762: and is executed by Michael Henry Spang, ſtatuary, after a deſign of Mr. Adam, architect to his majeſty. There is a figure of Mr. Thomſon ſitting, which leans its left arm upon a pedeſtal, holding a book with the cap of Liberty in its other hand. On the pedeſtal is carved in baſſo relievo the Seaſons; to which a boy points, offering him a laurel crown, as the reward of his genius. At the feet of the figure is the tragic maſk, and the ancient harp. The whole is ſupported by a projected pedeſtal, and in a pannel is this inſcription:

"JAMES THOMSON, Ætatis 48. Obiit 27 Au- "guſt, 1748. Tutored by thee, ſweet poetry "exults her voice to ages, and informs the page "with muſic, image, ſentiment, and thought, "never to die."

WILLIAM SHAKESPEAR.

The deſign and workmanſhip of this monument are extremely elegant. In the figure of Shakeſpear the ſculptor has moſt delicately expreſſed his attitude, his dreſs, his ſhape, his genteel air, and fine compoſure. The heads on the pedeſtal, which are likewiſe proper ornaments to grace the tomb, repreſent Henry V. Richard III. and queen Elizabeth. In ſhort, the taſte that is here ſhown does honour to thoſe great names, under whoſe direction, by the public favour, it was ſo elegantly conſtructed; namely, the earl of Burlington, Dr. Mead, Mr. Pope, and Mr. Martin. It was deſigned by Kent, and executed by Scheemakers; and the expence defrayed by the grateful contributions of the public. The lines on the ſcroll, which were written by himſelf, are very properly adapted.

The cloud-cap'd towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The ſolemn temples, the great globe itſelf;
Yea, all which it inherits, ſhall diſſolve,
And, like the baſeleſs fabric of a viſion,
Leave not a wreck behind.

CHARLES De St. DENNIS, Lord of St. EVREMOND.

The inſcription on this tomb is in latin, the tranſlation of which informs us, that this gentleman was of a noble family in Normandy, and was employed in the army of France, in which he roſe to the rank of a marſhal; but retiring to Holland, he was from thence invited by king Charles II. into England, where he lived in the greateſt intimacy with the king and principal nobility; but particularly with the dutcheſs of Mazarine. He was of a very ſprightly turn of humour, as well in his converſation as writings. Though he left France, as is ſuppoſed, on account of religion, yet in his will he left 20l. to poor Roman Catholics, and 20l. to poor French refugees; beſides other legacies to be diſpoſed of to thoſe in diſtreſs, of what religion ſoever they might be. He died by a violent fit of the ſtranguary the 9th of September, 1703, aged 90.

MATTHEW PRIOR.

This is a moſt beautiful monument, and richly ornamented. On one ſide the pedeſtal ſtands the figure figure of Thalia, one of the nine muſes, with a flute in her hand; and on the other, Hiſtory with her book ſhut; between both is the buſt of the deceaſed upon a raiſed altar of fine marble. Over this is a handſome pediment, on the aſcending ſides of which are two boys, one with an hour glaſs in his hand run out; the other holding a torch reverſed: on the apex of the pediment is an urn, and on the baſe of the monument a long inſcription, ſetting forth the principal employments in which he had been engaged; particularly, by order of king William and queen Mary, in aſſiſting at the congreſs of the confederate powers at the Hague in 1690. In 1697, he was one of the plenipotentiaries at the peace of Ryſwick; and in the following year was of the embaſſy to France, and alſo ſecretary of ſtate in Ireland. In 1700 he was made one of the board of trade; in 1711 firſt commiſſioner of the cuſtoms; and laſtly, in the ſame year, was ſent by her majeſty queen Anne to Lewis XIV. of France, with propoſals of peace. All which truſts he executed with uncommon addreſs, and the moſt firm integrity. On the outermoſt ſide of the buſt is a latin inſcription, importing, that while he was buſied in writing the hiſtory of his own times, death interpoſed, and broke both the thread of his diſcourſe and of his life the eighteenth of September 1721, in the 57th year of his age.

THOMAS SHADWELL.

This monument was erected to the memory of the above gentleman by his ſon Dr. John Shadwell. It is of curious marble, ornamented with a fine mantling, urn, and buſt, and crowned with a chaplet of bays. The inſcription imports, that he was deſcended from an ancient family in Staffordſhire, was poet-laureat and hiſtoriographer in the reign of king William, and died the 20th of November 1692, in the 55th year of his age. The cauſe of his death, which was at Cheſea, was by taking opium, to which he had been long accuſtomed.

JOHN MILTON.

This monument was erected to his memory by Mr. Auditor Benſon in the year 1737. He was a great polemical and political writer, being latin ſecretary to Oliver Cromwell; but what has immortalized his name are thoſe two inimitable pieces, Paradiſe loſt and regained. Theſe, he wrote in his retirement, and as ſome affirm after he was blind. This ſeems to be confirmed by that mournful paſſage in his third book of Paradiſe loſt, when, in his addreſs to light he ſays,

——————————Thee I reviſit ſafe
And feel thy ſovereign vital lamb; but thou
Reviſit'ſt not theſe eyes that roll in vain
To find thy piercing ray, and find no dawn;
So thick a drop ſerene hath quench'd their orbs.

On the reſtoration, many had ſo great an eſteem for his parts and learning, that though they deteſted his principles, they procured his pardon. He was born at London in 1608, and died of the gout at Bunhill, 1674, in the 67th year of his age, leaving three daughters unprovided for. His body was conveyed to St. Giles's-church, Cripplegate, and there interred in the chancel.

EDMUND SPENCER.

This great poet was born in London in the year 1510, and died in 1598. The tomb is of grey marble, but very rough and decayed; on which is the following inſcription:

"Here lies (expecting the ſecond coming of "Our Saviour Chriſt Jeſus) the body of Ed-"mund Spencer, the prince of poets in his time, "whoſe divine ſpirit needs no other witneſs than "the works which he left behind him."

Over this is a monument erected to the memory of

SAMUEL BUTLER.

This gentleman was author of Hudibras, and a man of the moſt extraordinary learning, wit, and integrity; but underwent great difficulties on account of his narrow circumſtances. He was born at Sternſham in Worceſterſhire in 1612, died in London in 1680, and was buried at the expence of a private friend, in the church-yard of St. Paul's, Covent-garden. This tomb, as the inſcription informs us, was erected by John Barber, eſq; citizen of London, and afterwards lord mayor, "that he who was deſtitute of all "things when alive, might not want a monument "when dead."

BEN. JOHNSON.

This gentleman was poet-laureat to king James I. and was cotemporary with Shakeſpear, to whoſe writings he was no friend. He was the ſon of a clergyman, and educated at Weſtminſter ſchool, while Mr. Cambden was maſter; but after his father's death, his mother marrying a bricklayer, he was taken from ſchool, and made to lay bricks. It is ſaid that at the building of Lincoln's-Inn, he worked with his trowel in one hand, and Horace in the other; but Mr. Cambden regarding his parts, recommended him to Sir Walter Raleigh, whoſe ſon he attended in his travels, and upon his return entered himſelf of Cambridge. Among his various theatrical productions, there are but four plays that will at this time bear repreſentation, viz. The Silent Woman, Alchymiſt, Volpone, and Every Man in his Humour. The monument is of fine marble, and very neatly ornamented with emblematical figures, alluding perhaps to the malice and envy of his cotemporaries. His epitaph conſiſts olny of theſe words:

O RARE BEN JOHNSON!

He died Auguſt 16, 1637, aged 63.

MICHAEL DRAYTON.

This gentleman was an excellent poet, and a great antiquarian; the firſt of which appears by his his epiſtles and legends; the latter by his Polyalbion, which the great Seldon honoured with a comment. It does not appear by whom this monument was erected; but the inſcription and epitaph (which were formerly in letters of gold, but now almoſt obliterated) runs thus:

"Michael Drayton, eſq; a memorable poet "of his age, exchanged his laurel for a crown "of glory, Anno 1631."

Do, pious marble! let thy readers know
What they, and what their children owe
To Drayton's name, whoſe ſacred duſt
We recommend unto thy truſt;
Protect his mem'ry, and preſerve his ſtory;
Remain a laſting monument of his glory;
And when thy ruins ſhall diſclaim
To be the treaſurer of his name:
His name that cannot fade ſhall be
An everlaſting monument to thee.

JOHN PHILLIPS.

This monument was erected to the memory of the above gentleman by Sir Simon Harcourt, knt. The buſt is in relief, and repreſented as in an arbor interwoven with vines, laurel branches, and apples-trees; and over it this motto; Honos erit huic quoque Pomo; alluding to the high qualities aſcribed to the apple in that excellent poem of his called Cyder. He was author of but few pieces, but thoſe very maſterly. His Blenheim is a fine ſpecimen of what, had he lived, he was capable of in the epic way; in the lyric his ode to lord Bolingbroke on Tobacco is far from contemptible; and as to his Splendid Shilling, whoever reads it muſt be highly pleaſed with his fancy and great force of genius. The inſcription on his monument is a recital of his tranſcendent virtues and abilities, and the great merit he was poſſeſſed of. He was ſon to Stephen Phillips, D. D. archdeacon of Salop, was born at Bampton in Oxfordſhire, Dec. 30, 1675, and died of a conſumption in the prime of his life the 15th of February 1708.

GEOFFERY CHAUCER.

This monument, which is of the gothic ſtile, was once very beautiful, but now much defaced. The perſon to whoſe name it is ſacred, is called the father of Engliſh poets, and flouriſhed in the fourteenth century. He was ſon to Sir John Chaucer, a citizen of London, and employed by Edward III. in negotiations abroad relating to trade. He was firſt brought up at Cambridge; then in Merton in Oxford, from whence he went to ſtudy the law in the Middle Temple. After this he became a favourite at court, and was employed as a ſhield-bearer to the king; he was a gentleman of the bedchamber, and by Edward III. ſent ambaſſador abroad; but in the ſucceeding reign fell into diſgrace, and was committed to the Tower for high treaſon, where he wrote his Teſtament of Love. But on the death of Richard II. he became a greater favourite at court than ever, having married the great John of Gaunt's wife's ſiſter. He was born in 1328, and died October 25, 1400, aged 72.

ABRAHAM COWLEY.

Though this monument appears very plain, yet it is expreſſive. The fire iſſuing from the mouth of the urn, and the chaplet of laurel that begirts it, are fine emblems of the glory he acquired by the ſpirit of his writings. The inſcription and epitaph on the pedeſtal are both in latin, the tranſlation of which runs thus:

"Near this place lies Abraham Cowley, the "Pindar, Horace, and Virgil of England; and "the delight, ornament, and admiration of his "age:

While, ſacred bard, far worlds thy works proclaim,
And you ſurvive in an immortal fame,
Here may you bleſs'd in pleaſing quiet lie,
To guard thy urn my hoary faith ſtand by;
And all thy fav'rite tuneful nine repair
To watch thy duſt with a perpetual care.
Sacred for ever may this place be made,
And may no deſp'rate hand preſume t'invade
With touch unhallow'd, this religious room,
Or dare affront thy venerable tomb;
Unmov'd and undiſturb'd till time ſhall end,
May Cowley's duſt this marble ſhrine defend.

"So wiſhes, and deſires that wiſh may be ſacred "to poſterity, George duke of Buckingham, "who erected this monument for that incompa-"rable man. He died in the 49th year of his "age, and was carried from Buckingham-houſe, "with honourable pomp, his exequies being at-"tended by perſons of illuſtrious characters of "all degrees, and buried Aug. 3, 1667."

By a blue ſtone, on which is engraved his name, it appears that he lies juſt before this monument.

Mrs. MARTHA BIRCH.

This is a neat table monument high on a pillar, the inſcription whereof informs us that ſhe was daughter to Samuel Viner, eſq; and firſt married to Francis Millington, eſq; and after his death to Peter Birch, prebendary of this abbey; and that ſhe was prudent, pious, and chaſte. She died in the 50th year of her age, May 15, 1703.

DRYDEN.

This monument was erected to the memory of the above gentleman by the late duke of Buckingham, who valued his writings ſo much, that he thought no inſcription neceſſary to ſpread his fame. It may be ſaid of this great man with reſpect to his writings in general, that what he did in any one ſpecies or diſtinct kind, would have been ſufficient to have acquired him a great name. All that can be diſcovered on the monument is this: "J. Dryden, born 1632, died May "1, 1700. John Sheffield, duke of Buckingham-"ſhire, erected this monument, 1720."

ROBERT

On the tomb is the figure of this gentleman in his canonical habit, with his arm reſting on a cuſhion, and his right hand on a death's head. In his left he holds a book with his finger between the leaves, as if juſt cloſed from reading, and over his head is a groupe of cherubs iſſuing from a mantling, under which is a long latin inſcription, ſhewing, that he was ſcholar to Dr. Buſby, and ſtudent at Chriſt-church, Oxford, and public orator of that univerſity; that by the patronage of lord Clarendon he was made prebendary both of Weſtminſter and Chriſt's, and afterwards rector of Iſlip, where he rebuilt the parſonage houſe, and founded and endowed a ſchool for the education of poor children. He died July 8, 1716, aged 82.

Dr. RICHARD BUSBY.

The effigy of this learned man in his gown is on the monument looking earneſtly on the inſcription. In his right hand he holds a pen, and in his left a book open. Underneath, on the pedeſtal, are a variety of books, and at top his family arms. The inſcription is elegantly written, and highly to his praiſe: it intimates, that whatever fame the ſchool of Weſtminſter boaſts, and whatever advantages mankind ſhall reap from thence in times to come, are all principally owing to the wiſe inſtitutions of this great man. He was born at Lutton in Lincolnſhire, Sept. 22, 1606, made maſter of Weſtminſter-college Dec. 23, 1640, elected prebend of Weſtminſter July 5, 1660, and treaſurer of Wells, Auguſt 11, the ſame year; and died April 5, 1695.

About this ſpot, on the pavement, are ſome names to be met with, which are too conſiderable to paſs over unnoticed. The firſt is

THOMAS PARR.

He was born in the county of Salop, in the year 1483, and lived in the reign of ten princes, viz. king Edward IV. Edward V. Richard III. Henry VII. Henry VIII. Edward VI. queen Mary, queen Elizabeth, king James, and king Charles. He died the 15th of November 1635, aged 152. A very ſingular circumſtance reſpecting this old man is, that at the age of 130, a proſecution was entered againſt him in the ſpiritual court for baſtardy, and with ſuch effect, that he did penance publicly in the church for that offence.

Not far from this lie the remains of that once celebrated poet,

Sir WILLIAM DAVENANT.

This great man ſucceeded Ben Johnſon as poet-laureat to king Charles the firſt, but having loſt his noſe by an accident, he became the ridicule of the wits in the ſucceeding reign. His ſteadineſs to the royal cauſe was ſingular. In 1641 he was forced to France on an accuſation of ſeducing the parliament army from their duty. In 1643 he was knighted for his bravery at the ſiege of Glouceſter; but the king's cauſe declining, he was forced once more to take refuge in France, where he wrote his Gondabert. In attempting to return he was taken at ſea, confined in the Iſle of Wight, and thence removed to the Tower, in order to take his trial at the high court of juſticiary; but by the application of Milton, he was ſpared. He lived to ſee the reſtoration, and to enjoy his old poſt, in which he was ſucceeded by Mr. Dryden. He was the ſon of a vintner at Oxford, and received his education at Lincoln-college, where he became acquainted with Endimion Porter, Henry Jermain, and Sir John Suckling. He died in 1668, aged 63. On the ſtone that covers him are inſcribed theſe words:

O Rare Sir William Davenant.

At a ſmall diſtance from the above, lie the remains of that great mathematician

Sir ROBERT MURRAY.

He was one of the founders of the Royal Society, of which he was the firſt preſident, and while he lived, the principal ſupport of it. He was a great admirer of the Roſecruſians, well verſed in chemiſtry and experimental philoſphy; and in great favour with king Charles II. to whom he was ſecretary for Scotland, and a privy-counſellor. He was buried at the king's expence, after having died ſuddenly in the garden at Whitehall the 4th of July 1673.

Not far from this is an ancient ſtone of grey marble, in which by the marks has been the image of a man in armour. It covers the body of

JOHN HAULE.

This man was a private ſoldier in the reign of Richard III. At the battle of Najara in Spain, he, together with John Shakel his comrade, took the earl of Denne priſoner, who, under pretence of raiſing money for his ranſom, obtained his liberty, leaving his ſon as ſurety in their hands. Upon their coming to England, the duke of Lancaſter demanded him for the king; but they refuſed to deliver him up without a ranſom, and were therefore both committed to the Tower, from whence eſcaping they took ſanctuary in this abbey. Sir Ralph Ferreris and Alan Buxal, the one governor, the other captain of the Tower, with fifty more men, purſued them, and having by fair promiſes gained over Shakel, they attempted to ſeize Haule by force, who made a deſperate defence; but being overpowered by numbers, was ſlain Aug. 11, 1378, in the choir before the prior's ſtall, commending himſelf to God the avenger of wrongs; and at the ſame time a ſervant of the abbey fell with him. Shakel they threw into priſon, but afterwards he was ſet at liberty, and the king and council of England agreed to pay Shakel for the ranſom of his priſoner 500 marks, and 100 marks per annum. Some years afterwards Shakel died, and was likewiſe buried here in 1396.

Near Dryden's tomb, lie the remains of Francis Beaumont, the dramatic writer, who died in London, in March 1615, and was buried here the 9th of the ſame month.

Having now done with the pavement, and paſſed the ſide of the choir, the firſt monument which preſents itſelf is that of

WILLIAM THYNNE, Eſq;

This ancient monument is of marble and alabaſter: on it is a warrior at full length, repreſenting William Thynne, of Botterville, eſq; who was a polite gentleman, a great traveller, and a brave ſoldier. In 1546 he was by king Henry VIII. made receiver of the marches, and fought againſt the Scots at Muſſelburgh with undaunted courage. The latter part of his life he ſpent in retirement and devotion in this church, whither he conſtantly repaired morning and evening. He was brother to Sir John Thynne, ſecretary to the duke of Somerſet. He died the 14th of March 1584.

Sir THOMAS RICHARDSON.

On this monument, which is of black marble, is an effigy in braſs of a judge in his robes, with a collar of S. S. repreſenting Sir Thomas Richardſon, knight, who, according to the inſcription, was ſpeaker of the Houſe of Commons in the twenty-firſt and twenty-ſecond years of king James; chief juſtice of the court of Common-pleas; and laſtly, by king Charles I. made lord chief juſtice of England. This is that judge Richardſon, who firſt iſſued out an order againſt the ancient cuſtom of wakes, and ordered every miniſter to read it in his church; which the biſhop of Bath and Wells oppoſing, complaint was made againſt it, in the council-chamber, where the judge was ſo ſeverely reprimanded, that he came out, in a rage, ſaying, he had been almoſt choaked with a pair of lawn ſleeves. He died in 1634, aged 66.

ELIZ. and JUDITH FREKE.

Theſe two ladies were not only an ornament, but a fine example for their ſex; they were the beſt of daughters, the beſt of wives, and the beſt of mothers. The ſides of the monument are adorned with their buſts in relief, and on the front of it is a long inſcription, ſetting forth their deſcent and marriages. They were the daughters of Ralph Freke, of Hannington in Wilts, eſq; Elizabeth was married to Percy Freke, of Weſt Belney in Norfolk, and died April 7, 1714, aged 69, Judith married Robert Auſtin, of Tenterden in Kent, and died May 19, 1716, aged 64.

Dame GRACE GETHIN.

This lady, who was married to Sir Richard Gethin, of Gethin Grott, in Ireland, was famed for exemplary piety, and wrote a book of devotion, which Mr. Congreve complimented with a poem. The monument, which is very lofty, bears the effigy of a young lady devoutly kneeling, with a book in her right hand, and her left on her breaſt; on each ſide is an angel, one holding a crown, the other a chaplet over her head, and on the aſcending ſides of the pediment are two female figures in a mournful poſture. The whole is ſupported by three different coats of family arms, and on the baſe is an Engliſh inſcription, ſetting forth her honourable deſcent from the Norton's of Salop. She died October 11, 1697, in the twenty-firſt year of her age.

JA. KENDALL, Eſq;

This monument is ſupported by a death's head, and on the top is a cloſe helmet. The perſon to whom it is inſcribed was choſen a member of the laſt parliament of king James II. and ſerved in ſeveral parliaments afterwards in the reign of king William, by whom he was made governor of Barbadoes, and one of the commiſſioners for executing the office of lord high admiral. He died the 10th of July, 1708, in the 60th year of his age.

THOMAS OWEN, Eſq;

There is a fine figure on this monument of a judge in his robes at full length, leaning on his left arm, and over him an inſcription, ſhewing that he was ſon to Richard Owen, by Mary, daughter and heireſs to Thomas Ottly, of Shropſhire, eſq; that from his youth he had applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the laws, and was firſt made ſerjeant at law to queen Elizabeth, and afterwards a juſtice of the Common-pleas. He died the 21ſt of December, in the year 1598.

THOMAS THYNNE, Eſq;

This monument, which is eſteemed a fine piece of modern ſtatuary, was lately repaired and beautified at the expence of Thomas Thynne, late lord viſcount Weymouth. The principal figure is repreſented in a dying poſture, and at his feet a cherub weeping. Underneath on a table of black marble in white letters, is this inſcription: "Thomas Thynne of Longleate, in Com. Wilts, "eſq; who was barbarouſly murdered on Sun-"day the 12th of February, 1682." Upon the pedeſtal in relief, the ſtory of the murder is depicted; which murder was conſpired by count Koningſmarck, and excuted by three aſſaſſins hired for that purpoſe, who ſhot this unhappy gentleman in Pall-Mall, in his own coach. The motive was, to obtain the rich heireſs of Northumberland in marriage, who, in her infancy, had been betrothed to the earl of Ogle, but left a widow before conſummation; and afterwards married to Mr. Thynne, but being ſcarce fifteen, and her mother extremely tender of her, and withal deſirous of her having iſſue, prevailed upon her huſband to ſuffer her to travel another year before he bedded her, in which time ſhe became acquainted with Koningſmarck at the court of Hanover. Whether ſhe had ever given him any countenance is uncertain, but having no hopes of obtaining her while her huſband was alive, he in this villainous manner accompliſhed his death; but the lady deteſted the horrid deed, and ſoon after married the great duke of Somerſet.

JAMES

JAMES Earl Stanhope.

This monument is ſtately and magnificent, the principal figure in which leans upon his arm in a cumbent poſture, holding in his right hand a general's ſtaff, and in his left a parchment ſcroll. Before him ſtands a Cupid reſting himſelf upon a ſhield. Over a martial tent ſits a beautiful Pallas, holding in her right hand a javeline, and in the other a ſcroll. Behind is a ſlender pyramid, anſwering to that of Sir Iſaac Newton's, and indeed there is ſuch an affinity in the deſign as indicates the workmanſhip to be done by the ſame maſter. On the middle of the pedeſtal are two medals, and on each ſide the pilaſters one: under the principal figure is a latin inſcription, ſetting forth the merits of this great man as a ſoldier, a ſtateſman, and a ſenator: In 1707 he concluded an advantageous treaty with Spain; and the ſame year was ſent ambaſſador to Charles III. In 1708 he took Port Mahon. In 1710 he forced his way to the gates of Madrid, and took poſſeſſion of that capital. In September 1714 he was made ſecretary at war. In 1715, being of the ſecret committee, he impeached the duke of Ormond. In December 1716 he was made ſecretary of ſtate. In 1717 he was made firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, and chancellor of the exchequer; and July following created a peer. In March 1718 he was a ſecond time made ſecretary of ſtate; and in 1721 he died, in the 47th year of his age.

Sir ISAAC NEWTON.

This is a moſt ſuperb and elegant monument. Sir Iſaac is ſculptured on it recumbent, leaning his right arm on four folio's, thus titled, Divinity, Chronology, Opticks, and Phil: Prin: Math: and pointing to the ſcroll ſupported by winged cherubs: over him is a large globe, projecting from a pyramid behind, whereon is delineated the courſe of the comet in 1680, with the ſigns, conſtellations and planets. On this globe ſits the figure of Aſtronomy, with her book cloſed, and in a very thoughtful, compoſed, and penſive mood. Underneath the principal figure is a moſt curious baſs relief, repreſenting the various labours in which Sir Iſaac chiefly employed his time: ſuch as diſcovering the cauſe of gravitation, ſettling the principles of light and colours, and reducing the coinage to a determined ſtandard. The device of weighing the ſun by the ſteelyard has been thought at once bold and ſtriking, and indeed the whole monument does honour to the ſculptor. The inſcription on the pedeſtal is in latin, ſhort, but full of meaning, intimating, that by a ſpirit nearly divine, he ſolved, on principles of his own, the motion and figure of the planets, the paths of the comets, and the ebbing and flowing of the ſea; that he diſcovered the diſſimilarity of the rays of light, and the properties of colours from thence ariſing, which none but himſelf had ever dreamt of; that he was a diligent, wiſe, and faithful interpreter of nature, antiquity, and the holy ſcriptures; that by his philoſophy he maintained the dignity of the ſupreme Being; and by the purity of his life, the ſimplicity of the goſpel. The inſcription concludes with a beautiful exclamation, what reaſon mortals had to pride themſelves in the exiſtence of ſuch and ſo great an ornament to the human race! He was born December 5, 1642, and died in the year 1726.

Dame ELIZ. CARTERET.

The figure of this lady is on the monument, with a winged ſeraph deſcending to receive her, both which are executed in a maſterly manner. She was daughter of Sir Edward Carteret, knt. gentleman uſher of the black rod to king Charles, and ſecond wife and relict of Sir Philip de Carteret, and by him mother to Sir Charles Carteret, her only ſon, by whoſe death was extinguiſhed the eldeſt branch of the ancient family of the name of Carteret, ſigneurs of St, Owen, in the iſle of Jerſey. She died, aged 52, the 26th of March, 1717.

Sir THOMAS DUPPA.

On the top of this monument is an urn, and the whole is beautifully ornamented with flowers and foliage. The inſcription informs us, that in his youth he waited upon king Charles II. when he was prince of Wales and under the tuition of Dr. Duppa. He was afterwards made a gentleman-uſher and daily-waiter, and then gentleman uſher of the black rod, in which office he died April 25, 1694, in the 75th year of his age.

ALMERICUE DE COURCY, Baron of Kinſale.

Under a rich canopy finely ornamented and gilt is repreſented his lordſhip in full proportion repoſing himſelf after the fatigues of an active life. The inſcription informs us, that he was deſcended from the famous John de Courcy, earl of Ulſter, (who in the reign of king John, in conſideration of his great valour, obtained that extraordinary privilege to him and his heirs of being covered before the king.) This nobleman was greatly in favour with king Charles II. and king James II. under the latter of which he commanded a troop of horſe. He died the 19th of February, 1719, aged 57.

HENRY PURCELL, Eſq;

The workmanſhip of this monument, though ſmall, is very elegant. There is a ſhort but comprehenſive epitaph on it, which runs thus: "Here lies Henry Purcell, who left this life, and "is gone to that bleſſed place, where only his "harmony can be exceeded." He died November 21, 1695, aged 37.

HUGH CHAMBERLAIN, M. D. & F. R. S.

This monument is principally adorned with a figure laying as it were at eaſe, on a tomb ſtone, leaning upon his right arm, with his hand upon his night cap, and his head uncovered. In his left hand he holds a book, indicating thereby his intenſe application to ſtudy. On each ſide are the emblems emblems of phyſic and longevity; and over his head is Fame deſcending with a trumpet in one hand, and in the other a wreath. On the top are weeping cherubs, and on the pedeſtal a long inſcription in latin, ſetting forth his vaſt knowledge and induſtry in his profeſſion, his humanity in relieving the ſick, and his connections and affinities in ſocial and private life. This gentleman was famous for the improvements he made in midwifery, the practiſe of which, ſince his time, has been ſtudied to great advantage. He died June 17, 1728, aged 64.

Sir THOMAS HESKET.

This is a fine old monument, on which lies the effigy of a gentleman at full length in a tufted gown, and on the baſe underneath is a lady kneeling. Theſe appear, by the inſcription, to repreſent Sir Thomas Heſket, attorney of the court of wards and liveries in the time of queen Elizabeth; and Julian, his wife, who cauſed this monument to be erected. He died the 15th of October 1605.

Dame MARY JAMES.

This monument principally conſiſts of an urn wreathed and crowned with a viſcount's coronet on a handſome pedeſtal. It appears by the inſcription, that this lady was wife to Sir John James, of the ancient family of the lords of Hoſtrick in Holland, and daughter to Sir Robert Killegrew, vice-chamberlain to Mary, queen to king Charles the firſt. She died November 6, 1677,

Sir GILBERT LORT.

This monument is inſcribed to the memory of Sir Gilbert Lort, of Stackpole in Pembrokeſhire, bart. by his ſiſter Dame Elizabeth Campbell, relict of Sir Alexander Campbell, of Colder in Scotland, bart. Sir Gilbert died September 19, 1698, aged 28. She died September 28, 1714, aged 49. The monument is chiefly ornamented with family arms and cherubs.

Sir PETER WARREN.

This is a moſt ſuperb monument, conſiſting of white marble, and executed by that great maſter of his time, Rubiliac. Adjoining to the wall is a large flag hanging to the flagſtaff, and ſpreading in natural folds, behind the whole monument. Before is a fine figure of Hercules placing Sir Peter's buſt on its pedeſtal; and on the other ſide is a figure of Navigation with a laurel wreath in her hand, gazing on the buſt with a look of melancholy mixed with admiration. Behind her a cornucopia pours out fruit, corn, the fleece, &c. and by it is a cannon, an anchor, and other decorations. The following is the inſcription:

Sacred to the memory of
Sir PETER WARREN,
Knight of the Bath, vice-admiral of the red Squadron of the britiſh fleet, and Member of parliament
For the City and liberty of Weſtminſter.
He derived his deſcent from an ancient Family of Ireland:
His fame and honours from his virtues and Abilities.
How eminently thoſe were diſplayed,
With what vigilance and ſpirit they were exerted,
In the various ſervices wherein he had the honour to command,
And the happineſs to conquer,
Will be more properly recorded in the Annals of GREAT BRITAIN.
On this tablet affection with truth muſt ſay,
That deſervedly eſteem'd in private life,
And univerſally renowned for his public
Conduct,
The judicious and gallant officer
Poſſeſſed of all the amiable qualities of the Friend,
The gentleman and the chriſtian:
But the Almighty,
Whom alone he feared, and whoſe gracious Protection
He had often experienced,
Was pleaſed to remove him from a place of Honour
To an eternity of happineſs,
On the 29th Day of July, 1752,
In the 49th year of his age.

GRACE SCOTT.

Adjoining to the pillar is a neat tablet, on which is the following inſcription: "Grace, "eldeſt daughter of Sir Thomas Mauleverer of "Allerton Maulerveer, in Yorkſhire, bart. born "1622, married to colonel Scott, a member of "the Honourable Houſe of Commons, 1644, "and died February 24, 1645."

He that will give my GRACE but what is hers,
Muſt ſay her death has not
Made only her dear SCOTT,
But virtue, worth, and ſweetneſs, widowers.

WILL. CAVENDISH, duke of Newcaſtle.

This monument is a moſt beautiful piece of architecture, and elegantly ornamented. In a cumbent poſture, on a double mat covered with a rich canopy of ſtate, lie (according to the Engliſh inſcription) the loyal duke of Newcaſtle and his dutcheſs, his ſecond wife, by whom he had no iſſue; her name was Margaret Lucas, youngeſt ſiſter to lord Lucas of Colcheſter, a noble family; for all the brothers were valiant, and all the ſiſters virtuous. This dutcheſs was a wife, witty, and learned lady, which her many books do well teſtify: ſhe was a moſt virtuous and a loving careful wife, and was with her lord all the time of his baniſhment and miſeries; and when he came home, never parted from him in his ſolitary retirements. The latin inſcription farther informs us, he was a knight of the bath, and baron Ogle

in

in right of his mother, viſcount Mansfield, and baron Cavendiſh of Boleſover, earl of Ogle, earl, marquis and duke of Newcaſtle upon Tyne, lord lieutenant of the counties of Nottingham and Northumberland, firſt lord of the bedchamber to the king, guardian to prince Charles, privy-counſellor to the king, and knight of the moſt noble order of the garter; that for his fidelity to the king he was made captain-general of the forces raiſed for his ſervice in the north, fought many battles, and generally came off victorious; that when the rebels prevailed (being one of the firſt deſigned a ſacrifice) he left his eſtate, and endured a long exile; by his firſt wife Elizabeth, daughter and heir to William Baſſet of Staffordſhire, eſq; he had two ſons and three daughters; Charles, who died without iſſue, and Henry, heir to his honours; Jane, married to Charles Cheyney, of Cheſham, Bucks; Elizabeth, to John earl of Bridgewater; and Frances, to Oliver earl of Bolingbroke. He died December 27, 1676, aged 84.

JOHN HOLLIS, Duke of Newcaſtle.

The chief beauty of this monument conſiſts in the deſign, though it is, perhaps, as lofty and magnificent as any in the whole abbey. The principal figure on it reſts upon a ſepulchral monument of darkiſh coloured marble, and repreſents the noble perſon to whoſe memory it was erected, having in his right hand a general's ſtaff, and in his left hand a ducal coronet. On one ſide the baſe ſtands a ſtatue of Wiſdom, on the other, of Sincerity. On the angles of the upper compartment ſit angels, and on the aſcending ſides of the pediment ſit cherubs, one with an hour-glaſs, alluding to the admeaſurement of man's life by grains of ſand; the other pointing upwards, where life ſhall be no longer meaſured by duration. On the baſe of the monument is the following inſcription:

" John Hollis, duke of Newcaſtle, marquis " and earl of Clare, baron Houghton, of Hough- " ton, and knight companion of the moſt noble " order of the garter, whoſe body is here depo- " ſited under the ſame roof with many of his " noble anceſtors and relations, of the families " of Vere, Cavendiſh, and Hollis, whoſe eminent " virtues he inherited; and was particularly diſ- " tinguiſhed for his courage, love to his country, " and conſtancy in friendſhip; which qualities " he exerted with great zeal and readineſs, when- " ever the cauſe of religion, his country, or " friends required him. In the reign of queen " Anne he filled with great capacity and honour " the ſeveral employments of lord-keeper of " the privy-ſeal, and privy-counſellor, lord lieu- " tenant and cuſtos rotulorum of Middleſex and " Nottingham, and of the county and the town " of Nottingham, and of the eaſt and north " ridings of the county of York; lord chief " juſtice in Eyre, north of Trent, and governor " of the town and fort of Kingſton upon Hull: " to all which titles and honours his perſonal " merit gave luſtre that needed not the addition " of the great wealth he poſſeſſed. He was born " Jan. 9, 1661-2, and died July 15, 1711. He " married the lady Margaret, third daughter and " heireſs to Henry Cavendiſh, duke of Newcaſtle, " by whom he left iſſue one only child, the lady " Henrietta Cavendiſh Hollis Harley, who " cauſed this memorial of him to be erected in " 1723."

Admiral VERNON.

The buſt of that gallant admiral is repreſented on a pedeſtal of beautiful marble, with a fine figure of Fame crowning him with laurels. The monument is ſuperbly ornamented with naval trophies, and under it is the following inſcription:

As a memorial of his own gratitude, and of the virtues of his benefactor, this monument was erected by his nephew
Francis lord Orwell,
In the year
1763.
Sacred to the memory
of
EDWARD VERNON,
Admiral of the white ſquadron of the Britiſh fleet.
He was the ſecond ſon of James Vernon,
Who was ſecretary of ſtate to king William III.
and whoſe abilities and integrity were equally conſpicuous.
In his youth he ſerved under the admirals Shovel and Rooke;
By their example he learned to conquer,
By his own merit he roſe to command.
In the war with Spain of M,DCC,XXXIX, he took the fort of Porto Bello with ſix ſhips,
A force which was thought unequal to the attempt,
For this he received the thanks of both houſes of parliament.
He ſubdued Chagre, and at Carthagena conquered as far as naval force could carry victory.
After theſe ſervices he retired without place or title, from the exerciſe of public to the enjoyment of private virtue.
The teſtimony of a good conſcience was his reward,
The love and eſteem of all good men his glory.
In battle, tho' calm he was active, and tho' intrepid prudent, ſucceſsful yet not oſtentatious,
Aſcribing the glory
to God;
In the ſenate, he was diſintereſted, vigilant, and ſteady.
On the XXX. day of October, M,DCC,LVII,
he died as he had lived,
the friend of man, the lover of his country,
the father of the poor aged LXXIII.

Sir CHARLES WAGER.

The principal figure on this monument is, Fame holding a portrait of the admiral in relief, ſupported by an infant Hercules. The embelliſhments conſiſt of naval trophies, inſtruments of war and navigation, &c. and on the baſe in relief is repreſented the deſtroying and taking the Spaniſh galeons in 1708. The inſcription runs thus:

To the memory of Sir CHARLES WAGER, Knt.
Admiral of the white, firſt commiſſioner of the admiralty, and privy-counſellor:
A man of great natural talents,
Who bore the higheſt commands,
And paſſed through the greateſt employments,
With credit to himſelf, and honour to his country.
He was in private life
Humane, temperate, juſt, and bountiful:
In public ſtation,
Valiant, prudent, wiſe, and honeſt;
Eaſy of acceſs to all;
Plain and unaffected in his manners,
Steady and reſolute in his conduct:
So remarkably happy in his preſence of mind,
that no danger ever diſcompoſed him;
Eſteemed and favoured by his king;
Beloved and honoured by his country.
He died 24 May, 1743. Aged 77.

Sir WILLIAM SANDERSON, Knt.

On a ſmall table of alabaſter adjoining to the wall, is a buſt of this gentleman, who, by the inſcription, was of the bedchamber to king Charles I. and wrote the lives of Mary queen of Scots, James and Charles I. that he ſuſtained great hardſhips from the tyranny of the rebels, but that having bravely ſurmounted all difficulties, he lived to the age of 90, and died July 15, 1676.

CLEMENT SAUNDERS, Eſq;

Adjoining to a pillar near the font is a ſmall monument erected to the memory of the above gentleman, who was ſon to Sir William Saunders, knt. of the county of Northampton, and carver in ordinary to king Charles II. king James II. and king William III. He died Auguſt 10, 1695, in the 84th year of his age.

Admiral WATSON.

This is a moſt beautiful and ſplendid monument. In the center of a range of palm-trees is repreſented an elegant figure of the admiral in Roman Toga, with a branch of palm in his right hand, and is receiving the addreſs of a proſtrate figure repreſenting the genius of Calcutta, a place that he relieved and retook from the nabob in Jan. 1757, On the ſide is the figure in chains of a native of Chandernagore, another place taken by the admiral the March following. On the front of the monument is the following inſcription:

To the memory of CHARLES WATSON,
Vice-admiral of the white, commander in chief of his majeſty's naval forces in the Eaſt Indies, who died at Calcutta the 16th of Auguſt 1757.
The EAST-INDIA Company,
As a grateful teſtimony of the ſignal advantages which they obtained by his valour and prudent conduct, cauſed this monument to be erected.

General GUEST.

The buſt of this gentleman is of white marble, on a baſe and pyramid of the moſt beautiful Egyptian porphyry. It is ſo highly finiſhed that nothing but a fine imagination can paint its value. The inſcription is as follows: "Sacred to "thoſe virtues that adorn a chriſtian and a ſol-"dier, this marble perpetuates the memory of "lieutenant-general Joſhua Gueſt, who cloſed "a ſervice of 60 years, by faithfully defending "Edingburgh-caſtle againſt the rebels, 1745."

Sir JOHN BALCHEN, Knt.

On the top of this monument, in the moſt beautiful white marble, is a buſt of this great admiral; under which, in relief, is the repreſentation of a ſhip periſhing in a ſtorm. The enrichments, arms, and trophies, are admirably well executed; and the inſcription, which is hiſtorical, runs thus:

"To the memory of Sir John Balchen, knt. admiral of the white ſquadron of his majeſty's fleet in 1744, being ſent out commander in chief of the combined fleets of England and Holland, to cruize on the enemy, was, on his return home in his majeſty's ſhip the Victory, loſt in the channel by a violent ſtorm, from which ſad circumſtance of his death we may learn, that neither the greateſt ſkill, judgment, or experience, joined to the moſt firm unſhaken reſolution, can reſiſt the fury of the winds and waves; and we are taught from the paſſages of his life, which were filled with great and gallant actions, but ever accompanied with adverſe gales of fortune, that the brave, the worthy, and the good man meets not always his reward in this world. Fifty-eight years of faithful and painful ſervices he had paſſed, when being juſt retired to the government of Greenwich-hoſpital to wear out the remainder of his days, he was once more, and for the laſt time, called out by his king and country, whoſe intereſt he ever prefered to his own, and his unwearied zeal for their ſervice ending only in his death; which weighty misfortune to his afflicted family became heightened by many aggravating circumſtances attending it, yet amidſt their grief had they the mournful conſolation to find his gracious and royal maſter mixing his concern with the general lamentations of the public, for the calamitous fate of ſo zealous, ſo valiant, and ſo able a commander; and as a laſting memorial of the ſincere love and eſteem borne by his widow, to a moſt affectionate and worthy huſband, this honorary monument was erected by her. He was born Feb. 2, 1669, married Suſannah, daughter of col. Apreece of Waſhingly in the county of Huntingdon. Died Oct. 7, 1744, leaving one ſon and one daughter, the former of whom, George Balchen, ſurvived him but a ſhort time; for being ſent to the Weſt-Indies in 1745, commander of his majeſty's ſhip the Pembroke, he died died in Barbadoes in December the ſame year, aged 28, having walked in the ſteps, and imitated the virtue and bravery of his good but unfortunate father."

Lord AUBREY BEAUCLERK.

There is a beautiful buſt of this young nobleman in a niche on a pyramid of dove coloured marble, and the whole monument is decorated with arms, trophies, and naval enſigns. On the pedeſtal is the following hiſtorical inſcription:

"The lord Aubrey Beauclerk was the youngeſt ſon of Charles duke of St. Albans, by Diana, daughter of Aubrey de Vere, earl of Oxford. He went early to ſea, and was made a commander in 1731. In 1740 he was ſent upon that memorable expedition to Carthagena, under the command of admiral Vernon, in his majeſty's ſhip the prince Frederick, which with three others was ordered to cannonade the caſtle of Bocca Chica. One of theſe being obliged to quit her ſtation, the prince Frederick was expoſed not only to the fire from the caſtle, but to that of Fort St. Joſeph, and to two ſhips that guarded the mouth of the harbour, which he ſuſtained for many hours that day, and part of the next, with uncommon intrepidity. As he was giving his command upon deck, both his legs were ſhot off; but ſuch was his magnanimity, that he would not ſuffer his wounds to be dreſſed, till he had communicated his orders to the firſt lieutenant, which were, to fight his ſhip to the laſt extremity. Soon after this he gave ſome directions about his private affairs, and then reſigned his ſoul with the dignity of a hero and chriſtian. Thus was he taken off in the 31ſt year of his age, an illuſtrious commander of ſuperior fortitude and clemency, amiable in his perſon, ſteady in his affections, and equalled by few in the ſocial and domeſtic virtues of politeneſs, modeſty, candour and benevolence. He married the widow of col. Francis Alexander, a daughter of Sir Henry Newton, knt. envoy extraordinary to the court of Florence and the republic of Genoa, and judge of the high court of admiralty."

Over the inſcription is this epitaph:

Whilſt Britain boaſts her empire o'er the deep,
This marble ſhall compel the brave to weep;
As men, as Britons, and as ſoldiers mourn,
'Tis dauntleſs, loyal, virtuous Beauclerk's urn.
Sweet were his manners, as his ſoul was great,
And ripe his worth, tho' immature his fate;
Each tender grace that joy and love inſpires,
Living, he mingled with his martial fires;
Dying, he bid Britannia's thunder roar;
And Spain ſtill felt him, when he breath'd no more.

PERCEY KIRK, Eſq;

A beautiful buſt of this gentleman is repreſented, on each ſide of which is a winged ſeraph; the one having a dagger in his right-hand inverted, and on his left a helmet; the other reſting on a ball, and holding in his left-hand a torch reverſed. It appears, by the inſcription, that he was lieutenant general of his majeſty's armies, that he died January 1, 1741, aged 57; and that he was ſon to Percey Kirk, eſq; lieutenant general in the reign of king James II. by the lady Mary, daughter to George Howard, earl of Suffolk. Diana Dormer, his niece, and ſole heireſs, died Feb. 22, 1743, in the 33d year of her age.

RICHARD KANE.

The moſt particular circumſtances attending this gentleman's life are inſcribed on a handſome pedeſtal, over which is a beautiful buſt of white marble. In 1689 he firſt appeared in a military capacity at the memorable ſiege of Derry; and after the reduction of Ireland followed king William into Flanders, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf, particularly by his intrepid behaviour at the ſiege of Manure, where he was greatly wounded. In 1702 he bore a commiſſion in the ſervice of queen Anne, and aſſiſted in the expedition to Canada; from whence he again returned into Flanders, and fought under the duke of Argyle and Greenwich, and afterwards under lord Carpenter. In 1712 he was made ſub-governor of Minorca, through which iſland he cauſed a road to be made, which had been thought impracticable. In 1720 he was ordered by king George I. to the defence of Gibraltar, where he ſuſtained an eight months ſiege againſt the Spaniards, when all hope of relief was extinguiſhed. King George II. afterwards rewarded him with the government of Minorca, where he died December 19, 1736.

SAM. BRADFORD. S. T. P.

This monument was erected to the memory of biſhop Bradford; on it is a long latin inſcription almoſt unintelligible, and ſurrounded with the arms and proper enſigns of his ſeveral dignities. He was ſome time rector of St. Mary-le-Bow; and from thence advanced to the ſee of Carliſle, and afterwards tranſlated to that of Rocheſter, with the deanery of this church, and that of the honourable order of the Bath annexed. He died May 14, 1731, aged 79.

Dr. BOULTER, biſhop of Armagh.

This monument is of the fineſt marble, and after a new invented poliſh; and the buſt is ſaid to be a cloſe copy of the original. The enſigns of his dignity, wherewith it is ornamented, are moſt exquiſitely fine. The inſcription is incloſed in a beautiful border of porphyry, and is as follows:
"Dr. Hugh Boulter, late archbiſhop of Armagh,
"primate of all Ireland; a prelate ſo emi-
"nent for the accompliſhments of his mind, the "purity of his heart, and the excellence of his "life, that it may be thought ſuperfluous to ſpe-
"cify his titles, recount his virtues, or even "erect a monument to his fame. His titles he "not only deſerved, but adorned; his virtues are "manifeſt in his good works, which had never "dazzled the public eye, if they had not been "too bright to be concealed; and as to his fame,
"whoſoever has any ſenſe of merit, any reverence
"for piety, any paſſion for his country, or any "charity for mankind, will aſſiſt in preſerving it
"fair

" fair and ſpotleſs, that when braſs and marble
" ſhall mix with the duſt they cover, every ſuc-
" ceeding age may have the benefit of his il-
" luſtrious example. He was born Jan. 4, 1671;
" was conſecrated biſhop of Briſtol, 1718; tran-
" ſlated to the archbiſhopric of Armagh, 1723;
" and from thence to Heaven, Sep. 27, 1742."

PHILIP DE SAUMAREZ, Eſq;

In gratitude and affection to the above gentleman was this monument erected by his brothers and ſiſters. He was in the ſervice of the navy twenty-one years, in which time he underwent many great dangers and difficulties. In his majeſty's ſhip the Centurion, he went out a lieutenant under the auſpicious conduct of commodore Anſon in his expedition to the South-ſeas, of which ſhip he was commanding officer when ſhe was driven from her moorings at the iſle of Tinian. In the year 1746, being captain of the Nottingham, a 60 gun ſhip, he, then alone, attacked and took the mars, a French ſhip of 64 guns. In the firſt engagement of the following year, when admiral Anſon defeated and took a ſquadron of French men of war and Indiamen, he had an honourable ſhare; and in the ſecond under admiral Hawke, when the enemy after a long and obſtinate reſiſtance, was again routed; in purſuing two ſhips that were making their eſcape, he glorioufly but unfortunately fell. He was the ſon of Matthew de Saumarez, of the iſland of Guernſey, eſq; by Ann Durell, of the iſland of Jerſey, his wife. He was born November 17, 1710; killed October 14, 1747, and buried in the old church at Plymouth.

JOHN BLOW, doctor in muſic.

This gentleman was organiſt, compoſer, and maſter of the children, in the chapel royal 25 years; he was ſcholar to Dr. Chriſtopher Gibbons; and maſter to the famous Mr. Purcell, and to moſt of the eminent maſters of his time. Under the tomb is a canon in four parts ſet to muſic, and adorned with cherubs and flowers. He died October 1, 1708, aged 60.

WILLIAM CROFT.

In baſs relief, on the pedeſtal of this monument, is an organ, and on the top a handſome buſt of the deceaſed, who was a doctor in muſic, maſter of the children, and organiſt and compoſer of the chapel royal, and organiſt of this abbey. He died Auguſt 14, 1727, in the 50th year of his age.

TEMPLE WEST, Eſq;

To preſerve to poſterity the fame and example of ſo valuable a man, this monument was erected by his lady in the year 1761. In the moſt early part of his life he dedicated his time to the naval ſervice of his country, and by his courage and integrity, ſoon advanced himſelf to the rank of vice-admiral of the white. He was ſagacious, active, induſtrious: as a ſkilful ſeaman, he was cool, intrepid, and reſolute. In the ſignal victory obtained over the French; May 3, 1747, he was captain of the ſhip which carried Sir Peter Warren; and acquired peculiar honour even on that day of general glory. In the leſs ſucceſsful engagement near Minorca, May 20, 1756, wherein, as rear-admiral, he commanded the ſecond diviſion, his diſtinguiſhed courage and animating example were admired by the whole Britiſh ſquadron; confeſſed by that of France; and rewarded by the warmeſt applauſes of his country, and the juſt approbation of his ſovereign. On the 17th of November following he was appointed one of the lords commiſſioners of the admiralty, and adorned his ſtation by a modeſty which concealed from him his own merit; and a candor which diſpoſed him to reward that of others. To the frank and generous ſpirit of an officer, he added the eaſe and politeneſs of a gentleman; and with the moral and ſocial virtues of a good man, he exerciſed the duties of a chriſtian. He died in the year 1737, aged 43.

RICHARD LE NEVE, Eſq;

The arms of this gentleman are placed on the top of a very heavy deſign, adorned with inſtruments of war. It appears by the inſcription, that being made commander of his majeſty's ſhip the Edgar, he was unfortunately killed in a ſharp engagement with the Hollanders, Auguſt 11, 1673, in the 28th year of his age.

Adjoining to this is a beautiful monument lately erected to the memory of

Sir EDMUND PRIDEAUX.

It has a long inſcription which runs thus: " Near this monument, in one grave, in the middle iſle, are depoſited the remains of Sir Edmund Prideaux, of Netherton, in the county of Devon, bart. and dame Ann his wife. He departed this life, Feb. 26, 1728, in the 55th year of his age; and ſhe the 10th of May 1741, aged 55 years. Sir Edmund married firſt Mary, daughter of Samuel Reynardſon, eſq; by whom he had iſſue Mary, married to James Winſtanley, eſq; afterwards he married the abovementioned Ann, daughter of Philip Hawkins, of Pennans in the county of Cornwall, gent. They had iſſue, one ſon named Peter, who died in his infancy, and one daughter Ann, married to John Pendarves Baſſet, of Tehiddy, in the county of Cornwall, eſq; who, ſurviving her father and mother, cauſed this monument to be erected to their memory."

CHARLES WILLIAMS Eſq;

This monument is ſupported by a death's head on the wings of Time, and the ſcroll-work and ſcolloping is very curious. The inſcription ſays, that he was of a Caerleon in Monmouthſhire, a ſtrenuous defender of the church, and a good and generous man. He died Aug. 29, 1720. aged 87.

Dr.

Dr. PETER HEYLIN.

On the top of this monument is a pediment, and the arms of the above gentleman ſculped; on the baſe the ſame arms with that of his lady, quarrerly. It has a long latin inſcription, importing, that he was born at Burford in Oxfordſhire, November 29, 1599; educated at Hart-hall, Oxon; was fellow of Magdalen, and recommended to Laud when biſhop of Bath and Wells. He was firſt chaplain to the earl of Danby, then to the king. In 1631 he was made prebendary of Weſtminſter, to the great mortification of Dean Williams, and had the rich parſonage of Houghton-in-the-ſpring, Durham, conferred upon him. He was afterwards rector of ſouth Warnborough in Hants, and a juſtice of peace for that county. In 1642 he was clerk to the convocation, and proſecuted by Williams, Prynne, and others, who forced him to retire to Oxford, where he wrote Mercurius Aulicus. In 1643 he was ſequeſtered by parliament, his valuable library ſold, and he forced to fly for fear of ſharing the ſame fate with his patron Laud. Being betrayed at Winchester, he eſcaped in diſguiſe, and turned farmer at Minſter Lovel, Oxfordſhire, where he wrote his geography. On the reſtoration he was reinſtated in his former preferments, but never roſe higher than ſub-dean of this church. He was remarkable for his ſtrength of memory, ſolid judgment, and great elocution; but being of a fiery temper and undaunted courage, he was equally hated by papiſts and puritans. He died May 8, 1662, in the 63d year of his age.

ROBERT, Lord CONSTABLE.

The compoſition of this monument is a beautiful piece of architecture, ornamented with a cherub below, and the family arms and creſt on the top. In the front is the following inſcrip- " tion: " near this lies the right hon. Robert " Lord Conſtable, viſcount Dunbar, who de- " parted this life November 23, 1714, in the " 64th year of his age. Alſo his ſecond wife, the " right hon. Dorothy Brudenel, counteſs of " Weſtmoreland, who departed this life Jan. 26, " 1739, aged 91."

THO. LEVINGSTON, viſcount Teviot.

This monument is principally decorated with the arms, ſupporters, and creſt of the above nobleman: on the top are military trophies, alluding to his profeſſion as a ſoldier. In the front is a long latin inſcription, informing us that he was born in Holland, but deſcended from the Levington's in Scotland; that from his childhood he was trained to arms; that he attended the prince of Orange into Britain, as a colonel of foot; that he roſe to the rank of a lieutenant-general in the army, and general of the Scotch forces, was made maſter of the ordnance and privy-counſellor; that he ſecured Scotland to the king, by one deciſive action on the Spey, for which he was advanced to the dignity of viſcount; and that he died January 14, 1710, aged 60.

EDWARD DE CARTERET.

The ornaments of this neat monument are cherubs, with feſtoons of leaves and fruit finely emboſſed. The child to whoſe name it is inſcribed was ſon to Sir Edward de Carteret, gentleman uſher to king Charles II. and died October 30, 1677, in the 8th year of his age.

PHILIP CARTERET.

Over the monument is the buſt of this noble youth, who was ſon to lord George Carteret, and died a king's ſcholar at Weſtminſter, March 19, 1710, aged 19. Here is a moſt beautiful figure of Time, ſtanding on an altar, and holding a ſcroll in his hand, whereon is written in ſaphic verſe, lines to the following import, which he is ſuppoſed to be repeating:

Why flow the mornful muſe's tear,
For thee! cut down in life's full prime?
Why ſighs, for thee, the parent dear;
Crop'd by the ſcythe of hoary Time?

Lo! this my boys the common lot!—
To me thy memory entruſt;
When all that's dear ſhall be forgot,
I'll guard thy venerable duſt.

From age to age as I proclaim
Thy learning, piety, and truth;
Thy great example ſhall enflame,
And emulation raiſe in youth.

HENRY PRIESTMAN.

On this monument is a fine medallion ſuſpended by a knot of ribbons, faſtened to a pyramid of various colour'd marble, with the words Henry Prieſtman, eſquire, round the head. Under which are naval trophies and ſea inſtruments moſt beautifully ſculped; and on the baſe is an inſcription, ſhewing that the perſon to whoſe memory this monument is erected, was commander in chief of a ſquadron of ſhips of war in the reign of king Charles II. a commiſſioner of the navy, and one of the commiſſioners for executing the office of lord high-admiral of England, in the reign of king William III. He died Auguſt 20, 1712, in the 65th year of his age.

JOHN BAKER, Eſq;

This is a roſtral column of curiouſly veined marble, enriched with the prows of galleys, a Meduſa's head and other naval and military trophies: under which is the following ſhort epitaph: " To " the memory of John Baker, eſq; vice-admiral " of the white ſquadron of the Britiſh fleet, who, " when he commanded in the Mediterranean, " died at Port-Mahon, November 10, 1716, " aged 56. He was a brave, judicious, and ex- " perienced officer; a ſincere friend, and a true " lover of his country. Manet poſt Funera " Virtus."

GILBERT THORNBOROUGH, Esq;

To the memory of an honest courtier, who was faithful to his God, his prince, and his friends, was this monument erected. He died the 6th of October, 1677, aged 56.

RICHARD MEAD, M. D.

This gentleman was of an ancient family, in the county of Bucks, physician in ordinary to his majesty, fellow of the royal college of physicians, and of the royal society, London; a great promoter of the Foundling Hospital, and well known to the world by his learned writings. He died the 14th of March, 1754, in the 71st. year of his age.

ROB. and RICH. CHOLMONDELEY.

On this monument is a latin inscription, signifying, that the second and fourth sons of Robert viscount Cholmondeley lie here interred; Robert was a king's scholar, and died the 14th of February 1678, aged 14; Richard, June 9, 1680.

EDWARD MANSELL.

This monument is inscribed to the above gentleman, who was eldest son of Sir Edward Mansell, of Margan in Glamorganshire, bart. He died June 20, 1681, aged 15.

EDWARD HERBERT, Esq;

On a tablet of white marble, adjoining to a pillar, is a long inscription in English, describing the descent of this gentleman, who is buried in a coffin of lead at the feet of the pillar to which it is fixed. He was lineally descended from Sir George Herbert, of Swanzey, in Glamorganshire, first sheriff of that county after the union of the principality of Wales, in 1542. He died September 18, 1715, aged 23.

THO. MANSEL, and W. MORGAN.

This monument is double, being two oval tables between three wreathed pillars, neatly ornamented and inscribed; the first to the memory of Thomas Mansel, eldest son of Bussy Mansel, of Britten Ferry, in Glamorganshire, who died December 13, 1684, aged 38. The other, to William Morgan, of Tredegar, in Monmouthshire, who died Feb. 1, 1683, in the nineteenth year of his age.

Mrs. JANE STOVEVILLE.

This lady is here represented on a pedestal in the ancient dress of her time: she appears, by the inscription, to have been daughter to Thomas Stoveville, of Brinkley, in Cambridgeshire, and wife first to Edward Ellis, of Chesterton, and then to Othowell Hill, doctor of civil laws, and chancellor of the diocese of Lincoln, whose widow she died April 27, 1631, in the 78th year of her age.

Mrs. MARY BEAUFOY,

The principle figure on this monument is represented in a devout posture, with cherubs crowning her: on each side are Cupid's lamenting the only decay of Virgin Beauty. And underneath the arms of her family quarterly upheld by cherubs. On the base is the following inscription: "Reader! whoever thou art, let the sight "of this tomb imprint in thy mind, that young "and old, without distinction, leave this world; "and therefore fail not to secure the next." She was only daughter and heiress to Sir Henry Beaufoy of Guyscliffe near Warwick, by the hon. Charlotte Lane, eldest daughter of George lord viscount Lansborough, and died the 12th of July, 1705.

ROBERT KILLEGREW.

The singularity of this piece of sculpture arises from its being cut out of one stone. The embellishments are distinct and very picturesque; and the inscription modest and soldier like: "Ro-"bert Killegrew of Arwenack in Cornwall, esq; "son of Thomas and Charlotte; page of ho-"nour to king Charles II. brigadier-general of "her majesty's forces, killed in Spain in the bat-"tle of Almanza, April 14. 1707, ætatis suæ "47. Militavi annis 24," that is, he fought for his country 24 years.

Col. JAMES BRINGFIELD.

This gentleman was born at Abingdon in Berks, was equery to prince George of Denmark, and aid de camp to the great duke of Marlborough: he was killed by a cannon ball as he was remounting his general on a French horse at the battle of Ramilies, May 12, 1706, and was interred at Barecham, in the province of Brabant, in the 57th year of his age. The monument is ornamented with military trophies, cherubs, &c. and surrounded by a mantling enclosing a tablet, on which is written the deceased's military preferments, the manner of his death and burial, and praises of his piety and virtue.

HENEAGE TWISDEN.

The architecture of this monument is plain, but very neat. It was erected to the memory of a young hero, who fell in the battle of Blairgnes in Hainault, while he was aid de camp to John duke of Argyle, who commanded the right wing of the confederate army. He was seventh son to Sir William Twisden, bart. and a youth of the greatest expectations, had not the fortune of war put an early stop to his rising merit, in the 29th year of his age, 1709. Near this are small monuments to the memory of two of his brothers, Josiah and John; Josiah was a captain at the siege of Agremont, near Lisle in Flanders, and killed by a cannon shot in 1708, aged 23. John was a lieutenant in the admiral's ship under Sir Cloudesly Shovel, and perished with him 1707, aged 24.

Over

Over this is a ſmall monument erected to the memory of

WILLIAM LEVINZ, Eſq;

It reſembles a ſarcophagus, and on the front of it is the following inſcription: "To the memory "of William Levinz, eſq; grandſon of Sir Creſ- "well Levinz, knt. who was attorney-general "in the reign of king Charles II. and afterwards "one of the juſtices of the Common pleas, from "which ſtation he was diſplaced in the reign of "king James II. for oppoſing the diſpenſing "power; and was one of the council for the ſe- "ven biſhops. William Levinz, eſq; the ſon of "Sir Creſwell, repreſented the county of Not- "tingham in parliament, as did his ſon William "Levinz, eſq; till the year 1747, when he was "appointed a commiſſioner of his majeſty's cuſ- "toms, and in the year 1763, receiver general "of the ſaid revenue, in which office he died "upon the 17th of Auguſt 1765, aged 52 years."

JOHN WOODWARD, M. D.

The figures on this monument are well executed. The head of the deceaſed (who was profeſſor of phyſic in Greſham College) in profile is very maſterly, and the lady that holds it inimitable. The inſcription, which is ſmall, ſeems to be a panegyric on thoſe great parts and learning that entitled him to the diſtinction he received. He died in May 1728, aged 63.

MARTHA PRICE.

The enrichments of this monument are fruit, flowers, and foliage; and the inſcription ſays, that ſhe was wife to Gervaſe Price, eſq; who ſerved king Charles II. in the double capacity of ſerjeant-trumpeter, and gentleman of the bows. She died April 7, 1678, aged 37.

ANNE, counteſs dowager of Clanrikard.

The carving on this monument is beautiful, and the effigy of the lady reſting on a tomb admirably well executed. The inſcription is as follows:

"Here lies the right honourable Anne, coun- "teſs dowager of Clanrickard, eldeſt daughter "of John Smith, eſq; who is interred near this "place. She married firſt Hugh Parker, eſq; "eldeſt ſon of Sir Henry Parker of Honnington, "in the county of Warwick, baronet; by whom "ſhe had the preſent Sir Henry John Parker, "baronet, three other ſons and three daughters. "By her ſecond huſband Michael Clanrikard, of "the kingdom of Ireland, the head of the an- "cient and noble family of the Burkes, ſhe had "Smith now earl of Clanrikard, and two daugh- "ters, lady Anne, and lady Mary. The above- "ſaid counteſs died on the 14th of Jan. 1732, "in the 49th year of her age."

JAMES EGERTON.

This monument was erected to the memory of the above gentleman's ſon by his ſecond wife, Elizabeth, daughter to Henry Murray, eſq; one of the gentlemen of the bedchamber to king Charles I. He died April 13, 1687, in the 9th year of his age.

PENELOPE EGERTON.

There is nothing remarkable in this monument more than the inſcription, which informs us, that this lady for whom it was erected was daughter to Robert lord Needham, viſcount Kilmurry, and wife to Randolph Egerton, of Betley, in Cheſhire, an eminent loyaliſt, major-general of horſe to king Charles I. and lieutenant-colonel to king Charles the ſecond's own troop of guards. She died in child-bed April 19, 1670.

Sir GODFREY KNELLER, knt. and bart.

On this monument is a buſt of the above gentleman under a canopy of ſtate, the curtains of which are finely gilt and tied up with golden ſtrings; and on each ſide the buſt is a weeping cherub, one reſting on a framed picture, the other holding a painter's pallet and pencils. On the pedeſtal is a latin inſcription, ſhewing, that Sir Godfrey Kneller, knt. who lies interred here, was painter to king Charles II. king James II. and king William III. queen Anne, and king George I. born in 1646, died 1723, aged 77. He was knighted March 3, 1691, and created a baronet, May 24, 1715. Among his moſt excellent works are the beauties of the court of king Charles II. now to be ſeen at Hampton-court. This monument was deſigned by Sir Godfrey himſelf. Underneath is the following epitaph written by Mr. Pope:

Kneller! by heav'n and not a maſter taught!
Whoſe art was nature and whoſe picture thought;
Now for two ages having ſnatch'd from fate
Whate'er was beauteous or whate'er was great,
Reſts crown'd with princes honours, poets lays,
Due to his merit, and brave thirſt of praiſe.
Living, great nature feared he might outvie
Her works; and dying, fears herſelf may die.

WILLIAM HORNECK, Eſq;

The embelliſhments of this monument conſiſt in books, plans, and inſtruments of fortification, alluding to the employment of the deceaſed. He was chief engineer to the royal train, and, according to the inſcription, learned the art of war under the great duke of Marlborough. He died the 23d of April 1746, in the 62d year of his age.

JOHN CONDUIT, Eſq;

This monument is little inferior to that of Sir Thomas Hardy, knt. and by the manner of the workmanſhip, they appear both to have been executed by the ſame hand. In the middle of the pyramid is a large medallion of braſs, reſting on a cherub below; and ſuſpended by another at top, top. Round the medal is a latin inſcription, the Engliſh of which is thus:

JOHN CONDUIT, MASTER OF THE MINT.

This gentleman ſucceeded his relation, Sir Iſaac Newton, in that office, and deſired to be buried near him, as appears by a long latin inſcription on the baſe. He died May 23, 1727, aged 49. Catharine his wife died January 20, 1739, aged 59, and lies interred in the ſame tomb.

Having now given a deſcription of all the monuments within this antique building, and brought the reader back to the place from whence we firſt led him, we ſhall croſs the iſle, and proceed to give a deſcription of ſuch as are material

In the Cloiſters.

At the bottom of the ſouth-walk, on the right hand, lie the remains of four abbots, diſtinguiſhed in the pavement by four ſtones.

The firſt is of black marble, called Long Meg, from its extraordinary length of eleven feet, eight inches, and covers the aſhes of Gervaſius de Blois, natural ſon to king Stephen, who died in 1666.

The ſecond is a raiſed ſtone of Suſſex marble, under which lies interred the abbot Laurentius, who died in 1176, and is ſaid to have been the firſt who obtained from pope Alexander III. the privilege of uſing the mitre, ring, and globe.

The third is a ſtone of grey marble, to the memory of Geſlebertus Criſpinus, who died in the year 1114. His effigy may be ſtill traced on his grave ſtone by the fragments of his mitre and paſtoral ſtaff.

The fourth is the moſt ancient of all, and was formerly covered with plates of braſs inſcribed to the abbot Vitales, who died in 1082. All theſe ſeem to have had their names and dates cut afreſh, and are indeed fragments worthy preſervation.

Directly oppoſite theſe againſt the wall, at the bottom of the eaſt walk, is the following inſcription, which for the purity of the diction, and the propriety and elegance of the compoſition, exceeds every other in the whole arch.

Reader,
If thou art a Briton,
Behold this tomb with reverence and regret;
Here lieth the remains of
DANIEL PULTENEY,
The kindeſt relation, the trueſt friend,
The warmeſt patriot, the worthieſt man;
He exerciſed virtue in this age,
Sufficient to have diſtinguiſh'd him even in the beſt.
Sagacious by nature,
Induſtrious by habit,
Inquiſitive with Art;
He gain'd a compleat knowledge of the ſtate of Britain;
Foreign and domeſtic.
In moſt the backward fruit of tedious experience,
In him the early acquiſition of undiſſipated youth.
He ſerved the court ſeveral years:
Abroad, in the auſpicious reign of queen Anne,
At home, in the reign of that excellent prince king George I.
He ſerved his country always,
At court independent,
In the ſenate unbias'd,
At every age and in every ſtation:
This was the bent of his generous ſoul,
This the buſineſs of his laborious life.
Public men, and public things,
He judged by one conſtant ſtandard,
The true intereſt of Britain;
He made no other diſtinction of party,
He abhorred all other;
Gentle, humane, diſintereſted, beneficent,
He created no enemies on his own account:
Firm, determin'd, inflexible,
He feared none he could create in the cauſe of Britain.
Reader,
In this misfortune of thy country lament thy own.
For know,
The loſs of ſo much private virtue
Is a public calamity.

Adjoining to the abbey wall, near the eaſt-end of the north walk, is an epitaph inſcribed to the memory of the reverend William Laurence. As it is ſomewhat ſingular we ſhall here recite it:

With diligence and truſt moſt exemplary,
Did William Laurence ſerve a prebendary;
And for his pains, now paſt, before not loſt,
Gain'd this remembrance at his maſter's coſt.
O! read theſe lines again, you ſeldom find
A ſervant faithful and his maſter kind.
Short-hand he wrote, his flower in prime did fade,
And haſty death ſhort-hand of him hath made.
Well couth he numbers, and well meaſure land,
Thus doth he now that ground whereon we ſtand,
Wherein he lies ſo geometrical;
Art maketh ſome, but thus will nature all.
Ob. Dec. 28, 1621, Ætat. 29.

In the centre of the eaſt walk, adjoining to the wall, is a monument lately erected to the memory of George Walſh, eſq; on which is the following inſcription: "near this place are depo-
" ſited the remains of George Walſh, eſq; late
" lieutenant-general of his majeſty's forces, and
" colonel of the 49th regiment of foot, who " died October 23, 1761, aged 73.

" The toils of life and pangs of death are o'er,
" And care and pain and ſickneſs are no more."

There are many other monuments in theſe walks; but as they have not any thing particular to diſtinguiſh them, and would be tedious to the reader, we ſhall paſs them over; and, after reciting a ſingular circumſtance, which was omitted in its proper place, ſhall proceed to the next chapter.

In Henry the VIIth's chapel, on the right hand is a ſmall place encloſed, called the duke of Richmond's chapel, in which are two coffins: the one contains the remains of the envoy of Savoy; the other thoſe of the ambaſſador from the court of Spain, both of whom was never interred, owing to their corpſe being arreſted by their creditors in the time of king James the firſt.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Farther incorporation of the Taylors. Great fire on London-bridge. Expence of the city charters being confirmed. Henry VII*th's charter againſt foreigners buying goods to ſell. He diſcharges a number of priſoners for debt. His death. Acceſſion of Henry* VIII. to the throne. Execution of Empſon and Dudley. Parade of the city watch. King and queen attend to ſee the proceſſion. Sir William Fitzwilliam diſfranchiſed. Moorfields levelled, and bridges erected. Empannelling city juries. Incloſures deſtroyed by rioters. Remarkable great froſt. Celebration of May-day. Occaſion of its being afterwards called Evil-May-day. Great diſturbances. Many of the rioters condemned, but only one executed. Citizens addreſs the king. Upwards of four hundred priſoners brought before the king in Weſtminſter-hall. At the inſtigation of the nobility they are pardoned.

IN the year 1503, the company of Taylors having very conſiderably increaſed, purchaſed a charter of the king, by which they obtained the title of Merchant-Taylors of the city of London.

On the twenty-firſt of November, the ſame year, a dreadful fire broke out at the north-end of London bridge, which made great devaſtation; and on the ſeventh of January following, many houſes were burnt down in Thames-ſtreet.

In the year 1505 the citizens complimented the king with five thouſand marks as an acknowledgment for his granting them the confirmation of their liberties. Great care was taken in this act to prevent encroachments being made by foreigners on the franchiſes and cuſtoms of the city. This charter of Henry VII. which is dated the twenty-third of July 1505, contains, among many other particulars, the following:

" That of all time of which the memory of " man is not to the contrary, for the common- " wealth of the realm and city aforeſaid, it hath " been uſed, and by authority of parliament ap- " proved and confirmed, that no ſtranger, from " the liberty of the city, may buy or ſell from " any ſtranger from the liberties of the ſaid city, " any merchandize or wares within the liberties " of the ſame city, upon forfeiture of the ſame. " The ſaid mayor and commonalty, and citizens, " and their predeceſſors, by all the time afore- " ſaid, have had and received, and have been " accuſtomed to receive, perceive, and have, to " the uſe of the ſame mayor, commonalty, and " citizens, all and all manner of merchandizes " and wares bought and ſold within the liberties " of the ſame city as aforeſaid, . forfeitures " of the ſame merchandizes and wares, until of " late paſt time they were troubled or moleſted: " the ſame lord Henry the VIIth, by his letters " patent as aforeſaid, for pacifying and taking " away from henceforth controverſies and ambi- " guities in that behalf, and to fortify, and by " expreſs words to explain and declare the liber- " ty and cuſtom aforeſaid to them the ſaid may- " or and commonalty, and citizens, and their " heirs and ſucceſſors, and willing the ſaid liber- " ties to be peaceably and quietly had, poſſeſſed " and enjoyed to the ſaid mayor and commonalty, " and citizens, and their ſucceſſors, with the for- " feitures aforeſaid, againſt the ſaid late king " Henry, his heirs and ſucceſſors, granted, and " by his ſaid charter confirmed to the ſaid mayor, " and commonalty, and citizens, and their ſuc- " ceſſors, that no ſtranger from the liberties of " the ſame city may buy or ſell from any other " ſtranger to the liberty of the ſame city any " merchandizes or wares within the liberty of " the ſaid city: and if any ſtranger to the li- " berty of the ſame city, ſhall ſell or buy any " merchandizes or wares within the liberty of " the ſame city of any other ſtranger to the liber- " ty of the ſame city, that the ſame mayor, " commonalty, and citizens, and their ſucceſſors, " may have, hold, and receive, all and all " manner of ſuch like merchandizes and wares " ſo bought, and to be bought, ſold, or to be " ſold, within the liberty of the ſaid city, be- " tween whatſoever ſtrangers to the liberty of " the ſame city, as forfeited; and all the for- " feitures of the ſame, and alſo the penalties, " fines, and redemptions whatſoever any ways " forfeited, loſt, or to be loſt, or to be forfeited, " or due thereon, to the uſe and profit of the " ſame mayor and commonalty, and citizens, " their heirs and ſucceſſors, without any hindrance " of the ſame late king, his heirs and ſucceſſors; " any ſtatute, act, or ordinance, of us or our " progenitors, made to the contrary notwith- " ſtanding; although the ſame mayor and com- " monalty, and citizens of the ſaid city, or their " predeceſſors, have before that time uſed, abuſ- " ed, or not uſed thoſe cuſtoms and liberties: " ſaving always, that great men, lords and no- " bles, and other Engliſh and ſtrangers, of what " condition ſoever they be, may freely whatſoever " merchandize engroſs for their families and pro- " per uſes within the liberties of the ſaid city, " without any forfeitures, loſs, or hindrance " whatſoever, ſo that they do not ſell again the " ſaid merchandizes to any other. And further, " the ſaid late king, of his more ample grace, " by his ſaid letters patent, among other things, " did give and grant to the mayor, commonalty, " and citizens of the ſame city of London, and " their ſucceſſors, the office of gauger within the

" ſaid city, and the diſpoſing, ordering, ſurvey-
" ing, and correction of the ſame; to have,
" hold, exerciſe, and occupy the ſaid office and
" other premiſes, with all fees, profits, and " emoluments to the ſame office in any manner
" belonging or appertaining to the ſame mayor
" and commonalty, and citizens by themſelves,
" or by their ſufficient deputy or deputies, from
" the twenty-ſecond day of Auguſt, in the firſt
" year of his reign, for ever, without any ac" count to be made thereof, or any thing ren" dering and paying to the ſaid lord Henry the " VIIth, his heirs or ſucceſſors, as by the ſaid
" letters patents more plainly may appear."

In the year 1507, the king, having a remorſe of conſcience for the many exactions he had laid on the citizens, endeavoured to mitigate it by acts of benevolence. He diſcharged all the priſoners in London whoſe debts did not amount to more than forty ſhillings; endowed many religious foundations, and gave very conſiderable alms. Notwithſtanding which, he ſtill countenanced the extortions of Empſon and Dudley, two evil counſellors, who, under pretence of of abuſes committed two years before, ordered Thomas Kneſworth the mayor, and Roger Grove and Richard Shoare, his ſheriffs, to be taken to the marſhalſea priſon, and there detained till they ſhould advance the ſum of fourteen hundred pounds. Had not the death of the king intervened, the like fate would have befallen Sir Lawrence Aylemer and Sir William Capel, both of whom were fined two thouſand pounds. The king dying ſoon after, they were diſcharged from their confinement, and all arbitrary meaſures ſubſided.

King Henry VIII. ſucceeded his father, and was proclaimed king with the uſual ſolemnities, on the twenty-firſt of April, 1509. Two days after which he cauſed all foreign beggars to be baniſhed the city, and diſperſed to their reſpective pariſhes.

The king and queen, on the twentieth of June following, rode in great pomp from the Tower to Weſtminſter, and were moſt joyfully received by the Londoners. The city was adorned with rich ſilks and tapeſtry, and part of Cornhill, and Goldſmith's-row, in Cheapſide, with gold brocades. The Lord-mayor, aldermen, and ſheriffs, with the city companies, attended the proceſſion, and the whole was conducted with ſuch elegance as gave the higheſt ſatisfaction to the ſpectators.

The king, anxious to preſerve the affection of the citizens, committed Empſon and Dudley (his father's commiſſioners employed by him to raiſe money on penal laws) to the Tower; after which they were attainted by parliament, and beheaded on Tower-hill the eighteenth of Auguſt 1510. Many of their agents were expoſed on the pillory, and compelled to ride through the ſtreets with labels in their hats, and their faces to the horſe's tail, as a mark of that contempt their infamy deſerved.

Henry, diſguiſed in the habit of a yeoman of the guard, went into the city on the eve of St. John to ſee the grand cavalcade of the city watch. He was ſo highly pleaſed with the ſight, that he returned on St. Peter's eve, with his royal conſort, attended by the principal nobility, and ſtood in Cheapſide, where they ſaw the ſtately march. This ceremony was performed twice every year, viz. on the eve of St. John Baptiſt, and the feaſt of St. Peter and Paul. The manner of conducting this nocturnal parade was as follows: the city muſic followed by the Lord-mayor's officers in party-coloured liveries: the ſword bearer on horſeback, in beautiful armour, before the Lord-mayor, mounted on a ſtately horſe richly decorated, attended by a giant and two pages, on horſeback, three pageants, morice-dancers and footmen: after theſe came the ſheriffs, followed by their officers in proper liveries, and attended by their giants, pages, &c. then a conſiderable body of demi-lancers in bright armour, on ſtately horſes; theſe were followed by a great of number carabineers in fuſtian coats, with the city arms on their backs and breaſts; then marched a diviſion of archers, with their bows bent, and by their ſide ſhafts of arrows; after theſe a great number of halberdeers, preceded by a party of pikemen, croſlets and helmets; and the rear was brought up by a party of billmen with aprons and helmets of mail: the whole body conſiſted of about two thouſand men, in different diviſions, in each of which were properly fixed muſicians, drums, ſtandards, and enſigns. The march began at the conduit the weſt-end of Cheapſide, and paſſed through Cheapſide, the Poultry, Cornhill, and Leadenhall-ſtreet, to Aldgate; from whence it returned through Fenchurch-ſtreet, Gracechurch-ſtreet, Cornhill, and ſo back to the conduit again. The proceſſion was illuminated by nine hundred and forty large lanthorns fixed at the ends of poles, and carried on mens ſhoulders; two hundred of which were provided at the expence of the city; five hundred at that of the companies, and two hundred and forty by the city conſtables; excluſive of theſe a great number of lamps were hung againſt the houſes on each ſide the way, decorated with flowers and greens made into garlands. The whole formed a very pleaſing ſight, and gave the higheſt ſatisfaction to the royal pair.

This year Sir William Fitzwilliam, alderman of Breadſtreet-ward, was diſfranchiſed for refuſing to ſerve the office of ſheriff, and retired to Milton in Northamptonſhire. After which, being greatly eſteemed by the king, he made him knight of the garter, lord keeper of the privy-ſeal, and chancellor of the dutchy of Lancaſter, which places he enjoyed till his death.

In the year 1511 a ſcarcity of corn being apprehended, the Lord-mayor, Roger Achiley, cauſed Leadenhall (the city granary) to be plentifully ſtored with grain of all ſorts. In the ſame year he likewiſe levelled Moorfields, which extended from London-wall to Hoxton, and cauſed bridges and cauſeways to be erected for the greater convenience of paſſengers.

In the year 1512 a great fire broke out in the Tower, which conſumed the chapel in that part of it called the White-Tower.

This year an act of parliament paſſed by which the ſheriffs of London and Middleſex were empowered powered to empannel juries for the city courts, and each juror ſo empannelled, to be a citizen worth one hundred marks; and for non-appearance on his firſt ſummons to forfeit one ſhilling and eightpence, for the ſecond, three ſhillings and fourpence, and for every default afterwards double the ſum. A great mortality raged at this time, which took off a conſiderable number of the citizens, but whether peſtilential or not is uncertain.

In the year 1514, the inhabitants about Iſlington, Hoxton, and Shoreditch debarred the citizens from their accuſtomed exerciſes in thoſe fields, by encloſing their grounds. They were ſo enraged at this treatment, that, at the inſtigation of a fellow who ran about the ſtreets, crying ſpades and ſhovels, they aſſembled together in a large body, and with thoſe tools deſtroyed all the fences that had been ſo lately made. Commiſſioners were ſent into the city by his majeſty to know the cauſe of the tumult; and being met in Grey-friars, now called Chriſt's-Hoſpital, the lord-mayor and aldermen were ordered to attend to give an account of ſuch ſedition: they were ſeverely reprimanded, and ſtrictly enjoined to prevent all farther miſchief for the future, and preſerve the peace of the city.

In the year 1515 there was ſo great a froſt, that carriages of all ſorts paſſed on the ice between Weſtminſter and Lambeth.

The citizens preſerved an ancient cuſtom of celebrating May-day, by diverting themſelves in the neighbouring woods and fields. This amuſement became ſo univerſal, that the king and queen, on May-day in the morning, attended by many lords and ladies rode a maying from Greenwich to the top of Shooter's hill. Their majeſties were met by a number of tall yeomen clad in green, with green hoods and bows and arrows. Robin Hood, who was their captain; addreſſed the king to ſtop and ſee his men ſhoot, which they performed at a whiſtle with the greateſt dexterity: the arrows were ſo contrived, that when ſhot off, they alſo whiſtled, making a ſtrange and loud noiſe. After this the king and queen with their retinue, were conducted by Robin into the green wood, where, in harbours made with boughs, and decorated with flowers, they were plentifully entertained with wine and veniſon,

On May-day in the year 1517, an accident happened, which occaſioned it to be afterwards called Evil-may-day, It aroſe from the artificers thinking themſelves aggrieved by permitting ſtrangers to exerciſe their trades in London. In conſequence of which they prevailed on one Dr. Bell, or Bele, to ſupport their cauſe in the pulpit, at the Spital, on Tueſday in Eaſter week. He complied with their requeſt; and, after reading a bill of complaint given him by one John Lincolne, repreſenting the grievances of the merchants and artificers, he took for his text the following words: "The heavens to the lord of hea-"ven; but the earth is given to the children of "men." On this text he endeavoured to ſhew, that to Engliſhmen was this land given, and that, as birds defend their neſt, ſo ought Engliſhmen to cheriſh and maintain themſelves, and for the good of the commonwealth to hunt and drive out aliens. He affirmed, from another text, "Fight for your country," that by the laws of God they were juſtified, and therefore it was their duty to clear the city of ſtrangers. This ſermon had ſuch an effect on many weak minds, that they aſſaulted foreigners as they paſſed along the ſtreets: for which offence, on the twenty-eighth of April, Stephen Studley, Stephen Betts, and ſome others, who were principals, were committed by the Lord-mayor to priſon. Soon after which a report was ſpread, that the citizens intended, on May-day following, to deſtroy all ſtrangers that ſhould be found in the city, or its liberties.

The king's council hearing of this rumour, cardinal Wolſey ſent for the mayor, and adviſed him to be on his guard, and prevent the like diſturbances for the future. To effect which he ſummoned the aldermen, about four o'clock in the afternoon preceding May-day, to meet him at Guildhall immediately. The aſſembly being met, they, with the approbation of the cardinal, came to the following reſolution: that every man ſhould be commanded to ſhut up his doors, and keep his ſervants within. In conſequence of which, an order was made and publiſhed by the alderman of each reſpective ward, that no man after nine o'clock ſhould ſtir out of his houſe, but keep his doors ſhut, and his ſervants within till nine o'clock in the morning.

Before this order was properly diſperſed, it unluckily happened, that Sir John Mundy, in his way home, was rudely treated by two young men playing at bucklers in Cheap, one of whom he ordered to be ſent to the Compter. Many prentices who were by, reſcued the young man from the alderman, crying out, "Prentices! Pren-"tices! Clubs! Clubs!" on which ſo great a body aſſembled with clubs and other weapons, that the alderman was put to flight. Theſe were increaſed by a number of ſervingmen, watermen, and others; and by eleven o'clock at night there aſſembled in the Cheap about ſeven hundred, and in St. Paul's church-yard three hundred. They proceeded in a body to the Compter, which they broke open, and releaſed the rioters who had been committed there by the mayor for aſſaulting foreigners; after which they went to Newgate, and took out Studley and Betts committed for the like offence. A proclamation was iſſued by the mayor and ſheriffs, in the king's name, but without effect. The mob increaſing, they threw ſticks and ſtones at many ſtrangers as they paſſed, particularly one Nicholas Dennis, a ſerjeant at arms, who, being much wounded, cried out, "Down with them." This heightening their reſentment, they broke the windows and doors of the houſes in St. Martin's-le-grand, and plundered the houſe of one Mewtas, a Frenchman, in Leadenhall-ſtreet, whom they intended, had they met with him, to have deſtroyed. Early in the morning they diſperſed, from an apprehenſion of being overpowered by the forces preparing to march into the city, under the command of the earls of Shrewſbury and Surry. In this time, by the diligence of the mayor, three hundred of them were taken, and committed to the Tower, Newgate, and the Compters; and about five o'clock in the morning the riot ſubſided. Among thoſe committed to the Tower was Dr. Bell, for preaching his ſeditious ſermon. A commiſſion of oyer and terminer was immediately made out for the trials of the offenders, on the ſecond of May at Guildhall. On their arraignment they pleaded not guilty, and their trials were poſtponed till the fourth of May. The commiſſioners appointed for this purpoſe were the Lord-mayor, earl of Surry, and the duke of Norfolk, who came into the city eſcorted by thirteen hundred men; and the priſoners to the amount of two hundred and ſeventy eight, ſome men, ſome lads not exceeding fourteen years of age, were brought through the city tied with ropes. On the firſt day John Lincolne, and ſeveral others were indicted and found guilty; and the next day thirteen were condemned to be drawn, hanged and quartered. For this purpoſe, and to ſtrike a greater terror, ten pair of gallows were ſet up at the following places: Aldgate, Blanchapelon, Graſs-ſtreet, Leadenhall, oppoſite each Compter, Newgate, St. Martin's, Alderſgate, and Biſhopſgate. They were made to run on wheels for the better convenience of removing them to ſuch places as might be properly adapted for the execution of ſo many rioters. Some little time after ſentence was paſſed, Lincolne, Sherwin, and the two brothers named Betts, were drawn upon hurdles to the ſtandard in Cheapſide. The firſt was executed; but as the others were near being turned off, a reprieve came from the king, to the univerſal joy of the populace, who unanimouſly cried out, God ſave the king.

On the eleventh of May, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and recorder, dreſſed in mourning gowns, waited on the king, who then reſided at Greenwich; and being admitted to the door of the privy-chamber, from whence his majeſty came, attended by ſeveral of his nobles, the recorder, in the name of the reſt, falling on his knees, addreſſed the king in the following words:

"Moſt natural, benign, and our ſovereign "lord, we well know that your grace is highly "diſpleaſed with us of your city of London, for "the great riot done and committed there; "wherefore we aſſure your grace, that none of "us, nor no honeſt perſon were condeſcending "to that enomity: yet we, our wives and chil-"dren, every hour lament that your favour "ſhould be taken from us: and foraſmuch as "light and idle perſons were the doers of the "ſame, we moſt humbly beſeech your grace to "have mercy on us for our negligence, and com-"paſſion on the offenders for their offences and "treſpaſſes."

The king, in his anſwer, accuſed them of negligence in oppoſing the rioters, and conniving at their proceedings; therefore, ſaid he, "We "will neither grant you our favour nor good "will, nor to the offenders mercy: but reſort to "our lord chancellor, and he ſhall declare to you "our pleaſure."

The king being expected at Weſtminſter on the twenty-ſecond of May, they, by the direction of the chancellor, reſolved to wait upon him. Accordingly on that day the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and principal commoners attended in their liveries, when his majeſty, being ſeated under a canopy of ſtate at the upper end of the hall, ordered the priſoners to be brought before him. They were accordingly brought in their ſhirts, bound together with ropes and halters about their necks, to the number of four hundred men and eleven women; which ſight had ſuch an effect on the principal part of the nobility, that they warmly ſolicited the king for their pardon. Silence being proclaimed, and the city magiſtrates and commonalty ordered into the king's preſence, the cardinal chancellor reprimanded them for their negligence; and then, addreſſing himſelf to the priſoners, ſaid, that for their offences againſt the laws of the realm, and againſt his majeſty's crown and dignity, they had incurred the puniſhment of death. On the cloſe of theſe words, the people, with piteous lamentation, cried out, "mercy, gracious Lord, mercy." This wrought ſo effectually on the king, that he yielded to the intreaties of his courtiers, and pronounced them pardon. Their halters were immediately taken off, and the people with one voice cried out, "God ſave the king." Theſe rioters were called the Black-waggon, and the day on which the riot firſt began was from that time called Evil-May-Day.

One Richard Roſe boiled in Smithfield for murder. Grand entertainments at Ely-houſe. New teſtament tranſlated. Afterwards burnt. Henry VIII. divorced. His marriage with Anne Boleyn. Proceſſion of the queen to Weſtminſter. Her coronation.

IN the year 1517-18 an act was paſſed by the common-council of London for erecting a court of conſcience, in which it was enacted, "that the Lord-mayor and aldermen, for the "time being, ſhould monthly aſſign and appoint "two aldermen and four diſcreet commoners to "ſit at Guildhall in a judicial manner, twice a "week, viz. on Wedneſdays and Saturdays, there "to hear and determine all matters brought be-"fore them between party and party, being "citizens and freemen of London, in all caſes, "where the due debt or damage did not exceed "forty

" forty ſhillings." It was intended to continue only two years; but the utility of it being very evident, it remained in force till the reign of James I. when it was finally eſtabliſhed by act of parliament.

At this time the ſweating ſickneſs raged again violently in London, which took off a great number of the citizens.

The citizens of London finding great inconveniencies from their ſeſſions of peace being held in the monaſtery of St. Martin's-le-Grand, a foreign liberty, petitioned Henry VIII to repeal that part of Edward the third's charter; to which his majeſty graciouſly condeſcending, granted them the following charter:

" Henry, by the grace of God, king of Eng" land and France, and lord of Ireland, to all to " whom theſe preſents ſhall come, greeting.

" Whereas Edward the third, ſometime king
" of England our progenitor, by his letters pa-
" tents, amongſt other things, has granted to the " citizens of the city of London, that all inqui-
" ſitions from hence, to be taken by the juſtices,
" and other the miniſters of the men of the ſaid
" city, ſhould be taken at Great St. Martin's in " London, and not elſewhere, except inqui-
" ſitions to be taken in circuits in the Tower
" of London, and for the goal delivery of New" gate.

" Know ye, that we, for ſome urgent cauſes
" reaſonable us moving, at the petition of the " mayor and commonalty aforeſaid, and of the " citizens of the ſame city, have, of our ſpecial
" grace, and from our certain knowledge and " mere motion, granted, and by theſe preſents
" do, for us and our heirs (as much as in us is)
" grant to the ſaid mayor and commonalty, and
" unto their ſucceſſors, and unto the ſame citi" zens of the ſame city, that all inquiſitions by
" the juſtices or other our miniſters, or of our " heirs, to be from henceforth taken of the men
" of our city aforeſaid, ſhall be taken at the " Guildhall, within the city aforeſaid, or at any " other place within the ſame city, where it ſhall
" from time to time be thought to our juſtices
" for the time being, before whom thoſe inqui-
" ſitions ought hereafter to be taken, moſt expe-
" dient and moſt convenient, and not elſewhere,
" except inquiſitions to be taken at the circuits
" of the Tower of London, and for the goal-
" delivery of Newgate. In witneſs whereof we " have cauſed theſe our letters to be made pa-
" tents. Witneſs myſelf at Weſtminſter, the " ſixteenth day of June, in the tenth year of our
" reign."

On the twenty-third of September 1519, king Henry VIII. granted the phyſicians a charter of incorporation to enable them to frame proper regulations for practitioners. By this charter they were allowed a common ſeal, and to chuſe a preſident annually; to purchaſe lands and tenements, and to make laws for the government and correction of their college, and of all thoſe who practiſed phyſic within ſeven miles of London; to chooſe four perſons annually to inſpect and govern the whole body, and thoſe who offended by neglect in their medicines or receipts to be puniſhed by fines and impriſonment: and that the preſident and all the members of the college ſhould be exempted from ſerving on juries.

In the year 1521 an infectious diſtemper raged in London, which took off a conſiderable number of its inhabitants; and corn was ſo ſcarce, that wheat ſold for twenty ſhillings the quarter, which at that time was a great price.

In the year 1522 the emperor Charles V. came into England on a viſit to king Henry, who with his queen, and principal nobles, received him at Greenwich, and conducted him from the palace there to London, which on this occaſion was decorated with the moſt pompous ornaments, and a variety of magnificent pageants. On their entrance into the city the Lord-mayor, aldermen and ſheriffs received them in their formalities, attended by the principal citizens on horſeback richly accoutred: they were conducted through the city to Black Friars, which was the place adopted for the reſidence of the emperor, and the princes and nobility of his retinue to theirs in the new palace at Bridewell.

In the following year Henry received a viſit from Chriſtian king of Denmark and his queen. On their arrival they were received by the mayor and citizens, who conducted them with great ſplendor to the biſhop of Bath's palace, which was appointed for their reſidence. St. Peter's Eve happening at the time of their ſtay in London, their majeſties, attended by the princial nobility went to ſee the pompous march of the city watch; for which purpoſe they were conducted to the king's head in Cheapſide, and afterwards elegantly entertained by Sir Thomas Baldry, the mayor.

The king at this time being in great want of money, cardinal Wolſey, his prime miniſter, iſſued out commiſſions in his majeſty's name for levying the ſixth part of all the goods and chattels of the laity, and a fourth of thoſe of the clergy. The people were ſo incenſed at this arbitrary proceeding, as to be almoſt ripe for an open rebellion; which coming to the king's ears he was ſo much affected that he openly diſavowed the cardinal's irregularities, and ſent a letter to the mayor and citizens of London, in which he declared that he would not exact or demand any thing of them by compulſion, but by way of benevolence. In conſequence of this the cardinal ſent for the mayor, and aldermen, and expoſtulated with them on his majeſty's gracious condeſcenſion in remitting the payments of a ſixth of all their effects; and inſtead thereof had only appointed them to pay a certain benevolence; he therefore deſired them to return and make proper aſſeſſments in their reſpective wards for raiſing the ſame. The recorder replied, that ſuch benevolences had been aboliſhed by the firſt of Richard III. To which the cardinal anſwered, " that Richard was " an uſurper and tyrant, a murderer, and one of " the greateſt criminals: that he had no power
" to make a law; and that no act made by ſuch
" a wretch could be binding; therefore the city's " argument was trifling and of none effect."
Wolſey then tried what he could do with the magiſtrates ſeparately: to effect which he began with the Lord-mayor, who honeſtly told him he could give no anſwer to ſuch a queſtion without the conſultation of the common-council. He then deſired the mayor and aldermen, in their private capacities, to contribute what they thought proper. The magiſtrates, however, remained inflexible, but ſubmitted ſo far as to communicate his requeſt to the common-council, who ſo ſtrongly reſented it, that the court moved for expelling three of their members for ſpeaking in favour of ſo great an impoſition, and broke up without coming to any reſolution. Thus, by the vigilance of the city of London againſt the iniquitous ſchemes of miniſterial power, was the oppreſſive method propoſed by cardinal Wolſey to raiſe money without conſent of parliament, entirely brought to nought.

At this time the plague raged ſo violently in London, that his majeſty removed to Eltham; the term was poſtponed, and the city ſo much deſerted by its inhabitants, that the feſtival of Chriſt's nativity was that year called the ſtill Chriſtmas.

In the year 1526 the citizens finding themſelves greatly hurt by foreigners who had purchaſed licences for the importation of woad, applied to the mayor and common council, who enacted, that for the future no citizen ſhould preſume to buy, ſell, or have any intercourſe with foreign importers of woad.

The following year a moſt dreadful famine happened in the city, owing to the ſcarcity of corn, by which many citizens periſhed. But by an immediate ſupply from his majeſty of one thouſand quarters of corn, and the great importation of wheat and rye from Dantzick, they were ſooner relieved from their diſtreſs than any other part of the kingdom.

This year a public entry was made by two French ambaſſadors extraordinary, into this city. Apartments were provided for them and their attendants in the biſhop of London's palace; at which place they were preſented by the mayor, in the name of the citizens, with five fat oxen, twenty ſheep, twelve ſwans, twelve cranes, twelve pheaſants, four dozen of partridges, twenty ſugar loaves, all ſorts of ſpices, and eight hogſheads of wine.

On the firſt of June an act of common-council was paſſed, whereby it was agreed, ordained and enacted, "that if hereafter any freeman or free-"woman of this city take an apprentice, and "within the term of ſeven years ſuffer the ſame "apprentice to go at his large liberty and plea-"ſure; and within and after the ſaid term agree "with his ſaid apprentice for a certain ſum of "money, or otherwiſe, for his ſaid ſervice, and "within, or after the end of the ſaid term, the "ſaid freeman preſent the ſaid apprentice to the "chamberlain of the city, and by good delibe-"ration, and upon his oath made to the ſame city, "the ſame freeman or freewoman aſſureth and af-"firmeth to the ſaid chamberlain, that the ſaid "apprentice hath fully ſerved his ſaid term as "apprentice: or if any freeman or freewoman of "this city take any apprentice, which, at the "time of the ſaid taking, hath any wife: or if "any freeman or freewoman of this city give any "wages to his or her apprentice, or ſuffer the "ſaid apprentices to take any part of their own "getting or gains: or if any freeman or free-"woman of this city hereafter colour any foreign "goods, or from henceforth buy or ſell for any "perſon or perſons, or with or to any perſon or "perſons, being foreign or foreigners, cloths, "ſilks, wine, oils, or any other goods or mer-"chandize, whatſoever they be, whether he take "any thing or things for his or their wages or la-"bour, or not: if any perſon or perſons, being "free of this city, by any colour or deceitful "means, from henceforth do buy, ſell, or receive "of any apprentice within this city any money, "goods, merchandize, or wares, without the "aſſent or licence of his maſter or miſtreſs: and, "upon examination, duly proved before the "chamberlain of the ſaid city for the time being, "and the ſame reported, by the mouth of the "ſaid chamberlain, at a court to be holden by the "mayor and aldermen of the ſaid city in their "council chamber: that as well the ſaid maſter, "as the ſaid apprentice, ſhall for ever more be "diſfranchiſed."

To which act the following inſtructions were added.

"Ye ſhall conſtantly and devoutly on your "knees, every day, ſerve God, morning and "evening, and make conſcience in the due "hearing of the word preached, and endeavour "the right practice thereof in your life and con-"verſation. You ſhall do diligent and faithful "ſervice to your maſter for the time of your "apprenticeſhip, and deal truly in what you "ſhall be truſted. You ſhall often read over "the covenants of your indenture, and ſee and "endeavour yourſelf to perform the ſame to the "utmoſt of your power. You ſhall avoid all "evil company, and all occaſions which may "tend to draw you to the ſame; and make "ſpeedy return, when you ſhall be ſent of your "maſter's or miſtreſs's buſineſs. You ſhall be of "fair, gentle, and lowly ſpeech and behaviour "towards all men; eſpecially to all your go-"vernors. And according to your carriage ex-"pect your reward, for good or ill, from God "and your friends."

In the year 1528 the ſweating ſickneſs broke out again in this city ſo violent, that a great number of people died within ſix hours after its firſt appearance. This occaſioned the adjournment of the term, and the ſuſpenſion of the annual ſolemnity of the city watch, which was afterwards, by order of the king, diſcontinued till the ſecond of Edward VI.

The following year a court of juſtice was erected in Black Friars for trying the legality of the king's marriage with his royal conſort queen Catharine. In which ſat, as judges, the legates Campejus and cardinal Wolſey; the latter of whom was deprived of the chancellorſhip in October the ſame year.

From the proceedings of this court was the firſt advance made in England toward the work of reformation. The king took ſuch diſguſt at the the pope, that he iſſued out an edict prohibiting all commercial intercourſe with the ſee of Rome.

This year Whitehall was fixed as the chief reſidence of the Engliſh monarchs, and continued ſo till they were burnt out in 1697. Before this it was called York-place. It was originally built by Hubert de Burgh, earl of Kent, who dying in 1243, left it to the Black Friars in Chancery-lane, Holborn; after which it was purchaſed by Walter de Gray, archbiſhop of York; he bequeathed it to his ſucceſſors in that ſee as their city manſion for ever. In conſequence of which Cardinal Wolſey became poſſeſſed of it, and with the approbation of the chapter of York, made a feoffment thereof to the king, from which it was called the king's manor of Weſtminſter.

In the year 1531 Richard Roſe, cook to the biſhop of Rocheſter, was boiled to death in Smithfield for poiſoning ſixteen people with porridge: it was intended for his maſter, who luckly eſcaped it, owing to a want of appetite.

A grand entertainment was this year made at Ely-houſe by eleven gentlemen of the law, on their promotion to the dignity of the coif: it continued five days, and the gueſts were, the king, queen, foreign miniſters, lord mayor, judges, maſter of the rolls, maſters in chancery, aldermen, ſerjeants at law, principal merchants, and the livery. To ſhew the diſparity between that time and this, reſpecting the price of proviſions, we ſhall inſert the following, which is part of the bill of fare.

At this time the people became very zealous for the work of reformation; and indeed it was highly encouraged at court, though not without conſiderable oppoſition from the clergy. A tranſlation of the New Teſtament was now publiſhed by Tindall and others; but the biſhop of London obtained as many copies of them as he could and cauſed them to be burnt at St. Paul's Croſs. The biſhop ſoon after this attempting to aſk contribution from his parochial clergy towards paying 100,000l which had been granted to the king, the city clergy reſented it ſo much, that they forced themſelves into the chapter-houſe of St. Paul's, where they beat and abuſed the biſhop's ſervants. This intimidated the biſhop ſo much, that he forgave them, and deſired them to part peaceably. After this he applied to the lord chancellor for redreſs; and by his order fifteen prieſts, with their accomplices, were ſeized by the Lord-mayor, and committed to priſon, where they continued for a conſiderable time.

The king was ſo highly pleaſed with the citizens of London in concurring with his meaſures to throw off the Romiſh yoke, that, as a teſtimony of his regard and affection, he confirmed to them many former grants by the following charter:

" Henry the eighth, by the grace of God, " king of England and France, defender of the " faith, and lord of Ireland, to all to whom " theſe preſents ſhall come, greeting.

" Whereas we, by our letters patents, the " date whereof is the eighteenth day of June, " in the thirteenth year of our reign, have of " our ſpecial grace, and from our certain know- " ledge and mere motion, given and granted, for " us and our heirs, for as much as in us then " was, to Sir William Sidney, knt. the office of " the keeper of the great beam and common ba- " lance or weight within our city of London, for " weighing of all merchandizes of avoirdupoiſe, " and alſo all weights whatſoever within the ſame " city, which office one William Stafford, deceaſ- " ed, lately exerciſed and occupied, by what " name ſoever the ſaid office was named or known. In the year 1532, king Henry, fearful of the conſequences that might ariſe from his intended blow on the pope's ſupremacy, and deſirous of knowing his own ſtrength, ordered a general muſter to be made of the moſt defenſible men within the city of London, from the age of ſixteen to ſixty, to be held at Mile-end; with an account of the weapons, armour, and other military accoutrements belonging to the city. In compliance with this requeſt of his majeſty, the citizens were cloathed in white, with caps and feathers of the like colour; and the Lord-mayor, aldermen, recorder and ſheriffs were dreſſed in white armour with black velvet coats, on which were embroidered the city arms; they were mounted on beautiful horſes richly capariſoned, had gold chains about their necks, velvet caps on their heads, and in their right hands were gilt battle axes. They were attended by proper ſervants richly dreſſed, and mounted on horſeback, and the whole formed a very pleaſing ſight.

On the day appointed, early in the morning, the muſter was made, and before nine o'clock, they began to march, entering at Aldgate, and proceeding through London to Weſtminſter, where they were reviewed by the king and his nobles, who expreſſed great ſatisfaction at ſo ſplendid an appearance; from thence they returned round St. James's Park, down Holborn, to Leadenhall, where the proceſſion cloſed about five in the afternoon.

On the divorcement of queen Catharine, his majeſty eſpouſed Anne Boleyn, or Boloine; and intending her coronation, ordered the Lord-mayor to make all neceſſary preparations for conducting her majeſty from Greenwich to the Tower by water; and likewiſe that the city might be magnificently adorned againſt her proceeding from thence to Weſtminſter.

In compliance with the royal precept, the Lord-mayor ordered all the city companies to attend him at Billingſgate on the twenty-ninth of May, at a fixed hour, with their barges properly decorated, and good bands of muſic. In conſequence of which fifty barges were prepared, and about one o'clock ſet off to attend the Lord-mayor's barge, which was richly ornamented, with ſtrict orders to keep at leaſt twice their lengths aſunder.

The city barge was preceded by one mounted with ordnance, carrying figures of ſavages, dragons, and other hideous creatures vomiting out fire and ſmoak, and making an inceſſant noiſe. The city barge was covered with gold brocades, and ſilken ſails, with two rich ſtandards of the king's and queen's arms at the head and ſtern, with a great variety of ſtreamers and flags, containing the company's arms and thoſe of the merchant-adventurers; and the ſhrouds and rattlings were hung with a great number of ſmall bells, which produced a very pleaſing noiſe. On the left of this was a barge exhibiting a mount, on which ſtood a white falcon crowned, perched on a golden ſtump encircled with red and white roſes, the queen's emblem; and round the mount ſat beautiful virgins ſinging and playing melodiouſly. After theſe followed all the companies barges in their proper order. The queen was ſo highly pleaſed at this grand proceſſion, that on her arrival at the Tower, ſhe returned the mayor and citizens her hearty thanks for their magnificent attendance.

Two days after, in her majeſty's proceſſion from the Tower of London, through the city to Weſtminſter, ſhe was received at the Tower-gate by the Lord-mayor in a gown of crimſon velvet, and a rich collar of SS. attended by the ſheriffs and two domeſtics in red and white damaſk. From the Tower to Temple-bar the ſtreets were new gravelled, and railed in on each ſide; within which, near Gracechurch, ſtood the Anſeatic merchants, and next to them the ſeveral corporations of the city in their reſpective formalities, reaching to the aldermens ſtation at the farther end of Cheapſide. On the other ſide were placed the city conſtables, dreſſed in ſilk and velvet, with ſtaves in their hands to keep off the croud, and prevent diſturbances. Gracechurch-ſtreet and Cornhill were hung with crimſon and ſcarlet cloth, and Goldſmiths Row in Cheapſide with velvet and gold brocades.

Twelve of the French ambaſſador's ſervants preceded the proceſſion; they were dreſſed in blue velvet, mounted on horſes trapped with blue ſarſenets interſperſed with white croſſes; after whom marched thoſe of the equeſtrian order, two and two, followed by the judges in their robes; after them the knights of the Bath, in violet gowns trimmed with meniver; then the abbots, barons, biſhops, earls and marquiſes in their robes, two and two; after theſe the lord chancellor, venetian ambaſſador, and archbiſhop of York; next the ambaſſador of France and the archbiſhop of Canterbury, followed by two gentlemen who repreſented the dukes of Normandy and Aquitain; then proceeded the Lord-mayor of London with his mace, and Garter in his coat of arms; then the duke of Suffolk, lord high ſteward, and the lord Howard as deputy-marſhal of England; next followed all the other great officers of ſtate in their robes, carrying the ſymbols of their ſeveral offices; theſe were followed by the nobility in crimſon velvet, and all the queen's officers in ſcarlet, followed by her chancellor uncovered, who immediately preceded his miſtreſs ſitting in a litter or chair covered with tiſſue of ſilver, and drawn by two beautiful pads cloathed in white damaſk, and led by her footmen. Her majeſty was dreſſed in a ſilver brocade, with a mantle of the ſame furred with ermine. Her hair hung looſe, and on her head was a chaplet adorned with jewels of ineſtimable value. Over the litter was a canopy of cloth of gold, ſupported by ſixteen knights alternately, four at a time, with a ſilver bell hanging at each corner. Her majeſty's chamberlain followed next, and after him her maſter of horſe leading a ſtately pad with a ſide ſaddle, and trappings of ſilver tiſſue; next to theſe came ſeven ladies in crimſon velvet, faced with gold brocade, and mounted on beautiful horſes richly trapped with gold; theſe were followed by two chariots covered with cloth of gold, in which were the dutcheſs of Norfolk, and marchioneſs of Dorſet in the firſt, and in the ſecond four ladies in crimſon velvet; next came ſeveral ladies in the ſame apparel on horſeback, adorned with beautiful trappings, then a third chariot all in white, carrying ſix ladies in crimſon velvet; then a fourth all in red, in which were eight ladies in the ſame dreſs; then thirty gentlewomen, attendants on the ladies of honour, on horſeback, dreſſed in ſilks and velvets; and the whole was cloſed by the guards well mounted and elegantly accoutred.

On her majeſty's arrival in Fenchurch-ſtreet ſhe ſtopped at a beautiful pageant, crowded with children in mercatorial habits; who, addreſſing themſelves to her majeſty, congratulated her on her happy arrival. She then proceeded to Gracechurch corner, where was erected a magnificent pageant, repreſenting Parnaſſus, with the fountain of Helicon, in white marble, from which were four ſprings iſſuing out Rheniſh wine, which centered in a ſmall globe at the ſummit, and continued running plentifully all day: on the mount ſat Apollo, and at his feet Caliope; under whom were the reſt of the muſes playing on muſical inſtruments; and at their feet were inſcribed, in letters of gold, epigrams adapted for the occaſion.

At Leadenhall was another ſtately pageant, repreſenting a hillock encompaſſed with red and white roſes; above which was a golden ſtump, and a little higher a tippe with a celeſtial roſe, from which deſcended a white falcon, which perched on the ſtump; this was ſoon followed by an angel in a celeſtial choir who put a crown of gold upon his head. On the hillock, a little lower, ſat St. Anne, ſurrounded by her progeny, one of whom addreſſed the queen in a ſpeech, wiſhing her majeſty bleſſed with a happy iſſue.

At the conduit in Cornhill the graces ſat enthroned, with a fountain before them inceſſantly playing with wine, and underneath a poet deſcribing their peculiar qualities, and preſenting the queen with their ſeveral preſents. The great conduit oppoſite Mercer's-hall in Cheapſide, was beautifully painted with a variety of curious emblems, and which, for the entertainment of the populace, ran all day with a diverſity of rich wines. The ſtandard in Woodſtreet was beautifully ornamented with royal protraitures, encompaſſed by a number of flags, on which were painted coats of arms and trophies; and above was a fine concert of muſic, both vocal and inſtrumental. When her majeſty arrived at the aldermens ſtation near the little conduit at the upper end of Cheapſide, John Baker, the recorder, after addreſſing her with an elegant ſpeech, preſented her, in the name of the citizens, with a purſe of golden tiſſue, containing one thouſand marks, which her majeſty gratefully received. On the little conduit, in a rich pageant, were ſeated Pallas, Juno and Venus; before whom ſtood Mercury, who, in their names preſented the queen with a golden ball trebly divided, repreſenting the three gifts of Wiſdom, Riches, and Felicity. At the gate of St. Paul's a ſtately pageant preſented itſelf; in which three ladies ſumptuouſly dreſſed, with chaplets on their heads, exhibited various inſcriptions adapted for the occaſion. As her majeſty paſſed St. Paul's ſchool, ſhe was highly entertained with verſes made by the ſcholars in praiſe of herſelf and the king.

Ludgate was on this occaſion beautifully ornamented; and on the top were men and boys ſinging in concert during the proceſſion. At the end of Shoe-lane, Fleet-ſtreet was erected a handſome tower with four turrets, in each of which ſtood a cardinal virtue, and their ſymbols; who, addreſſing themſelves to the queen, promiſed never to leave her, but be always her conſtant attendants; the conduit ran all the time with variety of wines, and in the tower was a fine concert of muſic. At Temple-bar her majeſty was again entertained with ſongs ſung in concert by men and boys; and proceeding from thence to Weſtminſter, ſhe there diſmiſſed the Lord-mayor, returning him her ſincere and hearty thanks for his good offices, and thoſe of the citizens that day.

The day after being appointed for her majeſty's coronation, the Lord-mayor and aldermen attended the ceremony in their proper ſtations, and in the ſame dreſſes, as the preceding day. The king, as a mark of gratitude and affection to the citizens, on the Wedneſday following, invited the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and forty of the principals to the chriſtening of his daughter the princeſs Elizabeth.

The magiſtrates of the city of London had till now permitted foreign butchers to bring their meat on Wedneſdays and Saturdays to Leadenhall-ſtreet, and to ſell it on ſtalls before the citizens houſes, who made conſiderable advantage of the ground on which they ſtood: but it being now thought that the city revenue might be greatly augmented by erecting ſtalls in Leadenhall, and obliging all butchers to repair to them, it was ordered, by the court of aldermen, that they ſhould ſell their meat in Leadenhall-market, and no where elſe.

IN the year 1534 John Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, and Sir Thomas More, lord chancellor, was committed to the Tower for objecting to ſwear to the act of ſucceſſion, particularly that part of it wherein the marriage with queen Catharine was declared to be unlawful; and likewiſe to another act that paſſed afterwards for the king's ſupremacy, and for aboliſhing the pope's power in this kingdom; for which they were attainted by parliament, and both executed on Tower-hill; the biſhop in June 1535, and Sir Thomas the month following.

The following year a conduit was erected, by the contribution of the public, on the ſouth ſide of the ſtreet, juſt without Aldgate, to receive water from Hackney, for the convenience of the inhabitants in that part of the city. In the ſame year an act was paſſed for paving the high ſtreets from Holborn-bridge to the bars, to be kept in repair at the expence of the ground-landlords.

By an act of parliament paſſed this year for the better conſervation of the river Thames, it was enacted, "that if any perſon or perſons do, "or procure any thing to be done, in the annoying of the ſtream of the ſaid river of Thames, "making of ſhelfs by any manner of means, by "mining digging, caſting of dung, or rubbiſh "or any other thing into the ſaid river, or "take, pluck, or convey any boards, ſtakes, "piles, timber work, or other thing, from "the ſaid banks or walls, (except it be to "amend, and the ſame to repair again) or dig, "or undermine any banks or walls, on the water-"ſide of the Thames aforeſaid, to the hurt, im-"pairing, or damage, of the ſaid walls or banks, "then the ſaid perſon or perſons, and every of "them, ſhall forfeit and pay for every thing ſo "offending, 100s. one moiety thereof to be to the "king, and the other moiety thereof to the mayor "and commonalty of the city of London, by "bill or complaint, writ of debt, or information, "ſeverally againſt every offender, in any of the "king's courts in which actions and ſuits, or any "of them, the party defendant ſhall not be aſ-"ſoigned, or wage his law, or any protection to "be allowed the ſame." And it was further enacted, "that if any perſon that ſhall have the "office and ordering of ballaſting of ſhips near "the ſaid river of Thames, and do not take for "parcel of the ſaid ballaſting, the gravel and "ſand of the ſhelfs between Greenwich and "Richmond, within the ſaid river of Thames, "or in any place or places, that is or ſhall be "unto the damage or annoyance of the ſaid river "of Thames, or in any part thereof, that then, "upon every ſuch complaint, the lord chancel-"lor, lord treaſurer, lord preſident of the king's "moſt honourable council, lord privy ſeal, and "every of them, calling both the juſtices of "either bench, or one of them, ſhall have power "and authority from time to time to hear and "finally determine every ſuch complaint by their "diſcretion, and to put ſuch order therein, for "the taking of ballaſt for ſhips upon every ſuch "complaint, as by their diſcretion ſhall ſeem moſt "convenient for the preſervation of the ſaid river "of Thames; and the parties offending ſuch "order ſhall ſuffer impriſonment, and be fined "five pounds to the king's uſe, for every time "offending or breaking the ſame. With this "proviſo, that any perſon may dig, carry, and "take away ſand, gravel or rubbiſh, earth, or "thing

" thing, lying or being in or upon any ſhelve or " ſhelfs within the ſaid river of the Thames."

In the month of May, in the year 1536 queen Anne Boleyn, ſecond wife to king Henry VIII. was beheaded on the green within the Tower of London.

On the twenty-firſt of October 1537, king Henry, by the miniſtry of his vicar-general Cromwell, ordered the church of St. Thomas of Acres, otherwiſe Thomas of Becket, in London, to be ſuppreſſed. On the 16th of November, the Black-friars; and on the 17th the White-friars, the Grey-friars, and the Carthuſian-monks of the Charter-houſe, underwent the ſame fate.

The common council of the city of London paſſed an act in purſuance of the ſtatute of the twenty-ſeventh of Henry VIII. for the conſervation of the river Thames, whereby it was enacted, "that proclamation ſhould be made within " this city, and the ſame to be put in writing, " and tables thereof made, and ſet up in divers " places of this city, that it ſhall be lawful to " every perſon to dig, carry away, and take away " ſand, gravel, or any rubbiſh, earth, or any " thing, lying and being in any ſhelve or ſhelfts " within the ſaid river of Thames, without let " or interruption of any perſon, and without any " thing paying for the ſame: and after that to " ſell the ſame away, or otherwiſe to occupy or " diſpoſe of the ſaid gravel, ſand, or other thing, " at their free liberty and pleaſure. And that all " paviours, bricklayers, tylers, maſons, and all " others, that occupy ſand or gravel, ſhall en- " deavour themſelves, with all diligence, to oc- " cupy the ſaid ſand or gravel, and none other, " paying for the ſame reaſonably, as they ſhould " and ought to pay for other ſand or gravel, dig- " ged out of other men's grounds about the ſaid " city. That further application be made to " his majeſty, that all perſons having lands or " tenements along the ſaid river ſide, ſhall well " and ſufficiently repair and maintain all the walls " and banks adjoining unto their ſaid lands, ſo " that the water may not, nor ſhall break in upon " the ſame. And that ſtrong grates of iron " along the ſaid water-ſide, and alſo by the ſtreet- " ſide, where any water courſe is had into the " ſaid Thames, be made by the inhabitants of " each ward, ſo along the ſaid water, as of old " times has been accuſtomed: and that every " grate be in height twenty-four inches at the " leaſt, as the place ſhall need; and in breadth " one from another one inch." And further, " that if the occupiers of the ſaid lands and te- " nements made default contrary to the ordinance " aforeſaid, or elſe if any perſon or perſons, in " great rains or at other times, ſweep their ſoil- " age, or filth of their houſes, into the channel, " and the ſame afterwards is conveyed into the " Thames, every perſon ſo offending ſhall for- " feit for every ſuch default 1s. 8d. and that " upon complaint to be made to any conſtable " next adjoining to the ſaid place, where any " ſuch default ſhall be found, or his ſufficient " deputy for the time being, from time to time, " to diſtrain for the ſaid offence, and to retain " the ſame irreplagiable. And a like law to be " kept and obſerved, and like penalty to be paid " by every perſon that burns aſhes and ſtraw in " their houſes, or waſh in the common-ſtreets or " lanes, and to be recovered as aforeſaid; and " one moiety thereof to be to the Lord-mayor and " commonalty, and the other moiety between the " conſtable and the informer: and that the con- " ſtable that ſhall refuſe to do his duty in this " caſe, ſhall pay 3s. 4d. for every offence, re- " coverable in the ſame manner, and for the ſame " uſes. And that no perſon or perſons, having " a wharf or houſe by the water-ſide, ſhall make " their lay-ſtalls where the common rakers of " this city uſe to lay all their ſoilage, to be car- " ried away by them in their dung-boats: and " that the ſaid rakers ſhall lay their dung to be " carried away in boats, at ſuch places as ſhall be " appointed by the Lord mayor and the court of " aldermen, under the penalty of five pounds for " every offence." Which act or ordinance is ſtill in force.

King Henry having ſuſpected the conſequences of throwing off the ſpiritual yoke of Rome, and finding that the pope had ſtirred up the emperor and the French king againſt him, began to prepare for the worſt; for which purpoſe he fortified the coaſts of his kingdom, put his navy in thorough repair, and ordered another general muſter to be made, at Mile-end, of all the citizens from the age of ſixteen to ſixty. Excluſive of pioneers and other attendants, this army, conſiſting of three diviſions of 5000 men each, marched through the city to Weſtminſter, where they were reviewed by the king, queen, and nobles, who expreſſed great ſatisfaction at ſo ſplendid and numerous a body. This was the greateſt muſter that ever was made by the citizens of London.

In conſideration of the great wiſdom and diſcretion of Paul Wythyn Pool, an order of common-council was made on the 22d of October 1539, by which he was empowered to be preſent at all common-councils, and elections of mayors and ſheriffs. An honour never before conferred on any unqualified citizen.

The king, having reſtrained the annual cuſtom of the city watch, owing to its great expence, endeavoured to preſerve the manly exerciſe of ſhooting, by granting a charter to the company of archers, who were called the fraternity of St. George; by which they had a power to uſe and exerciſe ſhooting at all manner of marks as well in the city as ſuburbs, with long bows, croſs bows, and hand-guns: with this clauſe, that in caſe any perſons were ſhot and ſlain in theſe ſports by ſome arrow ſhot by theſe archers, he was not to be ſued or moleſted, if he had, immediately before he ſhot, uſed that common word Faſt. The chieftain of theſe archers was called prince Arthur, and the reſt of them his knights. The principal place of exerciſing their ſport was Mile-end, where they were frequently honoured with the preſence of the king himſelf.

The river Thames was at this time ſo empty, owing to an exceſſive drought, that the ſalt water flowed above London-bridge. At the ſame time the uſeful art of making leaden pipes without uſing ſolder, for the conveyance of water underground was invented by Robert Brock, chaplain to the king.

In the year 1542 the Houſe of Commons having ſent their ſerjeant at arms to demand the releaſement of George Ferrars, member of Plymouth, who had been arreſted at the ſuit of one White, for two hundred marks, the ſheriffs and their officers belonging to the Compter, then ſituated in Bread-ſtreet, aſſaulted the ſaid ſerjeant at arms, and broke his mace: for which they were ordered to attend the houſe; when, after a ſevere reprimand for their contempt, the ſheriffs and White were committed priſoners to the Tower; one of their clerks to a room in the ſaid place called little eaſe; and the arreſting officer, with four others, to Newgate; where they continued for a conſiderable time, till, by the interpoſition of the Lord-mayor, and the perſeverance of many friends, they were, by an order of the houſe, diſcharged.

The king at this time firſt granted a privilege for printing the bible in Engliſh to a bookſeller in London. In the ſame year an act of parliament paſſed, by which it was enacted, that Algate-high-ſtreet, (from the gate to Whitechapel church) Chancery-lane, High-holbourn, (from the bars eaſtward to St. Giles's) Gray's-in-lane, Shoe-lane and Fetter-lane, ſhould be paved with ſtone, as other ſtreets were in the city.

In the year 1543 ſo great a mortality raged among the horned cattle that meat became exceſſive dear. To remedy which the Lord-mayor and common council made a ſumptuary law for preventing luxurious eating, whereby it was ordained, that the Lord-mayor ſhould not have more than ſeven diſhes at either dinner or ſupper; the aldermen and ſheriffs no more than ſix; the ſword-bearer, four; and the mayor and ſheriffs officers three; on the penalty of forty ſhillings for every ſupernumerary diſh. And by the ſame authority it was enacted, that neither the mayor, aldermen, nor ſheriffs ſhould, after the enſuing Eaſter, buy cranes, ſwans, or buſtards, on the penalty of twenty ſhillings for every fowl ſo bought.

Another act of parliament paſſed this year, by which it was enacted, that the ſtreets called Whitecroſs-ſtreet, Chiſwell-ſtreet, Grub-ſtreet, Shoreditch, Goſwell-ſtreet, St. John's-ſtreet, Cowcroſs-ſtreet, Wych-ſtreet, Holywell-ſtreet, near St. Clements Danes, the Strand, from Temple-bar to Strand-bridge, Petty-france in Weſtminſter, Water-lane in Fleet-ſtreet, Long-lane in Smithfield, and the Butcher-row without Temple-bar, ſhould be paved with ſtone, and a channel made in the middle, at the expence of the ground landlords in each ſtreet. And it was further enacted, "that the Lord-mayor, aldermen, &c. "of London ſhall have power to enquire into, "hear, and determine the defaults of paving, and "reparation of ſtreets; and that any three juſ-"tices in London, whereof the mayor to be one, "may ſet fine upon ſuch as do not pave and re-"pair any ſtreet in London, or the liberties "thereof, to be levied by diſtreſs or action, &c. "by the chamberlain, to the uſe of the mayor "and commonalty of the ſaid city." And it was further enacted, "that the conduits of London "ſhould be made and repaired, for the better "watering of the city and its liberties; and that "the mayor and citizens ſhould have power to "bring water to the ſaid conduits from Hampſtead-"heath, St. Mary-le-bone, Hackney, and Muſ-"well-hill, upon their indemnifying the owners "of lands for damages that might be done by "the ſaid water-courſes, &c."

This year the plague raged ſo violently in London, that a great number of citizens died, and the term was adjourned to St. Alban's.

In the year 1544 died Sir John Allen, Lord-mayor of London, and privy-counſellor to the king. He gave a rich collar of gold to be worn by his ſucceſſors, and five hundred marks to be ſtock for ſea-coal; and the rents of his lands he diſtributed to the poor in each ward for ever. He was buried at St. Thomas of Acres, in a chapel built by himſelf. The manner of this gentleman's funeral was very different from that of Margaret Atkinſon, who by her will, dated October 18, in the ſame year, appointed, that, on the Sunday after her interment, a collation ſhould be provided by her executors for the entertainment of her fellow pariſhioners, to conſiſt of two dozen of bread, a kilderkin of ale, two gammons of bacon, three ſhoulders of mutton, and four rabbits, to be eaten in the church, on a table for that purpoſe provided.

The king being in great diſtreſs for money to carry on the war with Scotland, the twelve companies lent him 21,263l. 6s. 8d. on mortgage of crown lands, for that purpoſe. This not being ſufficient his majeſty afterwards ſent commiſſioners into the city to aſſeſs the Londoners in an arbitrary manner by way of benevolence. To this arbitrary proceeding Richard Read, an alderman, not only objected; but abſolutely refuſed paying the ſum demanded; for which he was preſſed, and ſent to Scotland to ſerve as a common ſoldier; where he was taken priſoner, and, after undergoing great hardſhips, was compelled to pay a conſiderable ranſom for his liberty.

This year an act of parliament paſſed, in which it was enacted, that every perſon poſſeſſed of four hundred marks in real and perſonal eſtate, was properly qualified to ſerve on the grand jury. And the ſame parliament enacted that every citizen and inhabitant within the city and liberty thereof ſhould, for every ten ſhillings annual rent, pay to the vicars of their reſpective pariſhes one ſhilling and four-pence, and two ſhillings and nine pence for every rent of twenty ſhillings; and ſo in proportion as the rents might be higher.

The citizens, who had before rejected the king's requeſt, and thereby incurred his diſpleaſure, now recovered his affection, by voluntarily fitting out one thouſand foot, at their own expence, to reinforce the army in France. In conſequence of this aſſiſtance peace was proclaimed between England and France, on Whitſunday, in the year 1546. On this occaſion a ſolemn proceſſion was made from St. Paul's church to Leadenhall, and back again. It conſiſted of a number of men carrying the parochial ſilver croſſes, followed by the pariſh clerks, choriſters, and prieſts in London, together with the choir of St. Paul's in their richeſt copes, followed by the different companies of the city in their liveries; and the proceſſion was cloſed by the Lord-mayor and aldermen dreſſed in their ſcarlet robes.

Claude Annebaut, high-admiral of France, and the French ambaſſador extraordinary, after having made his public entry into London, was, by the citizens, preſented with four large ſilver flagons, richly gilt, with many other valuables.

The better to enforce the powers granted by a late act of parliament for ſupplying the city with water, the common-council this year granted two fifteenths for erecting a conduit in Lothbury, which was built near St. Margaret's church; and to bring water from Dame-Annis-the-clear, at the ſouth-eaſt entrance of the village of Hoxton.

The earl of Surry, eldeſt ſon to the duke of Norfolk, was tried by a common jury at Guildhall, before the Lord-mayor, for high treaſon, and notwithſtanding the excellent defence he made, was convicted, condemned, and executed on Tower-hill. His father was ſo near ſharing the ſame fate, that the warrant for his execution had been ſent to the lieutenant of the Tower, but the king dying between the date of the warrant and the execution, his life was preſerved.

King Henry VIII. having diſſolved the priory and old hoſpital of St. Bartholomew in Smithfield, he, in the laſt year of his reign, founded it anew, and endowed it with the annual revenue of five hundred marks, on condition that the city ſhould pay an equal ſum. The propoſal being accepted, the new foundation was incorporated by the name of "The hoſpital of the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London, governors for the poor, called Little St. Bartholomew's, near Weſt-Smithfield."

The coronation of Edward VI. being appointed on the twenty-fourth of February, his majeſty, attended by the nobility, rode on horſeback, in the greateſt pomp, from the Tower of London to Weſtminſter. The ſtreets on this occaſion were ſumptuouſly adorned, and in divers places were erected the moſt ſtately pageants. At St. Paul's his majeſty was particularly diverted by a Spaniard, who ſlid down a rope, head foremoſt, on his breaſt, from the battlements of St. Paul's ſteeple, to the Dean's gate, in the churchyard.

The combinations and conſpiracies which were daily concerted by the journeymen and labourers, being found very detrimental to trade, the parliament, among other things, enacted, "That "if any artificers, workmen, or labourers, do "conſpire, covenant, or promiſe together, that "they ſhall not make or do their work but at a "certain price or rate, or ſhall not enterprize or "take upon them to finiſh that work which ano-"ther hath begun, or ſhall do but a certain work "in a day, or ſhall not work but at certain hours "or times; that then every perſon ſo conſpiring, covenanting, or offending, being thereof "convicted by witneſſes, confeſſion, or otherwiſe, "ſhall forfeit for the firſt offence ten pounds, or "have twenty days impriſonment; for the ſecond offence, twenty pounds, or pillory; and "for a third offence, forty pounds, or to ſit on "the pillory, and to have one ear cut off, beſides "being rendered infamous, and incapable of "giving evidence upon oath." In this act are included butchers, bakers, brewers, poulterers, cooks, &c. And all juſtices of the peace, mayors, bailiffs, &c. in their ſeſſions, leets and courts, have full power and authority to enquire, hear, and determine, all and ſingular the offence againſt this ſtatute, and to cauſe offenders to be puniſhed.

In the year 1548 the march of the city watch, which had been diſcontinued by command of king Henry VIII. was revived by Sir John Greſham the mayor. The proceſſion received an additional ſplendor from three hundred light horſemen, which had been raiſed by the citizens for the ſervice of the king.

This year London was again viſited by a plague which took off a great number of its inhabitants.

The privy-counſellors being highly diſſatisfied with the conduct of the protector, (the duke of Somerſet) found means, by ſtratagem, to ſecure the Tower of London, of which they ſubſtituted a new governor, and armed themſelves and domeſtics. The earl of Warwick, with his accomplices, retired to London, where he drew up a charge againſt the duke, which he cauſed, by conſent of the mayor, to be proclaimed in different parts of the city. They likewiſe demanded a ſupply of five hundred men, and importuned the mayor and aldermen to put the city in a poſture of defence. The magiſtrates ſo far agreed, as to order the ſeveral companies to mount guard alternately, but would not proceed any farther without conſulting the common-council: on which meeting the mayor and aldermen produced the king's letter to the city, demanding five hundred men completely armed, to be ſent to him immediately at Windſor. Robert Brook, the recorder, earneſtly requeſted them to ſupply the lords with that number, as it would enable them to bring the protector to an account, and thereby redreſs the grievances of an injured nation. He was heard by the court with profound ſilence, till George Stadlow roſe, who, after reciting the bad conſequences of the city's joining the barons againſt king Henry III. ſaid, "Where-"fore, as this aid is required of the king's ma-"jeſty, whoſe voice we ought to hearken unto, "for he is our high ſhepherd, rather than unto "the lords; and yet I would not wiſh the lords "to be clearly ſhaken off; but they with us, and "we with them, may join in ſuit, and make our "moſt humble petition to the king's majeſty, "that it would pleaſe his majeſty to hear ſuch "complaint againſt the government of the lord-"protector, as may be juſtly alledged and prov-"ed: and I doubt not but this matter will be pa-"cified; that neither ſhall the king, nor yet the "lords have cauſe to ſeek for further aid, neither "we to offend either of them." This ſpeech had ſo good an effect, that the court broke up without coming to any reſolution. After which the lords held a conference with the mayor and aldermen, wherein it was reſolved to diſpatch Sir Philip Hobby with credentials to his majeſty, imploring him to permit the ſaid Sir Philip to deliver their meſſage, and to credit what he ſhould declare in their names. Sir Philip delivered himſelf with ſuch firmneſs and pertinence to the king, king, in the preſence of the protector, that his majeſty commanded the protector immediately to withdraw, and ſoon after committed him priſoner to Beauchamp's tower, in Windſor caſtle; from whence he was conducted to the Tower of London.

A combination being at this time held between the graziers, faleſmen, and others, to enhance the price of butchers meat in London, the following prices were ſtipulated by order of the king and council.

In the year 1550 the river Thames ebbed and flowed thrice within the ſpace of nine hours, occaſioned by a violent eaſterly wind repelling the ebb before it could peform its natural courſe.

This ſame year a great dearth of proviſions happening, the king and council ſettled the following prices:

In the year 1551 the ſweating ſickneſs broke out again in London, which took off a great number of its inhabitants. And ſo peculiar was it to the Engliſh in particular, that it proved fatal even to thoſe that were abroad.

At this time the king wanting money, applied to the citizens of London to be ſecurity for a conſiderable ſum he intended to borrow of Anthony Fugger and Co. bankers in Antwerp: and his majeſty, in conjunction with the lord-mayor and citizens, were bound for the payment thereof.

In conſequence of an act of common-council paſſed this year, a poſtern gate was made out of the wall on the north-ſide of the diſſolved cloiſter of Friars minors, or Grey-Friars, which is now Chriſt's-hoſpital, to paſs through to the hoſpital of St. Bartholomew.

The manor of Southwark with its appurtenances having been purchaſed of the king by the mayor and citizens, they became poſſeſſed of an hoſpital dedicated to St. Thomas the Apoſtle, and endowed by Peter de Rupibus, biſhop of Wincheſter, with land valued at 343l. per annum. Soon after which they repaired and enlarged it at the expence of 1100l. and in November following admitted into it two hundred and ſixty poor, ſick, and helpleſs objects. The king incorporated the Lord-mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London governors of this hoſpital, with thoſe of Chriſt's and Bridewell.

In the year 1552 the duke of Somerſet was accuſed of high treaſon, on account of an intended rebellion, and being found guilty, was ſentenced to to be beheaded. Accordingly, after two months impriſonment, he was brought to the ſcaffold on Tower-hill, and there executed, the 22d of January, amidſt a great crowd of ſpectators, many of whom dipped their handkerchiefs in his blood, which they preſerved as a ſacred relick.

This year king Edward VI. perfected what Henry VIII. in the laſt year of his reign, had begun. He founded Chriſt's-Hoſpital in the Grey-friars convent, for the relief and education of young and helpleſs children; and incorporated the governors by the title of "The mayor, com-"monalty, and citizens of the city of London, "governors of the poſſeſſions, revenues, and "goods of the hoſpitals of Edward VI. king of "England, &c." He likewiſe gave the old palace of Bridewell to the city for the lodging of poor way-faring people, the correction of vagabonds and diſorderly perſons, and for finding them work. The city having appointed Chriſt's-hoſpital for the education of poor children, St. Bartholomew's and St. Thomas's in Southwark, for the maimed and diſeaſed, the king formed theſe charitable foundations into a corporation: for, in a charter granted for that purpoſe, it is declared, "and "that our intention may take the better effect, "and that the lands, revenues, and other things "granted for the ſupport of the ſaid hoſpitals, "houſes, and poor people, may be the better "governed, for the eſtabliſhment of the ſame, we "do will and ordain, that the hoſpitals aforeſaid, "when they ſhall be ſo founded, erected, and eſta-"bliſhed, ſhall be named, called, and ſtiled, The "hoſpitals of Edward VI. of England, of Chriſt's, "Bridewell, and St. Thomas the Apoſtle; and "that the aforeſaid mayor, commonalty, and ci-"tizens of London, and their ſucceſſors ſhall "be ſtiled, the governors of the ſaid hoſpitals "of Bridewell, Chriſt and St. Thomas the Apoſtle; "and that the ſame governors, in deed, and in "fact, and in name, ſhall be hereafter one body "corporate and politic of themſelves for ever. "And we will that the ſame governors ſhall "have perpetual ſucceſſion."

In the beginning of this year the company of Anſeatic-merchants, having engroſſed almoſt the whole woolen manufacture trade, were, by order of king and council, diſſolved.

IN the year 1553, in the month of July, the Lord-mayor, aldermen and principal merchants being ordered to attend the privy-council, were informed of the death of the king, and of his having appointed lady Jane Grey * his ſucceſſor; in conſequence of which ſhe was proclaimed queen with the uſual formalities in London. The ſame counſellors afterwards finding reaſons to alter their opinions and conduct, repaired to Baynard's caſtle, there conſulted with the Lord-mayor and aldermen, who all proceeded on horſeback to Cheapſide, where they proclaimed princeſs Mary, daughter of king Henry VIII. at the croſs with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy. On the laſt day of the month her majeſty rode from the Tower of London to Weſtminſter in a chariot, before whom the Lord-mayor in a crimſon velvet gown, carried the ſceptre of gold: after her majeſty followed the princeſs Elizabeth her ſiſter, and the lady Anne of Cleve, in another chariot; and the proceſſion was cloſed by a great number of ladies on horſeback, richly trapped with velvets. She was received by the citizens in ſo pompous and joyful a manner, that ſhe was pleaſed to return them her hearty thanks.

* This lady was ſoon after committed to the Tower, where ſhe continued ſome months, and then received a meſſage from queen Mary, deſiring her to prepare for immediate death. She received the news without the leaſt perturbation, and as ſhe mounted the ſcaffold, addreſſed the ſpectators in words to this effect: "That ſhe came thither for an ex-"ample to poſterity, that innocence cannot be any pro-"tection againſt greatneſs; and that ſhe was to die, not "for aſpiring to a crown, but not for refuſing one when it "was offered her." She was beheaded on Tower-hill in the ſeventeenth year of her age. Her huſband, the lord Guilford, was beheaded the ſame day; and about eleven days after her father, Henry Grey, ſhared the ſame fate.—For a more particular account of this unfortunate lady and her family, ſee Clarendon's Hiſtory of England, Vol. I. page 527.

At the coronation of queen Mary, the Lord-mayor and twelve of the aldermen, according to ancient cuſtom, officiated as chief butler; and the mayor, as uſual, received for his fee a golden cup and ewer.

In order the more effectually to root out proteſtantiſm from this nation, a match was propoſed between the queen and the king of Spain. This proceeding alarmed the nation; and the public grew ſo diſcontented, that the court thought it neceſſary to prepare againſt all events. The privy-council deſired the Lord-mayor and aldermen to exert themſelves in ſo critical a juncture for the preſervation of the city; and advice being received of a dangerous inſurrection in the county of Kent under the command of Sir Thomas Wyat, they were ſtrictly enjoined to put the city into a poſture of defence.

In compliance with this command, the citizens not only placed a ſtrong guard at every gate of the city, but raiſed five hundred men to march againſt Wyat: this they did with ſuch expedition, that in two days after they were ſent down to Graveſend under the command of Alexander Bret, an experienced officer; where they were joined by the duke of Norfolk, and with him marched to Rocheſter, at which place Wyat was, and had fortified the bridge. He and his men were offered a general pardon on their ſubmiſſion; but this not being complied with, the duke advanced to attack him. On which captain Bret, who commanded the Londoners, drew his ſword, and addreſſed his men in the following words:

"Gentlemen,

"Nothing can be more barbarous and unjuſt "than for us to fight againſt our friends and "countrymen; eſpecially conſidering that they "are engaged in defence of the rights and liber-"ties of our dear country, in oppoſition to the "proud and imperious Spaniard; from whom, "if the intended match ſucceeds, we can expect "no other than that, if it may be called ſo, of "becoming their ſlaves. Therefore, as that "worthy patriot, Sir Thomas Wyat, has laud-"ably undertaken to protect and prevent us "from being impoſed upon by thoſe lordly "foreigners, I am humbly of opinion, that, "inſtead of oppoſing, we ought, in duty to our "country, to join him, for the more eaſily ob-"taining ſo ſalutary an end."

The Londoners were ſo highly pleaſed with this ſpeech, that they not only cried out, a Wyat, a Wyat; but effectually turned their ordnance againſt the queen's forces, inſomuch, that they were obliged to retreat ſo precipitately as to leave their ammunition and ordnance to be a prey to Wyat, who marched the next day to Deptford in his way into London.

The citizens were ſo alarmed on this near approach, and the court thrown into ſuch confuſion, that even the very judges and counſellors ſat and pleaded in armour.

In this ſtate of affairs her majeſty repaired to Guildhall, attended by the mayor, aldermen and ſheriffs, where ſhe harangued them in a long and ſoothing ſpeech, in which ſhe accuſed Wyat and his adherents of ſeeking nothing leſs than the total ſubverſion of all good government: ſhe inſiſted on her right to the crown, and declared ſhe was wedded to the realm and to the laws of the country, which ſhe loved as affectionately as a mother doth her children. She ſaid ſhe had no deſire to marry any man, much leſs a prince who might hereafter be detrimental to the welfare of her ſubjects. That notwithſtanding a match had been propoſed, by her council, with the king of Spain, yet ſhe was determined not to liſten thereto without the concurrence of the parliament; and concluded with exhorting them to ſtand faſt againſt theſe rebels. She knew that Wyat had many friends in London, and therefore put the the care of the city into the hands of the mayor and lord Howard.

On the third day of February Wyat and his army arrived in Southwark, when he was joyfully received and ſupplied with all neceſſaries for his men. His intentions were to march into the city, but theſe were fruſtrated by the gates being ſhut, and the draw-bridge cut down. He then marched to Kingſton, in order to paſs the river, that he might attack them on the land ſide; but the bridge was broke, and the oppoſite ſhore guarded by two hundred men. Theſe he ſoon drove away with his ordnance; and ordered ſome ſailors who were under his command, to wade the river, and bring the barges that were moored on the other ſide: with which he ſo expeditiouſly repaired the bridge, that he was able to paſs his army over it the night after. Having had the promiſe of his friends in London to join him, and to admit him into the city at a certain hour, he continued his march with an intention to reach Whitehall the next morning by break of day. This ſcheme was rendered abortive by the carriage of one of his guns breaking at Turnham-green, where he was obliged to halt. The time he ſtopped there proved his deſtruction; for he loſt the opportunity of joining his friends in London, who, at a certain time of that night, had promiſed to admit him into the city. This diſappointment occaſioned Harper, who had been very inſtrumental in bringing over Bret and his Londoners, to deſert him; after which he diſcovered the whole deſign of Wyat to the court. The example ſet by Harper was followed by many others; inſomuch, that in a few hours he found himſelf forſaken by near one half of his army. Notwithſtanding this he continued his march; and, with the remains of his forces, arrived at St. James's. He there mounted his artillery on an eminence; and having detached two companies, under the command of Cudbert Vaughan to Weſtminſter, left the principal part of his army with the artillery, and, at the head of five companies only, haſted away for London. At Charing-croſs he was attacked by Sir John Gage, with a ſuperior force, whom he not only repulſed, but obliged him to take ſhelter in the palace of Whitehall, where he left him, and continued his march towards the city. In his way thither, the earl of Pembroke, with his cavalry, fell upon his rear, and cut off a conſiderable number of his men. On his arrival at Ludgate the gate was ſhut, and he was ſcoffed and laughed at by lord Howard, who commanded within. Finding himſelf thus circumſtanced, and ſurrounded by his enemies, who gathered about him from every quarter, he reſolved to return, but this was prevented by Pembroke's horſe cutting off his retreat at Temple-bar. Thus perverted in every attempt, he, in a fit of deſpair, and at the inſtigation of Clarenceux king at arms, who preſſed him to yield, with promiſes of mercy, ſurrendered himſelf to Sir Maurice Berkley. Thus ended this rebellion.

Wyat was beheaded ſoon after on Tower-hill, his head ſtuck upon the gallows at Hay-hill near Hyde-park, and his quarters hung up in different parts of the city. On the fifteenth of February fifty of his men were hung on gibbets erected for that purpoſe, and on the twentieth of the ſame month four hundred others were brought before the queen, with halters about their necks, and received her majeſty's free pardon.

In the year 1554 the match between Philip and Mary being concluded, their nuptials were ſolemnized; and on the twelfth of Auguſt they made their public entry into the city, which on this occaſion was ſumptuouſly adorned, and embelliſhed with a great number of ſtately pageants.

The woolen trade being greatly hurt by the increaſe of hawkers and pedlars, the parliament paſſed an act this year for its better regulation; in which it was enacted. "That no perſon or perſons, dwelling any where out of the cities or towns, (the liberties of the two univerſities only excepted) ſhall hereafter ſell, or cauſe to be ſold, by retail, any woolen or linnen cloth (except of their own making) or any haberdaſhery, grocery, or mercery ware, at or within any of the ſaid cities, boroughs, towns corporate, or market towns, within this realm (except in open fairs) on pain to forfeit and loſe, for every time ſo offending, ſix ſhilling and eight-pence, and the whole wares ſo ſold, offered or proferred to be ſold."

At this time an act of common-council paſſed for retrenching the extravagant method of living by the Lord-mayor, aldermen, ſheriffs, and companies; in which it was enacted, that thenceforth they ſhould have no more than one courſe either at dinner or ſupper; and that on a feſtival, being a fleſh day, to conſiſt of no more than ſeven diſhes, whether hot or cold; and on every feſtival, being a fiſh day, eight diſhes; and on every common fleſh day, ſix diſhes; and on every common fiſh day, ſeven diſhes, excluſive of brawn, collops with eggs, ſallads, pottage, butter, cheeſe, eggs, herrings, ſprats and ſhrimps, together with all ſorts of ſhell-fiſh and fruits: that the aldermen and ſheriffs ſhould have one diſh leſs than the above-mentioned; and all the city companies at their ſeveral entertainments the ſame number of diſhes as the aldermen and ſheriffs; but with this reſtriction, to have neither ſwan, crane, nor buſtard, upon the penalty of forty ſhillings; and that all the ſerjeants and other officers belonging to the mayor or ſheriffs on fleſh days to have three, and on fiſh days four diſhes: but, when any foreign miniſters or privy-counſellors are invited to any of the city entertainments, then the regulations or additions are left to the diſcretion of the mayor; always provided, that no other entertainment be given after dinner than Ipocraſs and Wafers: and the annual feaſts on three days after Whitſunday and Bartholomew-tide were entirely laid aſide. It was alſo enacted that no wyth ſhould be carried away from the mayor's or ſheriff's houſes; and that none of them ſhould keep a lord of miſrule: and in conſideration of the great and annual expence the mayor and ſheriffs are at in providing a ſumptuous entertainment every Lord-mayor's day at Guildhall, for the honour of the city and regaling perſons of the greateſt diſtinction, it was ordained, that every ſubſequent mayor, as an alleviation of that charge, ſhall be paid, out of the chamber of the city, the ſum of one hundred pounds.

The great number of taverns and wine-vaults being found prejudicial to the morals of the people, the parliament this year enacted, that thenceforth the number of taverns or retailers of wine, within the city and liberty of London, ſhould not exceed forty, nor thoſe of Weſtminſter three.

This year the keeper of Bread-ſtreet compter having ill treated his priſoners, and diſhonoured the city by making his priſon the common receptacle for whores and thieves, the Lord-mayor and citizens, at the common expence, erected a large and convenient building for that purpoſe in Wood-ſtreet, to which the priſoners were removed.

In the year 1555, there was ſo great a ſcarcity of corn, that it ſold at fourteen ſhillings the quarter; and on the laſt day of September there fell ſuch a quantity of rain, that boats were rowed from Weſtminſter to King ſtreet.

The citizens being ſtill greatly hurt by the encroachments of foreigners on their reſpective trades, applied to the Lord-mayor and common-council for further relief, who enacted, "That thenceforth no citizen ſhould preſume to employ any foreigner in any manner of buſineſs, excluſive of felt-makers, cap thickers, carders, ſpinners, knitters, and brewers, upon penalty of five pounds for every offence; and all offenders, upon conviction, refuſing to pay, to be committed to priſon, without bail or mainprize, till ſuch fines were paid."

In the year 1556, Chriſtopher Draper, alderman of Cordwainer ſtreet ward, appointed a man to go about his ward by night with a bell, and, at certain places, with an audible voice, to bid the citizens be careful of their fires and lights, to help the poor, and to pray for the dead. This inſtitution was ſoon after adopted in all other parts of the city.

A malignant fever raged violently at this time in London, which took off a great number of citizens; among whom were ſeven aldermen.

In the year 1558, the queen wanting money to carry on the war with France, applied to the citizens, who advanced her twenty thouſand pounds, upon ſecurity, at 12 per cent.

This year queen Mary dying, was ſucceeded by her ſiſter the princeſs Elizabeth, who, on the ſeventeenth ſeventeenth of November, was proclaimed queen in London with the uſual ſolemnities; at which the citizens expreſſed ſuch demonſtrations of joy as perhaps were never ſeen on the like occaſion. The next day her majeſty came from Hatfield to London; and at Highgate was met by the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and citizens, in their formalities, who conducted her to the Charter-houſe, where ſhe continued till the 28th; on which day her majeſty repaired to London, in great ſtate; and from thence, on the firſt of December, to Somerſet-houſe. On the twelfth of January ſhe returned by water to the Tower; and on the fourteenth of the ſame month, ſhe rode, in the moſt pompous manner, through the city to Weſtminſter. At the weſt-end of Cheapſide, her majeſty was addreſſed by the recorder in an affectionate ſpeech, who, at the ſame time, preſented her, in the name of the citizens, with a velvet purſe richly embroidered, containing one thouſand marks of gold. Her majeſty thanked them for this token of their affection, promiſed to continue their good and gracious ſovereign, and that ſhe would not heſſitate even to ſpare her blood for their protection.

Her majeſty now reſumed that work of reformation which had been begun by her father, and ſupported by her brother Edward VI. On the firſt Sunday after her acceſſion to the throne, by virtue of a proclamation for that purpoſe, the Engliſh liturgy was read in all churches throughout the city of London; and the epiſtle and goſpel for the day was begun to be read at maſs-time in the Engliſh tongue. The citizens encouraged her majeſty to perſevere in this great work by exhibiting a ſpecimen of the ſtrength and forces they could raiſe in matters of emergency: for, on the ſecond of July the twelve principal corporations of London ſent out twelve companies, conſiſting of fourteen hundred men, to be muſtered in Greenwich park before the queen; eight hundred of whom were pikemen in bright armour; four hundred harquebuſſes, in coats of mail and helmets, and two hundred halberdiers in German rivets: theſe were accompanied by twenty-eight whifflers richly dreſſed, and led by the twelve principal wardens of the aforeſaid companies, well mounted, and dreſſed in black velvet, with ſix enſigns in white ſattin, furred with black ſarſnet, and rich ſcarves.

This year died Sir William Hewet the mayor, who was a clothworker, and poſſeſſed of ſix thouſand pounds per annum. He had three ſons and one daughter. The following remarkable ſtory of this daughter is ſtill repreſented in a painting carefully preſerved in the noble family of the duke of Leeds. Sir William, her father, lived at this time on London-bridge, and as the maid-ſervant was diverting the infant on the edge of an open window, it accidentally, ſlipped out of her hands and fell into the Thames. An apprentice of Sir William's, whoſe name was Oſborn, and one of the anceſtors of the duke of Leeds, in a direct line, ſeeing the child drop, immediately jumped out of the ſhop window into the river, and, to the great joy of its parents, brought it out unhurt. When ſhe arrived at the age of maturity ſhe had many ſuitors, among whom was the earl of Shrewſbury; but Sir William, her father, rejected all their advantageous propoſals, and gratefully betrothed her, with a very large fortune, to him who had ſaved her life at the riſque of his own, declaring, that as Oſborne had ſaved her, Oſborne ſhould have her.

In the year 1560 Richard Hills, merchant-taylor, gave five hundred pounds towards the purchaſe of a houſe called the Manor of the Roſe, on which the Merchant-taylors founded their free ſchool in London; together with the ground and ſome cottages on Tower-hill, where he built alms-houſes for fourteen old women.

About this time William Lambert, eſq; by company a draper, founded queen Elizabeth's college for poor people in Eaſt-Greenwich, and left it in truſt to the company of Drapers: it was afterwards called queen Elizabeth's college.

In the year 1561, in the month of June, there fell a prodigious quantity of rain, attended with dreadful claps of thunder. St. Paul's ſteeple was ſtruck by a thunderbolt within a yard of the top: at firſt a little fire appeared, reſembling the light of a torch, which ſo ſoon communicated itſelf to the weather-cock, that it fell down in eight minutes after; the wind riſing high, the fire within an hour deſtroyed the whole ſteeple down to the very battlements; there likewiſe, receiving the timber that fell from the ſpire, burnt ſo violently, that the iron and bells melted, and fell down upon the ſtairs in the church; the eaſt and weſt roofs catching fire, communicated themſelves to the north and ſouth, all which were deſtroyed before twelve o'clock at night; many houſes were pulled down in the church-yard near the north-door, and a pinnacle on the eaſt end, fell on a houſe in which were many people, but luckily no one received any hurt.

In the year 1563, the plague broke out violently in this city, and on the fifth of July, the Lord-mayor, by command of her majeſty, ordered the maſter and wardens of the company of clerks to enquire the number of thoſe who died of the plague within their reſpective pariſhes, and to make a certificate thereof; and that the curates and church-wardens ſhould give notice to them of ſuch houſes where the plague appeared, and to forbid every perſon in ſuch a houſe coming to church for the ſpace of one month following, after the plague had been in it, and to fix a blue croſs on the door of every houſe, with a writing underneath, ſignifying that the infection was there, and to avoid it. It was further ordered, on the ninth, that every man, in every ſtreet and lane ſhould make bonfires three times a week, on Mondays, Wedneſdays, and Fridays, till the infection ſhould ceaſe. In the beginning of Auguſt the Lord-mayor iſſued a proclamation for killing all dogs that ſhould be found in the ſtreets either by night or day. The number of people that died this year of the plague and other diſeaſes, from the firſt of January to the laſt of December, amounted to twenty thouſand, three hundred and ſeventy-two.

The citizens were this year reduced to the greateſt ſtate of miſery, not only on account of the late dreadful plague, but likewiſe from a great ſcarcity of money and dearth of proviſions.

In the year 1564, on the twenty-ſixth of January, the river Thames was ſo agitated, that the tide recoiled twice, five hours before its time; and the ſame on the twenty-ſeventh; and likewiſe once the day after.

The common-council of London this year enacted, that all ſuch citizens as ſhould thenceforth be conſtrained to ſell their houſhold goods, leaſes of houſes, or ſuch like, ſhould firſt cauſe the ſame to be cried through the city by a man with a bell, and then to be ſold by the common outcrier appointed for that purpoſe; and he to receive one farthing in the pound for his trouble.

The river Thames was frozen over ſo hard on the twenty-firſt of December, as to admit all ſorts of carriages and diverſions on it.

In the year 1566 a propoſition was made by Sir Thomas Greſham, merchant of London, to the Lord-mayor and citizens, to erect, at his own expence, a commodious building for merchants to meet and tranſact buſineſs, provided they would find him a convenient ſcite for the ſame. The citizens, agreeing to this propoſal, purchaſed, for the ſum of three thouſand, five hundred and thirty-two pounds, eighty houſes in the two alleys called New St. Chriſtopher's, and Swan-alley, leading out of Cornhill into Threadneedle-ſtreet; the materials of which eighty houſes were ſold for four hundred and ſeventy-eight pounds, and the ſaid ground, when cleared, was conveyed to Sir Thomas Greſham, who, on the ſeventh of June, accompanied by ſeveral aldermen, laid the firſt brick of the new building: each alderman likewiſe laid a brick, and a piece of gold for the workmen, who perſevered with ſuch aſſiduity and reſolution, that the whole building was roofed by the month of November in the next year, and was ſoon after finiſhed under the title of The Burſe.

By the will of Sir Thomas, dated the twenty-ſixth of November 1579, he deviſed this ſtately building, with all its appurtenances, and the profits ariſing thereby, to the mayor and citizens of London, and the company of Mercers, to be equally enjoyed and poſſeſſed by them, on condition that the citizens, out of their moiety, ſhould pay a ſalary of fifty pounds per annum each, to four perſons, who ſhould read lectures in divinity, aſtronomy, muſic and geometry, in Greſham-college; and to pay ſix pounds, thirteen ſhillings and four-pence per annum each, to eight alms-people, ſituate behind the ſaid college, in Broad-ſtreet; and ten pounds yearly to each of the priſons of Newgate, Ludgate, King's-bench, Marſhalſea, and Wood-ſtreet Compter. That the Mercers, out of their moiety, ſhould pay fifty pounds each per annum, to three perſons to read lectures in law, phyſic, and rhetoric, in his manſion-houſe; and one hundred pounds per annum for four quarterly dinners to be provided at their hall for the entertainment of the whole company; and alſo to pay ten pounds per annum to each of the following places, viz. the Poultry Compter, Chriſt's-hoſpital, St. Bartholomew's, the Spital, Bethlehem, and St. Thomas's.

In the year 1567, there being a great increaſe of foreigners in the metropolis, and a jealouſy ſubſiſting between England and Spain, her majeſty commanded the Lord-mayor to take the name, quality, and profeſſion of all ſtrangers reſiding within the city of London; on which examination there appeared to be, Scots forty; French four hundred and twenty-eight; Spaniards and Portugueſe forty-five; Italians one hundred and forty; Dutch two thouſand and thirty; Burgundians forty-four; Danes two; Liegois one.

The following year Sir Thomas Rowe, knight, Lord mayor, among many other charitable actions, gave Old Bethlehem burial ground, containing about one acre, which he encloſed with a brick wall, for the interment of poor citizens, gratis. He likewiſe appointed a ſermon to be preached every Whitſunday in the morning before the Lord-mayor and aldermen.

In the year 1569, a lottery began drawing at the weſt door of St. Paul's, on the eleventh of June, and continued inceſſantly night and day till the ſixth of May in the following year. This is the firſt lottery mentioned in Engliſh hiſtory.

This year an order was made by the common-council for the ſixteen beadles belonging to the hoſpitals to take up all ſturdy beggars and vagrants, and to carry them to Bridewell; the ſick, aged, lame, and blind to be taken to St. Bartholomew's; and all children beggars under the age of ſixteen, to Chriſt's Hoſpital; appointing a proper diſtrict to the beadles of each hoſpital: on neglect of which they were to be puniſhed with ſevere penalties. This, however, had not the deſired effect; for the next year the ſtreets ſwarmed again with beggars and vagrants. A reſolution was then formed of appointing city-marſhals; and the committee for this purpoſe choſe William Sympſon and John Read, whoſe office was to take ſuch courſe with theſe vagrants and wandering people, as might clear the ſtreets of them; for which a conſideration was allowed of ſix ſhillings and eight-pence a day for them and their horſes, and ſix perſons a piece of their own chuſing to attend them at one ſhilling each. For the more eaſy diſcharging this office, it was ordered that one month's pay ſhould be given before hand; and accordingly the aldermen, by way of loan, diſburſed the ſame, amounting to thirty-five pounds, nine ſhillings and four-pence. It was likewiſe thought convenient that twelve partiſans ſuitably and conveniently armed, ſhould be provided by the chamberlain for this ſervice at the expence of the city, and coats or mandilions for the attendants on the marſhals. The office of city-marſhal took its origin from this incident.

The execution of the above office was attended with ſuch expence to the city, that they ſoon after wiſely determined to balance it, by ſuppreſſing the pompous cavalcade of the city-watch: inſtead of which the common-council ſubſtituted the common-watch, which, from that time has been continued to the preſent.

This year the plague broke out again in London, which occaſioned the Michaelmas term to be adjourned to that of Hillary; and the Lord-mayor and aldermen iſſued their ſpecial orders for preventing its ſpreading, and for hindering idle perſons going about, who might diſperſe it among the citizens.

About this time the city laid out eight hundred and fourteen pounds, fifteen ſhillings and eight-pence, in cleanſing the city ditch, between Aldgate and the poſtern on Tower-hill, and making a new ſewer, and wharf, of timber, from the head of the poſtern into the town ditch, which, before this time, had always lain open, and was well ſtocked with good fiſh of divers ſorts.

On the 23d of January, in the year 1570, her majeſty, attended by the nobility, went into the city, and dined with Sir Thomas Greſham, knt. at his own houſe in Biſhopſgate-ſtreet. After dinner her majeſty returned through Cornhill, went into the Burſe, newly built by Sir Thomas, and after viewing it in all parts, commanded proclamation to be made by a herald, with ſound of trumpet, that thenceforth it ſhould go by the appellation of the Royal-Exchange.

A diſpute aroſe at this time between the tenants of the biſhop of Ely, and the Lord-mayor of London reſpecting the exerciſe of the mayor's authority among them: the diſpute was referred to the lord-keeper, the two chief juſtices, and the chancellor of the exchequer, who determined it in favour of the city: and that for the future, the mayor might as juſtly exerciſe his authority in the biſhop's rents in Holbourn, as in any other part of the city.

In the year 1572 the poulterers of London having greatly enhanced the value of poultry, the Lord-mayor and aldermen, on the 4th of April, aſcertained the following prices:

This year her majeſty intending to make a tour into the countries, appointed the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the biſhop of London, lord Wentworth, Sir Anthony Cook, Sir Thomas Worth, Sir Owen Hopton, Sir Thomas Greſham, Dr. Wylſon, and Thomas Wilbraham, to aſſiſt the mayor and aldermen in the well governing the city during her abſence.

On the 14th of September, in the year 1574, there fell ſuch a violent ſhower of rain, that a young man eighteen years of age endeavouring to leap over the channel on Dowgate-hill, the ſtream was ſo rapid, that it carried him away, and he was drowned.

The inſtitution of plays or interludes being at this time degenerated into nurſeries of vice and lewdneſs, the common-council paſſed an act, "that no play ſhould be openly played within "the liberty of the city, wherein ſhould be ut-"tered any words, examples, or doings of any "unchaſtity, ſedition, or ſuch like unfit and "uncomely matter, upon pain of impriſonment "for fourteen days, and five pounds for every "ſuch offence. That no inn-keeper, &c. ſhall "ſhew or play, or cauſe to be ſhewn or played, "within his houſe or yard, any play which ſhall "not be firſt peruſed, and allowed by the Lord-"mayor and court of aldermen's order. And "that no perſon ſhall be allowed to play, but "ſhall be thereunto admitted by the Lord-mayor "and aldermen. And that every perſon to be "licenſed, ſhall pay to the uſe of the poor in the "hoſpitals of the city, or of the poor viſited "with ſickneſs, certain ſums to be agreed upon, "upon pain of forfeiting his ſaid licence. And "that all ſums and forfeitures incurred by any "offence againſt this act, and all forfeitures of "bonds, ſhall be employed to the relief of the "poor of the hoſpitals, or of the poor infected "or diſeaſed in the city; to be ſued for and re-"covered by the chamberlain in the court of the "outer chamber of Guildhall, London, called "the mayor's-court:"

An exceeding high tide happened this year on the ſixth of November. After having ebbed about an hour, a preternatural reflux returned with ſuch impetuoſity, that the Thames ſoon overflowed its banks, and, by filling the marſhes, and the neighbouring cellars and warehouſes, did incredible damage.

Although the number of alehouſes had been reduced in the late reign, yet they were at this time ſo greatly multiplied, that the mayor, aſſiſted by the recorders of Southwark and Lambeth, put down, within their ſeveral juriſdictions, upwards of two hundred. This example was ſoon followed by thoſe in Weſtminſter, the dutchy of Lancaſter, Tower Hamlets, and other parts of Middleſex adjoining to London.

In the year 1576, on digging the well where the pump now ſtands in Leadenhall-ſtreet, near the end of Lime-ſtreet, about the depth of thirteen feet on the virgin earth, was diſcovered a hearth built of roman bricks with charcoals thereon.

The following year Mr. William Lamb, citizen and clothworker, erected a conduit of ſprings drawn together at the north extremity of Red-lion-ſtreet, Holbourn, to feed the conduit on Snow-hill, in a leaden pipe two hundred yards long, the expence of which amounted to fifteen hundred pounds. This conduit ſtill retains the name of its builder, who left to the clothworkers company his dwelling-houſe, ſituate a little ſouth-weſt from where Cripplegate ſtood, with lands and tenements to the value of thirty-pounds per annum, for a miniſter to read divine ſervice on Sundays, Wedneſdays and Fridays, every week, in the chapel adjoining to his houſe called St. James's in the wall, at the north-end of Monkwell-ſtreet, and for cloathing twelve men with a frize gown, one lockram ſhirt, and a good ſtrong pair of winter ſhoes; and twelve women with a frize gown, a lockram ſmock, and a good pair of winter ſhoes, all made ready for wearing; to be given to ſuch as were honeſt and in diſtreſs on the firſt of October.

In the year 1579 William Kympton, alderman, was, by the lord-chancellor, committed to the Fleet-priſon for concealing a letter ſent him by the vicar of Hadley in Middleſex, informing him of an inſurrection at Northall, where the people had tumultuouſly tumultuouſly pulled down ſome pales: this offence being deemed a miſpriſion of treaſon, he was, by the court of ſtar-chamber, fined five hundred marks, and impriſoned during her majeſty's pleaſure.

The following year a dreadful earthquake happened in London on the ſixth of April, which, though its duration did not exceed a minute, ſhattered many houſes and churches, and killed ſeveral of the citizens.

About this time another inquiſition was ordered to be taken of the number of foreigners in London, when, on the report being made, there appeared to be near three times the number as in the year 1568. This conſiderable increaſe produced a remonſtrance from the Lord-mayor and aldermen, againſt the number of new buildings and inhabitants within the city and ſuburbs of London. In conſequence of which her majeſty iſſued out a proclamation, forbidding any new buildings of any houſe or tenement within three miles from the gates of the city, where no former houſe could be remembered to have ſtood; and likewiſe not to ſuffer more families than one to inhabit any houſe; empowering the Lord-mayor to commit offenders againſt this proclamation, or to hold them to bail. The next Lord-mayor when he took the oath in the exchequer, was ſtrictly charged by the lord-treaſurer to enforce the ſaid proclamation, becauſe, ſaid he, from an increaſe of people there will ariſe an exceſſive price of victuals and fuel, and conſequently great danger of infection and plague. His lordſhip farther admoniſhed him to enquire diligently after fugitives, eſpecially from Rome, who were miſlikers of the religion, ſtate and government, practicers of ſedition, and perſons dangerous to the realm.

The citizens of London became ſo extravagant in their dreſs, that it was thought neceſſary by her majeſty to iſſue a proclamation againſt exceſs of apparel, gold chains and cloaks, which the men at this time wore down to their heels: by which alſo the length of daggers was limited to twelve inches beſide the hilts, and ſwords to three feet.

In the year 1581, the croſs in Cheapſide having been frequently preſented by the inqueſt as a public nuiſance, in obſtructing carriages, and the complainants not finding any redreſs, the inhabitants, (who were likewiſe offended at the figures with which the croſs was adorned) ſo highly reſented it, that in the night-time it was almoſt demoliſhed by perſons unknown.

In the year 1582, the luxury of the times having greatly prevailed among people of all degrees, in their apparel, particularly apprentices, the Lord-mayor and common-council enacted, "That "no apprentice whatſoever ſhould preſume, "1. To wear any apparel but what he receives "from his maſter. 2. To wear no hat, nor any "thing but a woolen cap, without any ſilk in or "about the ſame. 3. To wear neither ruffles, "cuffs, looſe collars, nor other thing than a ruff "at the collar, and that only of a yard and half "long. 4. To wear no doublets but what are "made of canvas, fuſtian, ſackcloth, Engliſh "leather, or woolen, without any gold, ſilver, "or ſilk trimming. 5. To wear no other co-"loured cloth, or kerſey in hoſe or ſtockings, "than white, blue, or ruſſet. 6. To wear no "other breeches but what ſhall be of the ſame "ſtuffs as the doublets, and neither ſtitched, "laced, or bordered. 7. To wear no other than "a plain upper coat, of cloth or leather, with-"out pinking, ſtitching, edging, or ſilk about "it. 8. To wear no other ſurtout than a cloth "gown or cloak, lined or faced with cloth, cot-"ton or baize, with a fixed round collar, with-"out ſtitching, guarding, lace or ſilk. 9. To "wear no pumps, ſlippers or ſhoes, but of Eng-"liſh leather, without being pinked, edged, or "ſtitched: nor girdles, nor garters, other than "of crewel, woolen, thread, or leather, without "being garniſhed. 10. To wear no ſword, dag-"ger, or other weapon, but a knife: nor a ring, "jewel of gold, nor ſilver, nor ſilk, in any part "of his apparel, on pain of being puniſhed at "the diſcretion of the maſter for the firſt offence; "to be publicly whipped at the hall of his "company for a ſecond offence; and to ſerve ſix "months longer than ſpecified in his indentures "for a third offence." And it was further enacted, "That no apprentice ſhould frequent or go "to any dancing, fencing, or muſical ſchools: "nor keep any cheſt, preſs, or other place, for "keeping of apparel or goods, but in his maſ-"ter's houſe, under the penalties aforeſaid."

This year one Peter Maurice, a German engineer, propoſed a ſcheme to the Lord-mayor and aldermen for erecting a machine to ſupply the city with Thames water, which ſcheme being approved of, the ſame was erected in the River near London-bridge. As an encouragement for this great piece of ingenuity, Maurice obtained a leaſe of one arch, and a place for fixing his engine upon, at the north-end of the bridge, for the term of five hundred years, at the rent of ten ſhillings per annum. Two years after this, he obtained a leaſe for another arch: and the citizens finding the great utility of this invention, he and his poſterity grew wealthy by its improvements. In 1701 they ſold the property to Richard Soams, a goldſmith, for thirty-ſix thouſand pounds. Maurece having firſt obtained another leaſe of the fourth arch. Soams got from the city a confirmation of Maurice's leaſe, at the yearly rent of twenty ſhillings, and a fine of three hundred pounds. After which Soams divided the whole property in three hundred ſhares, at five hundred pounds each, and made it a company.

In the year 1583, in the month of September, the citizens of London held a very ſplendid ſhooting match, under the dirrection of the captain of the London archers, who was ſtiled the duke of Shoreditch. * the captain ſummoned his nominal nobility to attend him with their ſeveral companies under the following titles, viz. The marquiſſes of Barlow, Clerkenwell, Iſlington, Hoxton, and Shacklewell, and the earl of Pancraſs, &c. Being met at the time and place appointed, the pompous march began at the merchant-taylors hall, and proceeded through Broad-ſtreet, (the reſidence of the duke their captain) to Moorfields, and from thence by Finſbury to Smithfield; where, after performing ſeveral exerciſes, they ſhot at the target for glory. This body conſiſted of three thouſand archers ſumptuouſly apparelled, nine hundred and forty-two of whom had golden chains about their necks: thoſe were preceded by whifflers and bellmen, that made up the number four thouſand, beſides pages and footmen.

In the year 1585 her majeſty being apprehenſive of an invaſion from Spain, the citizens, at their own expence, ſent five thouſand men compleatly armed, to encamp on Blackheath; at which place they were reviewed different times by the queen: the ſaid citizens ſoon after ſent a conſiderable body of ſoldiers compleatly armed, and cloathed in red, to the aſſiſtance of the Dutch againſt the Spaniards.

This year a houſe was diſcovered on Smart's-key, near Billingſgate, wherein was a ſchool for teaching young boys to pick-pockets, or cut purſes: for which purpoſe two devices were hung up, the one was a purſe, the other a pocket; the latter of which had counters in it, and was hung about with hawks-bells, and over it a ſmall facring-bell. In the purſe was ſome ſilver, and he that could take out a counter without any noiſe was adjudged to be a public Foyſter; that is, a pickpocket; and he that could take a piece of ſilver out of the purſe without diſturbing any of the bells, was allowed, according to the terms of that art, to be a Nypper; that is, a pick-purſe, or cut-purſe.

In the year 1586, the earl of Northumberland having been committed to the Tower on ſuſpicion of conſpiring, with ſome others, to invade England, and ſet the queen of Scots at liberty, was found dead in his bed, ſhot in the body with three bullets under his pap, and the door bolted on the inſide.

This ſame year, on the ſixth of December, Mary, queen of Scots was ſentenced to be beheaded. The Lord-mayor and aldermen, together with many of the nobility, proclaimed the dreadful ſentence in Cheapſide, at Leadenhall, the end of London-bridge, and that of Chancery-lane. Soon after which ſhe was executed on a ſcaffold erected for that purpoſe.

In the year 1587 her majeſty ſtill continued to prepare againſt any attempts that might be made by the Spaniards, ſent the Lord-mayor, on the eighth of March, the following letter:

"Truſty and well-beloved we greet you well. "Whereas upon information given unto us of "great preparations made in foreign parts with "an intent to attempt ſomewhat againſt this our "realm, we gave preſent order that our ſaid "realm ſhould be put in order of defence; "which we have cauſed to be performed in all "parts accordingly, ſaving in the city of Lon-"don. We therefore knowing your readineſs, "by former experience, to perform any ſervice "that well-affected ſubjects ought to yield to "their prince and ſovereign, do let you under-"ſtand, that within our ſaid city our pleaſure is, "that there be forthwith put in a readineſs to "ſerve for defence of our perſon, upon ſuch oc-"caſions as may fall out, the number of ten "thouſand able men, furniſhed with armour and "weapons convenient; of which number, our "meaning is, that ſix thouſand be enrolled "under captains and enſigns, and to be trained "at times convenient, according to ſuch fur-"ther direction as you ſhall receive from our "privy-council, under ſix of their hands, which "our pleaſure is you do follow from time to "time in the ordering and training of the ſaid "numbers of men. And theſe our letters ſhall "be your ſufficient warrant for the doing of the "ſame. Given under our ſignet, &c."

Two days after, this was ſupported by another letter from the privy-council. Theſe being laid before a court of common-council, they unanimouſly agreed to grant ten thouſand troops as required; and that the aldermen and common-council ſhould raiſe them in their ſeveral wards reſpectively. No ſooner was this executed than the lords of the privy-council ſent another letter to the Lord-mayor, entreating him to have them ready to march where her majeſty ſhould command to attack the enemy. This was not only immediately complied with, but on the third of April, the common-council granted a ſupply of ſixteen of the largeſt ſhips in the river, and four frigates, which were fitted out with the greateſt expedition, and ſupplied with all the neceſſaries of war. The expence of the ten thouſand men and theſe ſhips, which were afterwards increaſed to thirty-eight, was defrayed by the citizens during the time they continued in the ſervice of her majeſty.

This year Mr. Ralph Lane, on his return from the Weſt Indies, brought ſome tobacco with him, which was the firſt of that weed ever ſeen in England.

In the year 1590, the owners of the coal-works at Newcaſtle, entered into a combination to enhance the price of that commodity in London, from four ſhillings to nine ſhillings the chaldron. And the lord high admiral of England, in the year following, claimed a right to the coal-metage in the port of London; but the mayor and citizens ſhewing their prior right to the ſame, he receded from his pretenſions. To prevent all controverſies in that reſpect for the future, the citizens applied to the queen, who confirmed their right to the ſame.

The following year the plague broke out again ſo violently in London, that notwithſtanding the moſt ſalutary meaſures were taken for ſtopping its progreſs, it took off no leſs than ten thouſand, ſix hundred and ſeventy five citizens.

In the year 1593, the city of London and its ſuburbs being greatly peſtered with vagrants, beggars, and thieves, her majeſty iſſued a proclamation for ſuppreſſing them, and commanded the Lord-mayor and other officers to execute the ſame within three miles of the city.

The following year, in obedience to her majeſty's requeſt, the Lord-mayor and common-council agreed to fit out ſix ſhips of war at their own expence, and two frigates; and to ſtore the ſame with proviſions and ammunition for three months; two days after which they likewiſe agreed to raiſe four hundred and fifty men for the ſervice of her majeſty, and to maintain them at their own expence; for which a fifteenth was granted and raiſed among the citizens.

In the year 1595 the apprentices of London, having been ſeduced by a ſet of incorrigible villains, were arrived at ſuch a pitch of inſolence, that, to prevent riots, it was found neceſſary by the mayor to lay the caſe before the lord-treaſurer for her majeſty's protection. On the fourth of July, a royal proclamation was iſſued for apprehending ſuch vagrants and rioters; in which her majeſty appointed a provoſt-marſhal, with power to apprehend all ſuch as might be refractory to the officers of juſtice, and, by order of martial law, to execute them on the gallows. Sir Thomas Wilford, who was appointed provoſt-marſhal, patroled the city, with a numerous attendance on horſeback, armed with piſtols, and apprehended many of the rioters, whom he took before the juſtices appointed for their examination. On the twenty-ſecond of July they were tried at Guildhall, and five of them being condemned, were, two days after, agreeable to their ſentence, executed on Tower-hill. This put a ſtop to rioting for a conſiderable time after.

This year, her majeſty, having preferred the recorder of London, informed the citizens of her intent to make choice of one herſelf; for which purpoſe ſhe deſired the Lord-mayor to ſend her the names of ſuch perſons as were intended to be put in nomination for that office. The citizens, alarmed at this extraordinary proceeding, and ſuſpecting it to be a ſtroke on their rights and liberties, nominated only one: with which nomination Sir John Spencer the mayor ſent a letter to the lord-treaſurer; the moſt material part of which runs thus: "The grave commoners of "the city of London hearing a common bruit, "that a new recorder was ſpeedily to be choſen, "at a common-council held at Guildhall on "Tueſday laſt for other cauſes, one of them in "that behalf made very earneſt ſuit, becauſe in "all our counſels and conſultations (which are "almoſt daily for one cauſe or other) the recorder hath of ancient time been preſent as a principal man, both for advice in law and other direction; and now, of late, thoſe which we "have had have been for the moſt part abſent; "that therefore myſelf and the aldermen would "take care, that hereafter we chuſe no ſerjeant "nor other ſtranger; but only ſome one that is "reſident and dwelling among us, and acquainted with our cuſtoms; and to make choice of "ourſelves, as we have been wont, without ſending any names, as hath been mentioned: and "therefore very urgent ſuit was made in common-council on the behalf of the commoners; "whereof I have thought it my duty to advertize your lordſhip, moſt humbly deſiring you "to be a means, that we may herein have our "own free election, according to our ancient "cuſtom: ſo that though we have lately had moſt "worthy men, yet we have found their long and "much abſence a great mahim unto us. And "for mine own opinion, my good lord, as alſo "of many others, we have one born and dwelling "amongſt us, whom we have great experience "of, and think very able to do us ſervice in this "behalf; his name is Mr. James Altham, ſon "of Mr. Altham, late of Eſſex, eſq; he is a "bencher of Gray's-inn, and one of our ordinary ſworn counſellors of the city, well acquainted with our cuſtoms, and very well "thought of for his honeſty and ſkill in law, "both throughout the city and elſewhere." After which he concludes with his earneſt requeſt that her majeſty would be pleaſed to approve this nomination.

In the year 1596, while the Lord-mayor and aldermen were attending a ſermon at St. Paul's croſs, they received a meſſage from the queen, commanding them to raiſe a thouſand able bodied men with all expedition. In compliance with which, they immediately left the church, and applied ſo diligently, that before eight at night, they obtained the number of men required, who were compleatly armed and ready to march before next morning: but unexpected advice being received from Calais, to whoſe relief they were intended, their appearance became unneceſſary, and they were all diſcharged. The court, however, being again alarmed, on Eaſter-day in the morning ſent another meſſage to the Lord-mayor and aldermen, commanding them to raiſe the like number of men as before. In obedience to which they, with their proper officers, repaired to the different churches in their reſpective juriſdictions, and, cauſing the doors to be ſhut, they took, during the time of divine ſervice, the number of men required; who being properly armed with all poſſible expedition, began their march the night following for Dover, in order for their embarkation for France: but her majeſty receiving advice of the reduction of Calais by the Spaniards, they were countermanded, and received orders to return to their reſpective habitations.

IN the year 1597 the harveſt failing by the great quantity of rain that fell in England, ſo great a famine enſued, that wheat ſold in London for five pounds four ſhillings the quarter, and rye at three pounds twelve ſhillings.

In the year 1599 the enemies of the earl of Eſſex having been apprized of his coming with an army from Ireland to ſuppreſs theſe courtiers, artfully gave out, that the Spaniards were meditating another invaſion. In conſequence of which her majeſty demanding the aſſiſtance of the city of London on this occaſion, they ſupplied her with ſix thouſand ſoldiers, and fitted out ſixteen ſhips of war; one moiety whereof were to take the field, and the other, compoſed of eminent citizens, to attend the queen as her body guard, at their own and the city's expence. During this time of public danger, by command of her majeſty, ſtrong guards were kept in all quarters of the city, chains drawn acroſs every night at the ends of all ſtreets and lanes, and a candle and lantern hung out at every door on pain of death.

In the year 1600, on the 23d of December, there was a moſt terrible hurricane, which did great damage to the city by blowing down chimnies, ſtripping churches and houſes, and tearing up trees by the roots. The Graveſend tilt-boat was loſt in the ſtorm, and nineteen perſons who were on board periſhed.

This year the citizens raiſed 500 ſoldiers, and, by the command of the queen, ſent them into Ireland. And in the following year they fitted out ſeveral gallies for her ſervice at ſea, towards the charge of which three fifteenths were raiſed in the city by the common-council.

The earl of Eſſex, accompanied only by a few of his friends, arrived from Ireland at his houſe in the Strand: and having been made to believe that the citizens were diſpoſed to riſe in his favour ſhould he enter the city, he too precipitately made the attempt, but found himſelf diſappointed: at laſt, by order of the queen, he was proclaimed a traitor in Cheapſide, and his retreat cut off by forces placed at Ludgate. In conſequence of this his few friends deſerted him, and he was obliged to fly by water to Eſſex-houſe; to which place being purſued by the earl of Nottingham, and finding no proſpect of ſucceſs from his defence againſt the queen's forces, his lordſhip ſurrendered at diſcretion. Whereupon he was taken priſoner to Lambeth palace, and afterwards removed to the Tower, in which place he was beheaded. He was the laſt perſon who was executed within the walls of the Tower.

The trade and navigation on the coaſt of England having been greatly interrupted by Spaniſh privateers, her majeſty commanded a number of ſhips of war to be built; for the defraying of which expence no leſs than five fifteenths were raiſed by the city of London; and a proclamation was iſſued for diſcharging all ſuch debtors in the goals of London as were willing to enter on board the ſaid ſhips.

In the year 1602, the trade of the city of London having been greatly detrimented by the encreaſe of hawkers and pedlars, the common-council enacted, "That no citizen or other inhabitant of London, for the future, ſhould under any pretence whatſoever, preſume to let, before his, her, or their houſe, any ſtall, ſtand, or perpreſture, upon the penalty of twenty ſhillings. And that all hawkers offending againſt the tenour of this act, not only to forfeit all their goods ſo offered to ſale, but likewiſe pay a fine of twenty ſhillings for every ſuch offence."

In the year 1603 queen Elizabeth made her laſt demand of the citizens; which was, to fit out two ſhips of war and a tender for her ſervice, and to maintain them at the expence of ſix thouſand pounds per annum.

It is ſomething very ſingular, that, during the long reign of this queen, and conſidering the readineſs with which the citizens of London always anſwered her demands, ſhe did not grant them any new charter of privileges, nor even ſo much as confirm their ancient franchiſes.

On the demiſe of queen Elizabeth, the privy-council, aſſiſted by the Lord-mayor, having acknowledged knowledged James king of Scotland to be the lawful ſucceſſor to the crown of England, he was proclaimed in the city of London on the 24th of March with the greateſt demonſtrations of Joy.

On his majeſty's approach to London, he was met at Waltham by Sir John Swinnerton, one of the ſheriffs, (his colleague being ill) attended by ſixty ſervants in rich liveries; and on his arrival at Stamford-hill, he was received by the Lord-mayor and aldermen in their ſcarlet robes, with gold chains about their necks, accompanied by five hundred of the principal citizens on horſe-back. His majeſty was conducted from hence to the Charter-houſe, where he was ſumptuouſly entertained by lord Howard, for four days ſucceſſively. But the great preparations that had been making for the king's public entry into London, and the city rejoicings, was poſtponed to the following year, on account of the plague, which at this time raged ſo violently in the city, that within the year it carried off thirty thouſand five hundred and ſeventy eight perſons, three thouſand and ninety of whom died in one week.

This calamity, however, being happily over, on the fifteenth of March the king, and queen, and prince Henry rode from the Tower of London through the city, which on this occaſion was decorated in the moſt pompous manner, and embelliſhed with ſeven magnificent triumphal arches, and a great number of ſtately pageants. The ſtreets were adorned with the richeſt ſilks and carpets, and lined on each ſide by the ſeveral corporations in their formalities and ſtands, with their flags and bands of muſic.

On the twenty-fifth of July, the day appointed for the coronation; the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and twelve principal citizens, attended in quality of chief butler of England, and received the uſual fee of a gold cup and ewer. The following day the Lord-mayor and aldermen waited on his majeſty agreeable to the royal command, and thoſe who had not been knighted were now dignified with that honour.

In conſequence of the great plague in London, a proclamation was iſſued for ſuppreſſing not only Bartholomew fair, but all others within fifty miles of the city: and another ſtrictly prohibiting all perſons from building on new foundations within the walls, and within three miles of the city gates, on the penalty that all ſuch houſes ſhould be deſtroyed.

In the year 1604, the Court of Requeſts or Court of Conſcience, which had been originally eſtabliſhed in 1517, by act of common-council, was found ſo beneficial to the inferior claſs of citizens, that the corporation, in order to ſtrengthen their own act againſt the artful attempts of the lawyers and unmerciful creditors, applied to parliament, and obtained an act for more firmly eſtabliſhing the ſaid court. This precaution, however, did not anſwer the good end propoſed; for many perſons converted ſome particular words in the ſaid act for their own lucre and benefit, contrary to the good meaning of the ſaid act. To remedy which, another act of parliament paſſed the following year, whereby the authority of the ſaid court was much farther enlarged, viz. "That "every citizen and freeman of London, and "every other perſon and perſons, inhabiting, or "that ſhall inhabit, within the city of London, "or liberties thereof, being a tradeſman, victu-"aller, or labouring man, which have, or ſhall "have, any debts owing to him or them, not "amounting to forty ſhillings, by any citizen or "freeman, or by any other perſon or perſons, "being a victualler, tradeſman, or labouring "man, inhabiting within the ſaid city, or the "liberties thereof, ſhould or might cauſe ſuch "debtors to be warned to appear before the ſaid "commiſſioners of the ſaid court of requeſts. "And the ſaid commiſſioners or any three or more "of them, ſhall have power to ſet down ſuch or-"ders between plaintiff and defendant, creditor "and debtor, touching ſuch debts not amount-"ing to forty ſhillings, as they ſhall find to "ſtand with equity and good conſcience, and to "adminiſter an oath to the creditor or debtor, and "to ſuch witneſſes as ſhall be produced on each "part; and to commit to priſon, in one of the "compters, ſuch creditor and debtor as ſhall "not appear upon lawful ſummons, or not per-"form ſuch order, as the ſaid commiſſioners, or "any three or more of them, ſhall ſet down." With this proviſo, "That this ſhall not extend "to any debt for any rent upon any leaſe of "lands or tenements, or any other real contracts; "nor to any other debt that ſhall ariſe by reaſon "of any cauſe concerning teſtament or matri-"mony, or any thing concerning, or properly "belonging to the eccleſiaſtical court, albeit the "ſame ſhall be under forty ſhillings."

The citizens had ſo effectually wrought themſelves into the favour of the king, that his majeſty, this ſame year, granted them the following charter:

"James, by the grace of God, of England, "Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, defender "of the faith, &c. To all to whom our letters "patents ſhall come, greeting. Whereas our "beloved the mayor and commonalty, and citi-"zens, of our city of London, time out of mind, "have had, exerciſed, and ought, and have ac-"cuſtomed themſelves to have and exerciſe, the "office of bailiff, and conſervation of the water "of Thames, to be exerciſed and occupied by "the mayor of the ſaid city for the time being, "during the time of his mayoralty, or by his "ſufficient deputies, in, upon, and about the "water of Thames, that is to ſay, from the bridge "of the town of Staines, in the county of Mid-"dleſex, and toward the eaſt unto London-bridge, "and from thence to a certain place called Ken-"dall, otherwiſe Yenland, otherwiſe Yenlet, to-"wards the ſea, and towards the eaſt, and in "Medway, and in the port of the city of Lon-"don aforeſaid, upon whatſoever bank, and upon "every ſhore, and upon every wharf, of the "ſaid water of Thames, within the limits and "bounds aforeſaid, and in, and upon, and about "all and every of them: and alſo for all the time "aforeſaid, have, had, and taken, and ought and "have accuſtomed to have and take, to their "own proper uſe, by the mayor of the ſame "city for the time being, during the time of his mayoralty,

" In witneſs whereof, theſe our letters we " have cauſed to be made patents: witneſs my- " ſelf at Weſtminſter, the twentieth day of Au- " guſt, in the third year of our reign of Eng- " land, France and Ireland, and of Scotland the " thirty-ninth."

In the year 1605, the king borrowed of the city of London ſixty thouſand pounds, and in the month of October he was proclaimed, in Cheapſide, king of Great Britain, France and Ireland.

On the twelfth of June, 1606, the Lord-mayor entertained his majeſty in a moſt ſplendid manner at Clothworkers-hall; and preſented him with a purſe of gold, which his majeſty accepted with the ſtrongeſt marks of affection for the citizens: and on the fifteenth of July he conferred the ſame honour on the maſter and wardens of the Merchant-taylors, who likewiſe preſented him with the ſame compliment, and another to his ſon prince Henry, who, by command of the king, honoured the company by accepting the freedom thereof. His majeſty this day diſcharged a debt of ſixty thouſand pounds, which he had borrowed of the citizens.

The proclamations hitherto publiſhed to prevent buildings on new foundations having proved ineffectual, another proclamation was made this year to enforce the ſaid acts: but this not being regarded, the matter was taken into conſideration by the ſtar-chamber, and many perſons were cenſured for not regulating their buildings according to the royal edict. To prevent the decay of wood, it was alſo enjoined, " That all perſons " ſhould build the fronts of their houſes either " with ſtone or brick."

In the year 1607, the city being ſtill greatly peſtered with foreign hawkers and pedlars, the common council enacted, " That no foreigner " whatſoever ſhould preſume to vend his, her, " or their goods in the city, by connivance or " otherwiſe, either in houſe, ſhop, ſtall, or ſtreet, " upon the penalty of five pounds for every of- " fence; except ſuch as bring proviſions to the " city."

This year the river Thames was frozen over ſo hard, that it became the place of all public entertainments and diverſions: and on the nineteenth of February following, the tide ran ſo contrary to its natural courſe, that it was high water at London-bridge at the time it ſhould have been low water. This preternatural tide, after it had ebbed about half an hour, returned with ſuch impetuoſity, that it aroſe two feet higher than at firſt, it gradually ebbed and flowed a ſecond and third time, and then returned to its natural courſe.

In the month of May following, the king wanting money, applied to the citizens, who, in conſideration of his former good payment, advanced him the ſum of ſixty-three thouſand pounds.

Soon after this his majeſty, in order to confirm the citizens of London in their love and affection for him, granted them the following advantageous charter:

" James, by the grace of God, of England, " Scotland, France and Ireland, king, defender " of the faith, &c. to all to whom theſe preſent " letters ſhall come greeting. Whereas very many " of our progenitors, ſometimes kings of Eng- " land, of their ſpecial grace, and for free, laud- " able, multiplied, and continued ſervice, done " and expended in times paſt by the mayor, " commonalty, and citizens of the city of Lon- " don, and their predeceſſors; and alſo, for di- " vers other urgent cauſes and conſiderations them " thereunto eſpecially moving, have given, grant- " ed, and confirmed, to the ſaid mayor and com- " monalty, and citizens, of the city of London, " and their ſucceſſors, divers liberties, privileges, " franchiſes, immunities, authorities, juriſdic- " tions, ordinances, cuſtoms, and quittances, as " by the ſeveral letters patent of our progenitors " and predeceſſors, ſometimes kings of England, " more fully and manifeſtly is and appeareth. " We alſo, for and in conſideration of the high " fidelity, conſtancy, and ready and laudable ſer- " vice, by the ſaid mayor and commonalty, and " citizens, of our ſaid city of London, to us in the " beginning of our reign, and continually ever " ſince manifeſted, faithfully done and expended; " have ratified and allowed, and by us, our " heirs, and ſucceſſors, as much as in us is, do " accept of and approve, all and ſingular the " letters patent, charters, and confirmations of " our moſt famous progenitors and anceſtors, to " the ſame mayor and commonalty, and citizens, " of the ſaid city of London, and their predeceſ- " ſors, by whatſoever name of incorporation be- " fore theſe times made, granted, or confirmed; " and all and ſingular gifts, grants, confirmations, " reſtitutions, cuſtoms, ordinances, explanations, " and all other things whatſoever, in whatſoever " letters patent, or charters, of our predeceſſors, " progenitors, or anceſtors, kings of England; " and alſo all and ſingular things in the ſaid let- " ters patent, charters, grants, confirmations, " or any of them, contained, cited, confirmed, " or explained; and all and ſingular juriſdictions, " authorities, privileges, quittances, and free- " cuſtoms and hereditaments whatſoever, which " the ſaid mayor and commonalty, and citizens of " the ſaid city of London, or their predeceſſors, " by the name of mayor and commonalty, and " citizens of the city of London; or by the name " of the mayor and aldermen of the city of Lon- " don; or by the name of the mayor, citizens, " and commonalty of the city of London; or by " the name of the mayor and commonalty of the " city of London; or by the names of the citizens " of the city of London; or by the names of the " barons of London; or by the names of the ba- " rons of the city of London; or by any other " names whatſoever; by reaſon or force of any " letters patent, charters, or confirmations, of " any of our progenitors, kings of England, " which in any time or times they had reaſonably " uſed or exerciſed: and them all and ſingular to " the ſaid mayor and commonalty, and citizens, of " the ſaid city of London, and their ſucceſſors, do " ratify and confirm; to have and hold, enjoy " and exerciſe, all and ſingular the premiſes to " the ſame mayor and commonalty, and citizens " of the ſaid city of London, and their ſucceſſors " for ever, ſo fully, clearly, and entirely, and in " as ample manner and form, as if they were or " had been ſeverally, particularly, and by name " in theſe preſents expreſſed and declared. And " further, we will, and of our ſpecial grace, for " us, our heirs, and ſucceſſors, do grant, that " the ſaid mayor and commonalty, and citizens, " and their ſucceſſors, be reſtored to all and ſin- " gular their authorities, juriſdictions, liberties, " franchiſes, privileges, acquittances, immuni- " ties, and free-cuſtoms; and we do reſtore the " ſame to them, and their ſucceſſors, by theſe " preſents, as fully, freely, and entirely, as they " or their predeceſſors, in any time of our pro- " genitors or predeceſſors, kings of England, uſed " or enjoyed, or ought to have, uſe and enjoy " the ſame. Witneſs ourſelf at our honour of " Hampton-Court, the 20th day of September, " in the year of our reign of England, France, " and Ireland, the ſixth; and of Scotland the " two and fortieth."

By this valuable charter, not only the ancient rights, liberties, and immunities of the citizens are in the moſt ample manner confirmed, but likewiſe the precincts of Duke's-place, St. Bartholomew's the Great and Leſs, Black and White-friars, and Cold Harbour, are added to the bounds of the city and juriſdictions thereof.

In the year 1609 his majeſty was pleaſed to offer the citizens of London, the whole province of Ulſter, in the kingdom of Ireland, on the condition that they would engage to ſettle an Engliſh colony therein; which offer being accepted of, the common-council paſſed an act to raiſe twenty thouſand pounds for carrying the deſign into execution; and a committee was appointed of ſix aldermen and eighteen commoners to be annually choſen for the government thereof.

The late proclamation againſt the increaſe of new buildings in and about London not having its intended effect, and his majeſty being apprehenſive that it might in time bring the plague to Whitehall, he, by the advice of his council again ſtrictly prohibited the erecting buildings on new foundations within two miles of the city, on the penalty of having them demoliſhed.

This year Aldgate, which had been taken down in 1606, owing to its ruinous condition, was completely finiſhed. In a large ſquare on the eaſt front was placed the ſtatue of king James I. In gilt armour, with a golden lion and chained unicorn couchant at his feet. On the top was a vane ſupported by a gilt ſphere; on each ſide of which ſtood a ſoldier, holding a bullet in his hand, on the top of the upper battlements. The figure of Fortune was placed on the weſt ſide ſtanding on a globe, with a proſperous ſail ſpreading over her head; under which was carved the king's arms. On the ſouth-ſide, ſomewhat lower, ſtood Peace, with a dove perched on one hand, and a gilded wreath in the other: and on the north ſide was the emblem of Charity. Over the arch were genteel apartments allotted for one of the Lord-mayor's carvers, to which they aſcended by a pair of ſtairs from the poſtern on the ſouth ſide of the gate. In the poſtern, on the north-ſide, was the watch-houſe for Aldgate ward. This beautiful building was taken down and totally demoliſhed by virtue of a late act of parliament.

In the year 1610 the proprietors of the fields for two miles without the city walls, having reſtrained the exerciſe of archery by encloſing their grounds and deſtroying the old marks, eſpecially about Mile-end, his majeſty empowered commiſſioners to go upon thoſe places, and view and ſurvey ſuch grounds, next adjoining to the city and ſuburbs, within the compaſs of two miles, and the ſame to reduce into ſuch order and ſtate for the archers as they were in the reign of Henry VIII. and to cauſe the hedges, banks, ditches and quickſets to be made plain and re-formed.

This year the Lord-mayor and citizens, ſuſpecting that the great increaſe of inhabitants might produce a famine, prepared for its dreadful conſequences by erecting twelve new public graneries at Bridewell, large enough to contain ſix thouſand quarters of corn, which, in caſe of a ſcarcity, or any combination by the dealers in that commodity, was to be ſold to the poor at prime coſt.

Mr. Thomas Sutton, a rich batchelor, purchaſed this year of the earl of Suffolk, the religious houſe of the Carthuſian-monks, called the Charter-houſe, for thirteen thouſand pounds, and in the year following obtained a patent for his intended charitable foundation, which, in 1628, was confirmed by parliament. He endowed his hoſpital and ſchool with fifteen manors, and other lands, to the value of four thouſand four hundred and ninety pounds per annum and upwards, which now goes at ſix thouſand pounds a year, for the maintenance of eighty penſioners, who are to be provided with handſome apartments, and all neceſſaries of life, except cloaths, inſtead of which each is allowed a gown and ſeven pounds per annum. Theſe muſt be decayed gentlemen, merchants or ſoldiers. Forty four-boys lodged and boarded, and inſtructed in claſſical learning: twenty nine ſtudents at the univerſities, who have each an allowance, for eight years, of twenty pounds per annum. The governors have the patronage of nine eccleſiaſtical beneſices, and they are obliged to give the preference to ſuch as are educated in the Charter-houſe. There is a maſter and uſher, a preacher, and ſome perſon of great reputation for his learning to be maſter of the houſe, all of whom are choſen by the governors, who likewiſe admit the penſioners and boys:

the latter of which, on being put out to trades, have forty pounds given with each of them.

In the year 1611, Sir Baptiſt Hicks, one of the juſtices of peace in Middleſex, built a ſeſſions-houſe in St. John's-ſtreet for the better accommodation of the juſtices, who, before this time, uſed to tranſact their buſineſs in the Caſtle-Inn. The juſtices gave it the name of Hicks's-hall, which it has retained from that day to this.

In the following year Frederick the Elector Palatine arrived in London, and was eſpouſed to princeſs Elizabeth, only daughter to king James I. from whom is deſcended the houſe of Hanover. On the wedding day the city preſented the electoral bride with a necklace of oriental pearl of above two thouſand pounds value. Soon after the prince palatine honoured the Lord-mayor with his company to dinner at Guildhall; and received from his lordſhip, in the name of the citizens, a very large baſon and ewer, and two large pots or flagons of ſilver richly gilt.

The citizens having been dilatory in ſettling the province of Ulſter in Ireland, lately conferred on them by royal favour, were ſeverely reprimanded by his majeſty. In conſequence of which the common-council came to a reſolution to ſend a deputation from their body to ſuperintend the work of plantation, and to compleat the eſtabliſhment of that colony. Accordingly they deputed an alderman and a commoner, and the governor and committee of direction added to them three gentlemen of great abilities and experience, as their aſſiſtants; and by their united endeavours it was ſoon ſettled on the beſt foundation; not only to the ſatisfaction of his majeſty, but to the honour and intereſt of this great city.

Act of common-council againſt ſelling proviſions in the ſtreets. A grand maſque. King's writ for ſhip money. The clergy's petition for increaſe of tythes.

IN the year 1613 Sir Hugh Middleton finiſhed that moſt uſeful and expenſive ſcheme of ſupplying this city with ſweet and wholeſome water.

By virtue of an act of parliament paſſed in the reign of queen Elizabeth, and another in that of king James I. granting powers to cut and convey a river from any part of Middleſex or Hertfordſhire, to ſupply the city of London with water, Sir Hugh undertook, after it had been attempted by ſeveral others without ſucceſs, to bring ſuch a river from Chadwell and Amwell, near Ware, in Hertfordſhire, to a baſon or reſervoir near Iſlington. He began this great undertaking on the 20th of February 1608, and with great difficulty, art, induſtry, and expence (which is ſaid to have been not leſs than five hundred thouſand pounds, with the aſſiſtance of king James and the mayor and commonalty of London) cut a trench in ſome places full thirty feet deep, through ouzy, muddy, ſtiff, craggy, and ſtony ground, and with ſo many windings to find out a proper current, that, from the fountain to the reſervoir, it meaſured thirty-eight miles, three quarters, and ſix poles. * So far

* This river, in its preſent ſituation, has forty-three ſluices and two hundred and fifteen bridges in and over it, and is carried over two vales in wooden frames or troughs lined with lead; one at Buſhill, ſix hundred and ſixty feet in length, and thirty feet high, under which is an arch to receive the land-waters, and large enough for the paſſage of any cart or waggon laden with hay or ſtraw; the other is a little to the northward of Highbury, and is in length four hundred and ſixty-two feet, and ſeventeen feet high: and over and under the ſame river a great number of brooks, rills, and water-courſes, have their paſſage; beſides many conſiderable currents of land-waters. This river is conducted, in other places, through ſubterraneous paſſages; and its head or reſervoir at Iſlington fills fifty eight main pipes of ſeven inch bore, (beſides thoſe added to ſerve the liberties of Weſtminſter) by which the water is conveyed into the ſeveral ſtreets, lanes, alleys, courts, &c. of London and its ſuburbs, and to the nothern liberties of Weſtminſter, and parts adjacent, to the great convenience and uſe of the inhabitants.

After Sir Hugh had ſpent his whole fortune in the execution of this noble work, he was not only obliged to part with a moiety of the profits for a ſum of money advanced by the king, and to ſell many other ſhares, but in the end was entirely ruined by a project which had turned out of ſuch ineſtimable value to the city of London. At that time ſo little did the people underſtand the advantages that might be made of this river, that for upwards of thirty years the proprietors did not divide above five pounds to each of the ſeventy-two ſhares into which the property was divided; ſo great a difference is there between that time and this, that the far did Sir Hugh accompliſh this great work as the bringing it to the intended reſervoir; but the water was not admitted into it till Michaelmas-day in the above year: on which occaſion Sir Thomas Middleton, his brother and Lord-mayor elect, accompanied by Sir John Swinnerton the mayor, many aldermen, and other gentlemen repaired, in ſolemn cavalcade, to the place called New-River-head. On their arrival there, ſixty labourers, handſomely dreſſed with green caps, marched with pickaxes, ſhovels and ſpades three times round the baſon, preceded by drums and trumpets, who ſtopped before the Lord-mayor, &c. ſeated on an eminence, one of whom addreſſed them in a long copy of verſes adapted to the occaſion. This being ended, the ſluices were opened, and the ſtream ran plentifully into the reſervoir, under the ſound of drums and trumpets, the diſcharge of cannon, and loud acclamations of the beholders.

In the year 1614 Smithfield, the public market-place for cattle, having become ſo ruinous that it was almoſt impaſſable, his majeſty, to prevent the dangerous conſequences attending the ſame, enjoined the citizens to pave it at their own expence: to which they readily complying, it was ſet about and finiſhed within ſix months, at the expence of ſixteen hundred pounds.

This year his majeſty having appointed a general muſter of the militia throughout the kingdom, the city of London muſtered ſix thouſand citizens completely armed, who performed their evolutions with ſuch dexterity as gained them univerſal applauſe. The martial ſpirit of the citizens was ſo great, that the children endeavoured to imitate their parents: they choſe themſelves officers, formed themſelves into companies, often marched into the fields with colours flying and drums beating, where, by frequent practice, they became very expert in military exerciſes.

About this time, the citizens being greatly diſtreſſed by monopolizers, regrators, and foreſtallers in coals, his majeſty, to redreſs their grievances, granted them the following charter:

" James, by the grace of God, king of Eng" land, Scotland, France, and Ireland, defender of

In the year 1615, the citizens of London began paving the ſides of the principal ſtreets before their doors with free-ſtone for the better accommodation of foot paſſengers.

This year Sir Thomas Overbury was poiſoned in the Tower, for which the earl of Somerſet and his lady were condemned, but afterwards pardoned; and Sir Gervaſe Elwes, then lieutenant of the Tower, and ſome others, who were the meaner inſtruments made uſe of in that murder, were executed.

In the year 1616, the plantation of Ulſter in Ireland, went on with ſuch ſucceſs, that two good towns were colonized by the names of Londonderry and Colerain. His majeſty was pleaſed to diſtinguiſh the firſt by forming it into a city, the latter he made a mayor-town. Soon after, by a ſpecial commiſſion from the king and the city of London, Sir Peter Proby, alderman of London, and governor of the ſaid colony, attended by many capital citizens, went over to Ireland, and preſented each of the above-mentioned towns with a rich ſword of ſtate to be carried before their chief magiſtrates.

This year the citizens of London rebuilt Alderſgate. Over the arch, in a large ſquare, was the figure of king James I. on horſeback, in the ſame attitude as when he made his firſt entry into London. Over his head were quartered the arms of England, Scotland, and Ireland. In a niche, on the eaſt ſide, ſtood the prophet Jeremiah, with the words of the twenty-fifth verſe of the 17th chapter of his book; and on the weſt ſide ſtood the prophet Samuel, with the firſt verſe of the 12th chapter of 1 Sam. In a chair of ſtate, on the ſouth ſide, ſat king James I. in his royal robes, done in relief. Over the gate were apartments appropriated to the uſe of the common crier; the way to which was from the poſtern on the eaſt ſide: and on the weſt ſide was another poſtern for the convenience of foot paſſengers. This gate ſhared the common fate with others, and was entirely taken down.

In the month of September this year, king James returned from Scotland by way of Windſor; and was received at Hyde-Park by the Lord-mayor, aldermen, &c. in their formalities, who preſented his majeſty with a purſe containing five hundred broad pieces of gold; for which compliment the honour of knighthood was conferred on the recorder of London.

In the year 1617 his majeſty, at the interceſſion of many biſhops, cauſed certain rules to be publiſhed under the title of the Book of Sports, by which the people were tolerated to exerciſe recreations and diverſions on the Sabbath-day. The Lord-mayor and citizens, together with many of the clergy ſo far oppoſed it, that they incurred the reſentment of the high-commiſſion court. Notwithſtanding which the Lord-mayor perſevered ſo ſtrongly in ſhewing his contempt at ſuch an unchriſtian licence, that he even cauſed the king's carriages to be ſtopped as they were driving through the city in the time of divine ſervice. The matter being related to his majeſty with the moſt aggravating circumſtances, he ſwore, in a great rage, " He thought there had been no " more kings in England than himſelf." After the heat of his paſſion had ſubſided, he ſent a warrant to the mayor, commanding him to let them paſs; which he obeyed, with this declaration: "While it was in my power, I did my "duty; but that being taken away by a higher "power, it is my duty to obey." Which being told the king, he was highly pleaſed at the conduct of the mayor.

The following year Sir Walter Raleigh was beheaded on a ſcaffold erected for that purpoſe, in palace-yard, Weſtminſter. In the year 1603 he was arainged and condemned, but kept priſoner in the Tower (where he wrote his hiſtory of the world) till the year 1617, when he was allowed by king James I. at his own requeſt, to fetch gold from a certain mine in Guiana in the Weſt-Indies, wherein he miſcarried. Soon after which king James affirmed the ſentence which had been before paſſed on him, and, after fifteen years reprieve, he was executed to the great unhappineſs of the public in general, who thought it hard that ſuch a puniſhment ſhould be inflicted on a man of his uncommon abilities.

In the year 1619 Mr. William Alleyn, a very principal comedian, retired from the ſtage, and founded a college by the name of God's gift, at Dulwich; which he endowed very plenteouſly for a maſter and warden, who muſt be always of the name of Alleyn; and four fellows, viz. three divines and an organiſt; likewiſe for ſix poor men and women. Alſo twelve poor boys from the age of four or ſix years, are maintained and educated by one of the fellows as ſchoolmaſter, and by another as uſher, till they are fourteen or ſixteen years of age. Mr. Alleyn himſelf became the firſt maſter; and, in his original endowment he excluded all other benefactions to this foundation; and conſtituted the church-wardens of St. Botolph's Biſhopſgate, St. Giles's Cripplegate, and St. Saviour's Southwark, to be perpetual viſitors, who, on occaſion, were to appeal to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, before whom, at their admiſſion, all members were to be ſworn. Though the viſitors are the electors, yet they have no farther power than to nominate two out of the number of candidates who ſhall apply for admiſſion; which two muſt draw lots, and that party is entitled to the election who draws the lot marked God's gift. The maſter and warden muſt remain unmarried or be excluded the college; and on the death of the maſter he is always ſucceeded by the warden. Mr. William Alleyn likewiſe founded and endowed alms-houſes for ten poor men and women, with forty ſhillings a year each, and coats and breeches for the men, and gowns and petticoats for the women, every other year, in Petty-France; which place being afterwards improved by new buildings, the alms-houſes were removed to Lamb's-alley, in Biſhopſgate-ſtreet. He likewiſe founded ten other houſes for men and women, who receive ſix-pence per week each, and coats and gowns every other year in Peſthouſe-lane, Old-ſtreet: and likewiſe other houſes for ten poor men and women, with ſix-pence per week each, in Soap-yard, Deadman's place, Southwark.

In the year 1620 a determination having been formed of repairing St. Paul's Cathedral, his majeſty, attended by the prince of Wales, and many of the chief nobility, came in great ſtate from Whitehall to the city, on ſunday the 26th of March. At Temple-bar he was received by the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and ſheriffs, in their formalities, who preſented him with the city ſword, and a purſe of gold; the former of which being returned, it was carried by the mayor on horſeback before his majeſty, to St. Paul's Cathedral; when the king, alighting at the weſt door, repaired to a brazen pillar, and, kneeling down before it, invoked the Almighty to give a bleſſing on his preſent deſign. After which, an anthem being ſung, he repaired to St. Paul's croſs, where he heard a ſermon, and then proceeded to the biſhop of London's palace to concert meaſures for the more effectual execution of this great and good work.

This year his majeſty being in great want of money applied to the citizens for twenty thouſand pounds to be raiſed by way of benevolence; but they would advance no more than half that ſum, which was raiſed by the ſeveral companies.

The following year the Londoners were ſo exaſperated at the influence which Gondomar the Spaniſh ambaſſador had over the king, that they aſſaulted him in the public ſtreets. At which his majeſty was ſo enraged, that he came in perſon to Guildhall, and not only reprimanded the Lord-mayor and the other city magiſtrates for the inſolence of the populace, but threatened to reſtrain them by a military power in caſe of ſuch offence for the future. He likewiſe commanded diligent enquiry to be made after the aggreſſors; and one perſon, though no otherwiſe guilty than reflecting on the ſaid ambaſſador, was, by order of the king, cruelly whipped the next day from Aldgate to Temple-bar.

In the year 1623, on the 24th of October, a very melancholy accident happened in the French ambaſſadors houſe in Black-friars, where one Drury, a jeſuit, preaching in a large upper room three ſtories high, to a congregation of 300 people, and upwards, the floor gave way, and, falling downwards, the preacher and above a hundred of his hearers were killed, and near the ſame number miſerably wounded, maimed or buried in the ruins.

The following year his majeſty iſſued out warrants for the immediate raiſing of ten thouſand men for the elector palatine his ſon-in-law, and for the ſupport of the proteſtant intereſt in Germany. The citizens on this occaſion, to ſhew their great zeal for the intereſt of their prince, readily raiſed two-thouſand men towards that purpoſe.

In the beginning of the year 1625 his majeſty being ſeized with a tertian ague, the violence of the fits was ſo great, that he expired at Theobald's, in Hertfordſhire, in the fifty-ninth year of his age, after having ſwayed the ſcepter of England twenty-two years, and that of Scotland even from his infancy.

In the above reign the manufacture of white-brown paper was firſt made in England, particularly in Surry and about Windſor.

On the demiſe of king James, the privy-council, accompanied by the Lord-mayor and aldermen, repaired to Ludgate, whither his majeſty king king Charles I. arriving on horſeback, he was there proclaimed, as well as at all other places in the city, with the uſual ſolemnities, and the greateſt acclamations of joy from the populace.

The citizens were obliged to lay aſide the intended ſolemn reception of the king's entry into London, by a circumſtance which predicted thoſe miſeries which were afterwards felt both by the king and nation: for at this time the plague raged ſo violently both in the city and ſuburbs, that in one year it carried off thirty-five thouſand four hundred and ſeventy people, beſides upwards of eighteen thouſand, who died of other diſtempers.

On account of this dreadful calamity the coronation was poſtponed to the ſecond day of February; at which the Lord-mayor carried the ſhort ſceptre, and, after diſcharging his office as chief butler, received the uſual fee of a golden cup and ewer.

In the year 1626, in the month of June, there happened ſo violent a ſtorm of hail, rain, and wind, attended by thunder and lightning, that the church-yard walls of St. Andrew's Holbourn, and St. Botolph's Biſhopſgate, were entirely blown down, and many corps who had died of the plague were expoſed to public view.

This is the year from which may be dated the miſfortunes of king Charles I. A war between England and France ſubſiſting at this time, and his majeſty not being able to obtain aſſiſtance from the parliament, applied to the citizens for the ſum of one hundred thouſand pounds, but to his great mortification they rejected his demand. This ſo inflamed the king's miniſtry, who looked on the people as ſlaves, and their property at the diſpoſal of their ſovereign, that they prevailed on his majeſty peremptorily to demand the above ſum. The citizens, however, evaded the demand as modeſtly as they could before the privy-council, who, looking on their excuſes as frivolous and inſignificant, a poſitive command was ſent to the mayor and aldermen, either to comply, or riſque the conſequences of an obſtinate refuſal. The citizens were inflexible in their determination, nor would they liſten either to remonſtrances or threats.

Soon after this his majeſty commanded them to fit out immediately twenty of the beſt ſhips in the river, well manned, and ſtored with ammunition and proviſions for three months. On which the lord mayor and aldermen pretending their inability to comply with this requeſt, begged that his majeſty would be pleaſed to accept of half that number. But they were anſwered, "that the "number demanded were neceſſary for the pre"ſervation of the ſtate, and that the charge im"poſed did not exceed the value of ſome (one) "of their eſtates: that all excuſes on that oc"caſion were to be rejected, as tending to the "manifeſt danger of the public: and that as the "ſaid demand was not only directed to the gene"rality of the city, but likewiſe to the ſeveral "members, his majeſty would therefore require "an account of every citizen in particular." In conſequence of this anſwer the citizens were obliged to fit out the twenty ſhips above demanded.

The reſentment of the miniſtry did not reſt here. Determined to raiſe money at all events, they arbitrarily ſeized and impriſoned many perſons of diſtinction who oppoſed the loan; among whom was twenty principal citizens: and the lower claſs of people were forced into the ſervice of his majeſty either by ſea or land.

The citizens were ſo alarmed at theſe arbitrary proceedings, that they grew more reſolute as they found themſelves more oppreſſed; and to ſuch an iſſue was matters brought, that the parties impriſoned on account of the loan, were, by order of council, releaſed; and the Lord-mayor was ordered to proceed moderately in his demands of the citizens within his juriſdiction.

In the year 1628 one Dr. Lamb (who was not only hated by the populace for being a creature of the duke of Buckingham, the king's favourite, but likewiſe a reputed conjuror) being found in the city, was attacked firſt by a few boys, and ſoon after by a great multitude, who purſued him down Wood-ſtreet, crying out "Conjuror, vizard, devil;" and ſeizing him bodily, they dragged him along the ſtreet, kicking and thumping him with their feet and fiſts. His majeſty having been informed of the tumult arrived juſt time enough with his body guard to ſave the doctor's life: he remonſtrated with the citizens on their conduct, mildly exhorted them to keep the public peace, and to deliver up the doctor to be tried by the laws of his country, aſſuring them, that whatever offence the law ſhould find him guilty of he ſhould be ſeverely puniſhed. This was ſo far from having any effect on the enraged populace, that they only anſwered, "they had "judged him already;" and then pulling him inhumanly by his legs and arms, they ſo diſlocated his joints, and otherwiſe beat him, that he inſtantly died.

His majeſty finding himſelf unable to chaſtiſe ſuch inſolence, immediately returned to his palace: ſoon after which the privy-council ſent a letter to the Lord-mayor, aldermen and ſheriffs, commanding them to make ſtrict enquiry for the principal actors and abbettors, and to bring them to puniſhment: but ſo little regard did the Lord-mayor and aldermen pay to this order of council, that they reported they were not able to diſcover any of the ſaid rioters. They were thereupon commanded to attend the privy-council, where they were threatened, that if they did not deliver up the principal actors in the late murder, their charter ſhould be confiſcated. Their reſolution was ſo great to ſcreen the parties ſought after, that they gave no other anſwer, than that they could not be found. At which the king was ſo offended that he amerced the city in a fine of ſix thouſand pounds, but, on the commitment of ſeveral rioters afterwards, this fine was mitigated to fifteen hundred marks.

The following year the miniſtry adopted another expedient to raiſe money without parliamentary authority; which was to impoſe new duties on merchandize by order of privy-council only; and thoſe who had reſolution to oppoſe the ſaid order had their effects arbitrarily ſeized on, and others, by command of the king, were committed to priſon.

About

About this time an order was made by the privy-council to confine the ſouth ſide of Cheapſide from the Old-change to Bucklerſbury, then called Goldſmith's-row, and Lombard-ſtreet, to the trade of goldſmiths only. And about the ſame time the Lord-mayor publiſhed an order for keeping the ſabbath day holy.

In the year 1630 the ſheriff's officers having arreſted a man in Fleet-ſtreet, the populace, in a tumultuous manner, attempted his reſcue; but being ſtrongly oppoſed by the conſtables, a deſperate fray enſued, in which many perſons were killed, and others dangerouſly wounded. In order to ſuppreſs this dangerous commotion, the Lord-mayor iſſued a proclamation for apprehending the ring-leaders, many of whom being taken were tried and convicted of murder; but only one who was the chief of the rioters, was executed.

The following year the ſtreets of London being greatly incumbered with ſtalls and ſtands for the ſale of various goods, in defiance of the laws againſt thoſe nuiſances, the common-council enacted, "that no inhabitant whatever ſhould "preſume to ſell any thing in the ſtreets or lanes "of the city, on pain of forfeiting for the firſt "offence twenty-ſhillings, for the ſecond forty-"ſhillings, for the third four pounds, and for "each offence afterwards the penalty to be "doubled."

In the year 1633 complaint being made of engroſſers, and the bad practice of vintners, bakers, &c. in London, the ſtar-chamber made a decree, "that no perſon whatſoever ſhould preſume to en-"groſs any ſort of proviſion; and particularly, "that no chandler ſhould buy corn, grain, meal, "or flour, to ſell again at market or elſewhere. "that no vintner ſhould ſell any thing but bread "and wine; nor permit any fleſh or other ſorts "of proviſion to be brought into his houſe, to "be there eaten by any of his gueſts. That no "baker ſhould ſell bread at any other rate than "twelve, or at moſt thirteen, loaves to the dozen. "That the keepers of victualling houſes ſhould "take no more of each gueſt for a meal than two "ſhillings including wine and beer; and of a "ſervant eight-pence. That no inholder within "London and Weſtminſter, and ten miles of "the ſame, ſhould take above ſixpence in twenty-"four hours for hay for one horſe, nor more "than ſix-pence for a peck of oats. That to "prevent the many inconveniences that might "ariſe from the increaſe of the number of livery "ſtables in London, Weſtminſter, and South-"wark, it was decreed, that the ſaid ſtable-"keepers, after they had conſumed their ſtocks "of hay and oats, ſhould not lay in any further "proviſion, but lay the buſineſs entirely aſide. "And finally, that neither victuallers nor vint-"ners ſhould ſuffer cards, dice, tables, or other "unlawful games in their houſes, under penalty "of loſing their licence."

This year his majeſty was entertained by the gentlemen of the four inns of court with a maſque, which coſt them upwards of twenty thouſand pounds. The proceſſion began at Ely-houſe in Holbourn, and proceeded under the royal inſpection to Whitehall, where their majeſties viewed them with great pleaſure from a window of the banqueting-houſe. This maſque for curioſity of fancy, excellence in the performance, and dazzling ſplendor, exceeded every thing of the kind ever exhibited in England. Her majeſty was ſo particularly delighted with this pompous pageantry, that ſhe expreſſed a great deſire to have it repeated: which Ralph Freeman, the mayor, receiving intimation of, invited their majeſties to dine at Merchant-taylors-hall; they accepting the offer, his lordſhip entertained them with the greateſt magnificence, and cauſed the abovementioned maſquerade to be performed in all its parts, with the ſame dexterity, ſplendor and applauſe as it had been done at Whitehall.

In the year 1634 his majeſty greatly offended the citizens of London by iſſuing a writ for levying ſhip-money without the aſſent of parliament towards fitting out a formidable fleet. In conſequence of which a common-council was called, who reſolved to addreſs his majeſty for relief againſt that illegal and exorbitant demand, in the following form: "whereas your majeſty, by writ, "bearing teſte the twentieth of October laſt, "commanded your petitioners, at their charge, "to provide ſeven ſhips of war, furniſhed with "men, victual, and all warlike proviſions, to be "at Portſmouth by the firſt of March next, and "to continue from thence by the ſpace of twenty-"ſix weeks in your majeſty's ſervice, upon de-"fence of the ſeas, and other cauſes in the ſaid "writ contained; your petitioners do, in all ſub-"miſſive humbleneſs, and with acknowledgement "of your ſacred majeſty's many favours unto "your ſaid city, inform your majeſty, that they "conceive, that by ancient privileges, grants and "acts of parliament, (which they are ready hum-"bly to ſhew forth) they are exempt and are to "be freed from the charge. And do moſt hum-"bly pray, that your majeſty will be graciouſly "pleaſed, that the petitioners, with your princely "grace and favour, may enjoy the ſaid privile-"ges and exemptions, and be freed from pro-"viding of the ſaid ſhips and proviſions." This had ſo contrary an effect to what the citizens expected, that his majeſty extended the ſhip money over the whole kingdom, which at firſt was impoſed on maritime towns only.

This year the clergy petitioned his majeſty for an increaſe of their tithes; alledging, that by the colluſion between landlord and tenant, the decree for tythes was greatly evaded; and that, in their preſent condition, they were not able to contend with their pariſhioners. His majeſty ſo far condeſcended to give them redreſs, that he appointed a commiſſion to enquire into the alledged grievances: during which time the citizens oppoſed their proceedings ſo warmly by petitions to the king and council, that the deciſion of the point in queſtion was entirely left to his majeſty's determination; who was unwilling to paſs an award in a matter ſo unpopular at a time when the nation was in the greateſt ferment. And they the matter dropped.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Hackney coaches firſt ply in the ſtreets. Return of the plague. Proſecutions for ſhip-money. King Charles's firſt charter to the citizens. Pay dear for it by being condemned to forfeit Ulſter. The citizens raiſe 1200 men to fight againſt the Scots. Order of privy-council for a double watch, and for aſſembling the train bands. Several aldermen committed to priſon. Proſecution ordered againſt the Lord-mayor and ſheriffs with reſpect to ſhip-money. The king's ſecond charter confirming the rights of package, portage and ſcavage. The Scots take poſſeſſion of the town of Newcaſtle. Their letter to the Lord-mayor. The city petition for aboliſhing epiſcopacy. The king applies to the city for a loan of one hundred thouſand pounds. Petition to parliament againſt the earl of Strafford. The Spaniſh ambaſſador's houſe attacked by the city apprentices. Another petition againſt the earl of Strafford. Diſpute concerning election of ſheriffs. Loan of fifty thouſand pounds to the parliament.

IN the year 1635 the number of hackney coaches having greatly encreaſed, they plied in the ſtreets in the ſame manner they do at this time. But great inconveniences being found by their obſtructing the common paſſages, and rendering the ſtreets dangerous to his majeſty and the nobility, a proclamation was iſſued, on the nineteenth of January, ſtrictly commanding, "that after the 24th of June next enſuing, no "hackney coach ſhould be uſed in the city of "London, nor ſuburbs thereof, other than by "carrying of people too and from their habita-"tions in the country, and that no perſon ſhould "make uſe of a coach in this city, except ſuch "perſons as were capable of keeping four able "horſes fit for his majeſty's ſervice; which were "to be ready when called for, under a ſevere "penalty."

About this time London was again viſited with the plague, which raged ſo violently, that, within the year it took off ten thouſand four hundred citizens; on which account the fairs of St. Bartholomew and Southwark were ſuppreſſed.

The citizens were afflicted with a ſtill greater plague than this: for the miniſtry were determined, at all events, to ſupport the authority of the king and council, by raiſing money without conſent of parliament; nor indeed did they want men in power to countenance their arbitrary proceedings: for Sir Edward Bromfield, Lord-mayor of London, committed Mr. Richard Chambers, a merchant, to priſon, for peremptorily refuſing to pay ſhip-money. This gentleman brought an action againſt Sir Edward for falſe impriſonment; but Sir Robert Berkley, one of the juſtices of the King's-bench, ſoon quaſhed the cauſe by declaring in court, "that there was a rule of law, and "another of government; and that many things "that could not be done by the rule of law, might "be done by that of government."

This, however, did not deter the citizens from their reſolution not to pay ſhip-money. Another order was ſoon after ſent by the privy-council, requiring their ſubmiſſion to the authority of the king and council; but this they rejected with ſuch reſolution, that it produced the following letter to the Lord-mayor and aldermen: We "have received, by ſome of you the alder-"men, a denial, in the name of the city, to our "late letter for the ſetting forth of ſhipping for "the preſent and neceſſary defence of the king-"dom; and the excuſes that are made on the "like occaſions, we cannot impute truly to any "thing but want of duty. We do therefore, in "his majeſty's name, and by his command-"ment, require you to ſee the directions of our "ſaid letter performed, upon your allegiance, "and as you will anſwer the contrary at your "perils. And ſo, &c."

The citizens then petitioned the council for an abatement of the number of ſhips rated on the city; but this was abſolutely rejected. And in order to perplex the Londoners ſtill more, the privy-council ſent an arbitrary letter, in the king's name, commanding the Lord-mayor and aldermen to ſhut up all ſhops in Goldſmith's-row, Cheapſide and Lombard-ſtreet that were not occupied by goldſmiths; which order was ſoon after enforced by a decree of the court of ſtar-chamber. However, the citizens paid no regard either to this order or a future letter, which was ſent by the privy-council to the Lord-mayor and aldermen, commanding them to inform their deputies of thoſe wards in which Cheapſide and Lombard-ſtreet, are ſituated, that if they did not forthwith put their former directions in that particular in execution, they would then give ſuch further orders, as ſhould teach them to know, that the commands of that board ought not to be ſlighted.

Notwithſtanding this contention between the city and court, yet the former prevailed on his majeſty to grant them a more extenſive charter than they had ever received from any other kings. By which his majeſty confirmed all their former letters patent, the garbling of tobacco only excepted. And after reciting the charter granted by king Henry VI. and making all other charters of the ſaid king void, his majeſty grants as follows:

" That the mayor, recorder, and aldermen, " belonging to the city of London, be juſtices of " the peace; with power to commit thoſe to the " priſon of Newgate, &c. who ſhall refuſe to " find ſecurities for the preſervation of the peace; " and to do and to execute all ſuch things, which " juſtices and keepers of the peace in any county " of England do, or are wont to do. That four " of the ſaid juſtices, the mayor or recorder al- " ways to be one, may hold a ſeſſions, to enquire " into weights and meaſures, and ſelling victuals " contrary to the ſtatutes, &c. And to receive " and inſpect into indictments taken before them, " to make and continue proceſs, and puniſh of- " fenders, according to the laws of the kingdom, " and cuſtom of the city: and to execute the " laws as fully and largely, as any other juſtices " of the peace in any other county. And or- " dains, that the ſheriffs, &c. ſhall attend, aid, " and aſſiſt the ſaid juſtices, when deſired. He " alſo grants them the forfeiture of recogni- " zances, particularly thoſe relating to baſtard " children, inmates, and alehouſes: with recog- " nizances for appearances at the ſeſſions of goal " delivery. He likewiſe grants them all fines, " amerciaments, &c. impoſed by the conſervator " of the river Thames, and by the commiſſioners " of ſewers. And he grants Moorfields and " Weſt-ſmithfield, with liberty to hold fairs and " markets in the ſaid fields, with all tolls, profits, " &c. thereunto belonging. To which grant is " added this particular clauſe: We, our heirs or " ſucceſſors, will not erect or cauſe to be erected, " nor will permit or give leave to any perſon or " perſons to erect and build a new one, or any " meſſuages, houſes, ſtructures, edifices in or " upon the ſaid field called Inner Moor, or the " field called Outward Moor, or the ſaid field " called Weſt-ſmithfield; but that the ſaid ſepa- " rate fields and places be reſerved, diſpoſed and " continued to ſuch like common and public uſes, " as the ſame fields heretofore and now are uſed, " diſpoſed or converted to, (ſaving nevertheleſs " and always reſerving to us, our heirs and ſuc- " ceſſors, all ſtreets, lanes and alleys, and now " waſte and void ground and places, as they are " now within the city and liberties of the ſame) " to hold and enjoy the ſaid meſſuages, houſes, " edifices, court-yards and all and ſingular the " premiſes granted or confirmed, or mentioned " to be granted and confirmed, with all their " appurtenances, (except before excepted) to " the ſaid mayor and commonalty, and citizens " of the ſaid city, and their ſucceſſors for ever; " to hold in fee and common burgage, and not " in capite, or by knights ſervice. He fur- " ther grants the garbling of all ſpices and mer- " chandize, and other things, which ought to " be garbled; (except only tobacco) with power " to take fees for the ſame: and alſo the office " of gauging wines, oils, and other merchan- " dizes and things gaugable, with all and ſin- " gular fees, profits and emoluments, appertain- " ing to the ſaid office: and to keep the great " balance or weight, within London, and all " weights whatſoever of all ſorts of wares, mer- " chandizes, and things within the ſaid city. And " he conſtituted the Lord-mayor, commonalty, " and citizens of London, and their ſucceſſors, " keepers of the great ſtandard, balance and " weight, and all weights whatſoever; with power " to take fees, &c. appertaining to the ſaid office. " And then he proceeds in theſe words: Alſo we " will, and for us, our heirs and ſucceſſors, do " erect and create in and through the ſaid city, " and liberties thereof, and in and through our " borough and town of Southwark, in our county " of Surry, a certain office called outroper, or " common cryer, to and for the ſelling of houſ- " hold ſtuff, apparel, leaſes of houſes, jewels, " goods, chattels, and other things, of all per- " ſons who ſhall be willing that the ſaid officers " ſhall make ſale of the ſame things by public " and open claim, commonly called outcry, and " ſale in common and open place or places in the " ſaid city, and the liberties of the ſame, and " for the town and borough of Southwark afore- " ſaid: and the ſame office, for the conſideration " aforeſaid, we, for us, our heirs and ſucceſſors, " do give and grant to the ſaid mayor, commo- " nalty, and citizens, of the city of London, " and their ſucceſſors for ever, to have and exer- " ciſe the ſame office, by them or their deputy, " officer or miniſter, officers, deputies, and mi- " niſters, being firſt allowed or admitted thereto " by the mayor and commonalty, and citizens of " the ſaid city, for the time being, in common- " cil of the ſaid city aſſembled, or the major part " of them: and that it ſhall and may be lawful " to the ſaid mayor and commonalty, and citi- " zens of the city of London, and their ſucceſſors, " and their deputy or deputies, officers or mi- " niſters to demand, take, and keep, for the uſe " of the ſaid mayor and commonalty, and citi- " zens, aforeſaid, the wares and fees expreſſed in " a certain ſchedule hereunto annexed. And we " will, and, for us, our heirs and ſucceſſors, do " ſtrictly appoint, command, and charge all per- " ſons, that neither they nor any of them pre- " ſume to ſell any goods, chattels, houſhold-ſtuff, " apparel, jewels, and other things in public " claim, called outcry in the city aforeſaid, or the " liberties of the ſame, or in the borough and " town of Southwark, under pain of our royal " diſpleaſure.

" And alſo we, for us, our heirs and ſucceſ- " ſors, do grant to the ſaid mayor and common- " alty, and citizens of the ſaid city, and their " ſucceſſors, and by theſe preſents do declare, " that the relicts and widows of freemen of the " ſaid city, uſing manual arts and occupations, ſo " long as they ſhall continue widows, and remain " in the ſame city from time to time, and at all " times hereafter, may and be licenſed to uſe and " execute, and exerciſe the ſame arts and manual " occupations in the ſaid city, although they were " not educated by the ſpace of ſeven years as ap- " prentices, notwithſtanding the ſtatute made and " publiſhed in parliament of lady Elizabeth, late " queen of England, in the 5th year of her reign; " or any other ſtatute or ordinance to the contrary " notwithſtanding. The granting of this charter muſt not be looked on as a free gift from the king; for the citizens paid very conſiderable ſums to obtain this confirmation of their ancient rights and privileges; and ſo ſoon after, as

In the year 1639 the miniſtry, in an illegal, arbitrary, and unjuſt manner, commenced a ſuit in the court of ſtar-chamber, againſt the Lord-mayor, and citizens, together with the governor and aſſiſtants of the new plantation in the province of Ulſter in Ireland, in order to deprive them of the improvements they had made, at a very conſiderable expence, in that province; when after a hearing of ſeventeen days, they were, by a decree of that court, condemned to loſe all their lands and poſſeſſions which had been granted to them by king James I. in that kingdom. Not ſatisfied with this, they at the ſame time amerced the citizens in a fine of fifty thouſand pounds; but the parliament thinking it high time to ſtop ſuch arbitrary proceedings, came to ſuch reſolutions as deterred the king from executing the ſaid decree with reſpect to the fine: he moreover declared the decree againſt the Iriſh eſtate unlawful, and confirmed the grant of the province of Ulſter made to them by the late king.

The citizens, knowing this lenity aroſe from the power of parliament and not the inclination of the king, gave him afterwards reaſon to repent of ſuch illegal meaſures, by joining the parliament, whom they looked on as their protectors and guardians.

In the year 1640, an army being immediately wanted to march againſt the Scots, the privy-council called on the city to ſend twelve hundred men

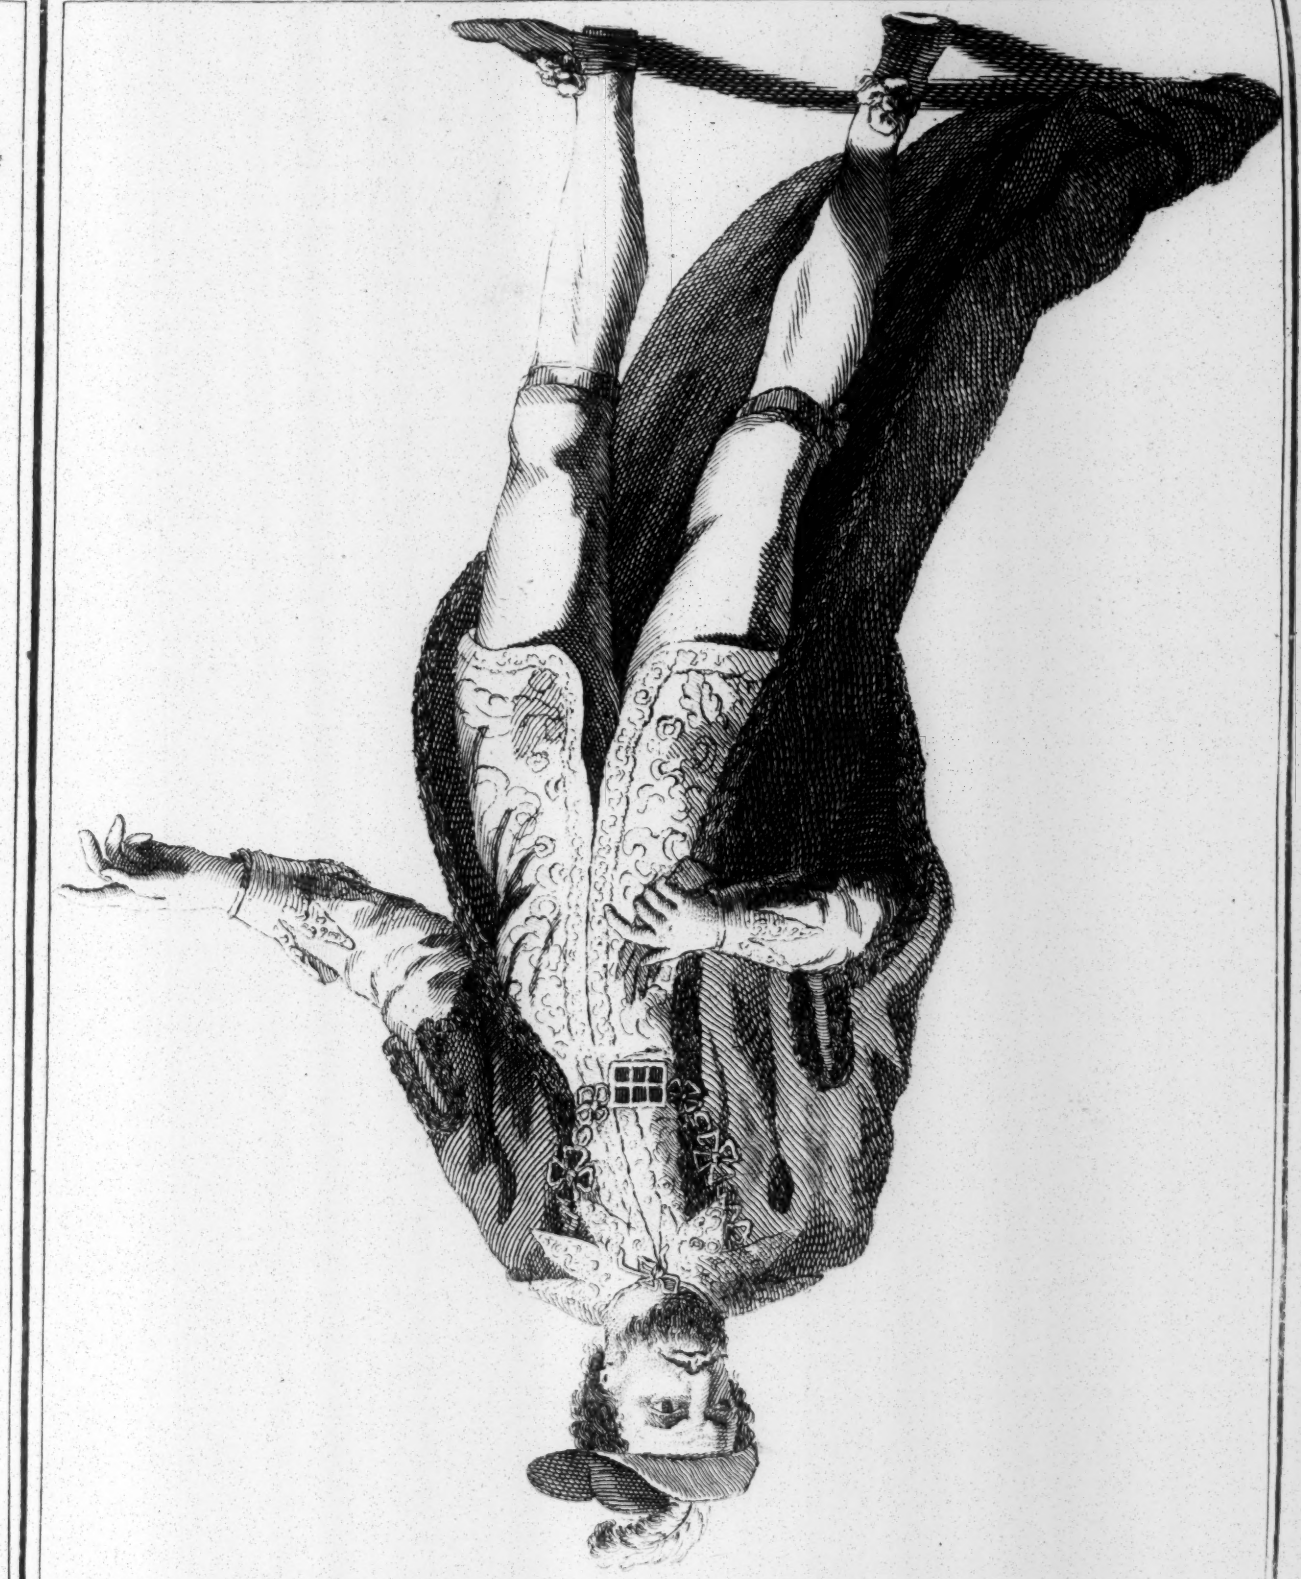
HABIT of a MERCHANTS WIFE of London in 1610



Engraved for Chamberlains History of London

men to join that expedition, which were accordingly raiſed, and ſhipped at Blackwall, though not without ſome oppoſition from the rabble.

The populace in general were ſo enraged at the archbiſhop of Canterbury, whom they looked on as a principal leader in all miniſterial oppreſſions, that, in conſequence of a paper ſtuck up in the Royal Exchange, they aſſembled to the number of five hundred, and marched in the night to the palace at Lambeth with an intent to deſtroy him and the building: but the biſhop being apprized of their coming, was ſo guarded that he fruſtrated all their attempts, and obliged them to retire without accompliſhing the purpoſes they intended.

The court being greatly alarmed at this, the privy council ſent an order to the Lord-mayor to provide a double watch, and to oblige every houſekeeper to keep his apprentices and ſervants quiet and peaceable.

Notwithſtanding the Lord-mayor ſtrictly obeyed theſe orders, yet ſo turbulent and enraged were the citizens againſt the court and miniſtry for their deſpotic government, that they ſtuck up papers in various parts of the city, exciting the people to a general inſurrection. This occaſioned another order from the privy-council to command the Lord-mayor to draw forth the city trained bands, the more effectually to ſuppreſs all diſorderly and riotous meetings.

The king at this time committed ſeveral aldermen to priſon for refuſing to give in the names of the moſt ſubſtantial houſekeepers within their juriſdiction: this was done the more ſtrongly to enforce them to advance ſuch ſums as he ſhould think proper without power of parliament; and to aſſeſs on them all the ſum of two hundred thouſand pounds. To effect which the attorney-general was ordered to proceed againſt them in the ſtar-chamber. This flame was ſtill farther increaſed by another order of the privy council, to proſecute the Lord-mayor and the ſheriffs of London and Middleſex for their contempt and default in the proſecution of the writ for ſhip-money.

Notwithſtanding theſe various perſecutions, it did not in the leaſt affect the firmneſs of theſe magiſtrates, who, to ſhew his majeſty that their conduct was not directed in contempt to him, but in oppoſition to his evil counſellors, immediately complied with his majeſty's command in furniſhing him with four hundred able bodied men well accoutred, and conducted to march and join his army againſt the Scots, on a promiſe of being repaid the expence out of his majeſty's exchequer.

The citizens, after this, advanced the king a conſiderable ſum of money in conſideration of his granting them another charter: by which, after firſt reciting their former privileges of package, ſurvey, or ſcavage of all goods, and of baillage, "his majeſty, in conſideration of four thouſand "two hundred pounds, confirms the ſaid offices, "and created, ordained, and conſtituted an of-"fice or officer of package of all ſorts of goods "and merchandize whatſoever, and an office of "carriage and portage of all wools, &c. and mer-"chandize whatſoever: and did ratify and con-"firm the fees ſet down in the tables hereunto "annexed, due to the ſaid office. And his ma-"jeſty did alſo give and grant the ſaid offices of "ſcavage, or ſurveying, baillage, package, car-"riage, and portage, and their lawful fees, to "the Lord-mayor and citizens of London, to be "exerciſed and occupied by ſufficient miniſters or "deputies," with this particular clauſe, "That "no other porter or carrier, or any other perſon "or perſons whatſoever, ſhall preſume to intermit "or intrude him or themſelves to carry or lade "any of the ſaid goods or merchandizes, from "any wharf or ſhore within the limits aforeſaid, "into any ſhip or veſſel; or to unlade any "goods or merchandizes from any veſſel upon "any wharf, ſhore, or lane, within the limits "aforeſaid; without the ſpecial appointment "or licence of the ſaid mayor and commonalty, "and citizens of the city aforeſaid, or of their "officers or deputies for that purpoſe firſt had "and obtained." And concludes with giving power and authority to the ſaid mayor and his proper officers, in the foreſaid employments, "to "give and adminiſter the oath upon the holy "evangeliſts, from time to time, to all ſuch per-"ſons ſuſpected or to be ſuſpected of withdraw-"ings, concealments, colourings, frauds, covins. "And that it ſhall and may be lawful to the ſaid "mayor, his miniſter, and deputy, or officer for "the time being, by all lawful ways and means "to compel all ſuch perſons ſuſpected, or to be "ſuſpected, as ſhall refuſe or deny to take the "ſaid oath, to take the ſame oath." Which charter is dated the fifth day of September, in the ſixteenth year of his reign.

The Scots having defeated the king's army at Newburn, immediately took poſſeſſion of Newcaſtle upon Tyne. This greatly alarmed the citizens, fearing they ſhould be deprived of the uſual and neceſſary ſupply of coals from thence. But theſe apprehenſions were ſoon laid aſide by a letter ſent from the Scotch commanders to the city magiſtrates, in which they promiſed not to ſtop the free traffic of coals in the river Tyne, and declared themſelves friends to the liberties of England.

The Lord-mayor and citizens not finding the miniſtry had any intention of removing their grievances, drew up a petition to his majeſty to call a new parliament, and to redreſs the many impoſitions complained of by the whole nation. The contents of which petition were as follows:

"Moſt gracious ſovereign,

"Being moved with the duty and obedience, "which by the laws your petitioners owe unto "your ſacred majeſty, they humbly preſent unto "your princely and pious wiſdom, the ſeveral "preſſing grievances following, viz.

"1. The preſſing and unuſual impoſitions up- "on merchandize, importing and exporting, and "the urging and levying of ſhip-money, not- "withſtanding both which, merchants ſhips and "goods have been taken and deſtroyed both by "Turkiſh and other pirates.

"2. The multitude of monopolies, patents, "and warrants, whereby trade in the city, and "other parts of the kingdom is much deſtroyed.

"3. The ſundry innovations in matters of re- "ligion.

"4. The oath and canons lately enjoined by "the late convocation, whereby your petition- "ers are in danger to be deprived of their miniſ- "ters.

"5. The great concourſe of papiſts, and their "inhabitations in London, and the ſuburbs, "whereby they have more means and opportu- "nity of plotting and executing their deſigns "againſt the religion eſtabliſhed.

"6. The ſeldom calling, and ſudden diſſolu- "tions of parliaments, without the redreſs of "grievances.

"7. The impriſonment of divers citizens for "non-payment of ſhip-money, and impoſitions; "and the proſecution of many others in the ſtar- "chamber, for not conforming themſelves to "committees in patents of monopolies, whereby "trade is reſtrained.

"8. The great danger your ſacred perſon is "expoſed unto in the preſent war, and the va- "rious fears that ſeized upon your petitioners "and their families by reaſon thereof; which "grievances and fears have occaſioned ſo great "a ſtop and diſtraction in trade, that your peti- "tioners can neither buy, ſell, receive or pay as "formerly, and tends to the utter ruin of the "inhabitants of this city; the decay of naviga- "tion, and clothing, and the manufactures of "this kingdom.

"Your humble petitioners conceiving, that "the ſaid grievances are contrary to the laws of "this kingdom, and finding by experience, that "they are not redreſſed by the ordinary courſe "of juſtice, do therefore moſt humbly beſeech "your moſt ſacred majeſty, to cauſe a parlia- "ment to be ſummoned with all convenient "ſpeed, whereby they may be relieved in the "premiſes.

"And your petitioners and loyal ſubjects "ſhall ever pray, &c.

By this petition the miniſtry foreſaw the fatal conſequences which muſt inevitably ariſe to themſelves ſhould it be carried into execution: they therefore ſent a letter to the Lord-mayor and aldermen, ſignifying that ſuch a petition was very dangerous, and unwarranted by the charters and cuſtoms of the city, and that it was unneceſſary as his majeſty was already taking the ſaid grievances ances into conſideration. This, however, had no effect on the citizens: they ſent the petition, by a deputation from the court of aldermen and common-council, to his majeſty, who was then with his army at York.

This had ſo good an effect, that his majeſty, in a letter dated the twenty-fifth of September, promiſed them a parliament ſhould be immediately called to redreſs their grievances; requeſting, at the ſame time, a loan of two hundred thouſand pounds to enable him to pay his army. Which ſum the citizens promiſed to advance, on condition the noblemen who were with his majeſty would join in the ſecurity.

The king, to fulfil his engagement with the citizens, ſummoned a parliament to meet on the third of November at Weſtminſter; when Mr. alderman Pennington, in the name of the city, delivered a petition to the houſe of commons, with a ſchedule of twenty-eight articles of grievances annexed. This petition, which was for the aboliſhment of epiſcopacy, with all its dependencies, roots and branches, was ſigned by upwards of fifteen thouſand citizens. And was thought to be ſtrongly abetted by the Scotch commiſſioners, who were now arrived in London, and had opened a kirk at Oxford houſe, near London-ſtone, to which many of the citizens reſorted.

The king at this time wanting money, the parliament applied to the citizens for a loan of one hundred thouſand pounds, on the credit and ſecurity of the ſubſidy bills: but this they abſolutely refuſed, alledging, that the city were a body not conſtituted for any ſuch purpoſe, nor able to make laws for the lending of money; and that they could only perſuade, and not compel. A petition was then preſented to the houſe of lords, ſigned by twenty thouſand citizens, to haſten the puniſhment of the earl of Strafford, "who," they alledged, "had counſelled the plundering "of the city, and putting it to fine and ranſom; "and had ſaid, that it would never be well, till "ſome of the aldermen were hanged up, becauſe "they would not yield to illegal levies of mo-"ney." In this petition they complained that the freedom and fulneſs of trade was ſtill greatly hindered; the affairs of the church remained unſettled; the papiſts tolerated and armed; the Iriſh army not diſbanded, nor the courts of juſtice yet reformed; and humbly prayed that his majeſty would redreſs theſe their grievances.

The citizens not meeting with any redreſs from theſe petitions, the populace were ſo incenſed, that on the twenty-ninth of April 1641, a great number of apprentices and others aſſembled before the houſe of the Spaniſh ambaſſador, threatening to pull it down, and even to kill the ambaſſador himſelf for permitting Engliſh papiſts to frequent his chapel. To appeaſe this commotion, the Lord-mayor immediately repaired to the ambaſſador's, and, with much difficulty, prevailed on the mob to diſperſe. After which his lordſhip entering the houſe was deſired by the miniſter to drop the point of his ſword, ſaying, that he was then in a place where the king of Spain, his maſter, had juriſdiction. To which his lordſhip complying, the ambaſſador told him, that if he would prevent the Engliſh ſubjects coming to maſs in his houſe, he would not ſend for them; but if they came, he could neither in conſcience to his religion, nor his maſter's honour, deny them acceſs to their devotions, or protection to their perſons, while they were with him. His lordſhip apologized for the rudeneſs of the mob, and ordered a ſtrong guard to be placed at the ambaſſador's houſe, which not only protected him from farther inſults, but prevented the popiſh citizens from frequenting maſs.

No ſooner had this ſtorm ſubſided, than another far more impetuous began: for a diſcovery being made of a deſign to bring the army to London to ſurprize the Tower, and favour the eſcape of the earl of Strafford, the citizens were ſo enraged, that the next day ſix thouſand of them, armed with ſwords, ſtaves, and cudgels, repaired to Weſtminſter, where, poſting themſelves in the avenues leading to the houſe of lords, they ſtopped all coaches, crying out for juſtice againſt Strafford; and petitioned the ſaid houſe, "Foraſmuch as your petitioners under-"ſtand, that the Tower of London is preſently "to receive a garriſon of men, not of the ham-"lets, as uſually they were wont to do; but "conſiſting of other perſons, under the com-"mand of a captain, a great confident of the "earl of Strafford, which doth increaſe their "fears of the king and kingdom; and that this "is done to make way for the eſcape of the earl "of Strafford, the grand incendiary: they there-"fore humbly pray, that inſtant courſe may be "taken for the diſcovery thereof; and that "ſpeedy execution of juſtice be done on the ſaid "earl." Theſe riotous proceedings were complained of by the lords to the commons; but the citizens would not diſperſe till they ſaw the proteſtation of both houſes of parliament for the defence of the king and kingdom.

The next day an order was ſent from the houſe of commons to the Lord-mayor, ſtrictly enjoining him to diſarm all papiſts under his juriſdiction within the ſpace of three days. And ſoon after another order was ſent from the ſame houſe, commanding the Lord-mayor and the reſpective magiſtrates within the bills of mortality, to uſe their beſt endeavours to prevent his majeſty's ſubjects from frequenting the chapels of popiſh ambaſſadors.

A conteſt aroſe about this time between the Lord-mayor and the commonalty, reſpecting the right of a choice in one of their ſheriffs, which the former claimed by a preſcription of three hundred years. The commonalty admitted of the mayor's nominating a perſon proper for that office, but inſiſted that he ſhould not ſerve, unleſs by their approbation. The king was applied to by the mayor and aldermen to determine this controverſy, but his majeſty referred it to the houſe of lords, who firſt recommended a reconciliation and ſettlement; but finding that ineffectual, their lordſhips thought proper (with a ſalvo on each ſide) to order them to proceed in the following manner: "That from this time the commonalty "ſhall forthwith proceed to the nomination and "election of both their ſheriffs for the year fol-"lowing, hoping that for the firſt of the two

"ſheriffs

" ſheriffs they will make choice of that party that " was nominated by the Lord-mayor: and their " lordſhips do further declare, that this order " ſhall be no way prejudicial to any right or pre- " rogative claimed by the lords, the mayors of " the city of London, for the time being; nor " yet to any right or claim made by the com- " mons or citizens in this matter, now in queſtion " amongſt them."

Advice being received from Scotland of an intended conſpiracy by the papiſts againſt the lives of many Scotch nobility, the parliament, were ſo alarmed, that they ſent orders to the Lord-mayor to place guards in various parts of the city to prevent any bad effects from the ſame, and that they ſhould continue till his lordſhip received farther directions.

About the ſame time the parliament were informed of a moſt dreadful conſpiracy by the papiſts in Ireland againſt all proteſtants; and ſo little ſenſe had they of pity or remorſe, that they committed the moſt horrid tortures on thoſe who fell in their way, without diſtinction of age or ſex.

On this melancholy occaſion the parliament applied to the city for a loan of fifty thouſand pounds towards the relief of thoſe who had eſcaped their inſatiable fury; which the citizens readily aſſenting to, the parliament paſſed an order not only for ſecuring the money now advanced, but likewiſe the fifty thouſand pounds they had lent his majeſty for the ſupport of his army in Yorkſhire.

CHAPTER XXXV.

The king's return from Scotland. His reception by the citizens. The city's petition to parliament for reformation, and againſt the removal of Sir William Belfour from the lieutenancy of the Tower. Petition of the apprentices againſt the new lieutenant and the biſhops. Five members impeached of high-treaſon, but protected by the citizens. A committee appointed by parliament to ſit at Guildhall. The parliament-houſe protected by the city train-bands. The Lord-mayor committed to the Tower. The battle of Edge-hill. The city fortified. Cheapſide croſs pulled down. The women petition to parliament. Conſequences thereon. Battle of Newbury. City clergy petition for redreſs of grievances. The king retires to the Scotch army. The city lends the parliament two hundred thouſand pounds, &c. &c.

NEver perhaps was a prince received with greater magnificence or more ſincere rejoicings from his ſubjects than king Charles I. at his return through the city of London from Scotland; as a teſtimony of which the following is part of the recorder's ſpeech to his majeſty on the occaſion: " I can truly ſay this from a re " preſentative body of your city, from whence I " have my warrant; they meet you with as much " love and affection as ever citizens of London " met with any of your royal progenitors, king or " queen of this kingdom; and with as hearty " a deſire to ſhew it fully, &c." To which his majeſty anſwered, " I thank my citizens of Lon- " don for their love; and now I ſee that all theſe " tumults and diſorders have only riſen from the " meaner ſort of people; and that the affections " of the better and main part of the city have " ever been loyal and affectionate to my perſon " and government. And it comforts me to ſee " that all thoſe miſreports that have been made " of me in my abſence, have not the leaſt power " to do me prejudice in your opinion, as may be " eaſily ſeen in this day's expreſſions of joy." His majeſty then continued with a promiſe to reſtore the citizens to their property in the Iriſh eſtate of Londonderry, and to govern them according to the laws of this kingdom, by maintaining and protecting the true proteſtant religion, as by law eſtabliſhed.

As ſoon as this ſpeech was ended, the proceſſion began. His majeſty and the prince of Wales rode on horſeback; the queen, duke of York, princeſs Mary, the prince elector and the dutcheſs of Richmond remained in the coach. They entered the city at Moorgate, and proceeded along London-wall, through Biſhopſgate-ſtreet, Cornhill, and ſo to Guildhall, where they were moſt ſumptuouſly entertained by the Lord-mayor and aldermen. After this refreſhment the proceſſion was reſumed, and the Lord-mayor conducted his majeſty in the moſt pompous manner to Whitehall; for which, at parting, the king embraced the mayor, thanked him, and charged him, that in his name the whole city might be thanked. His lordſhip gave information of this meſſage from his majeſty to a court of common-council for that purpoſe: at which the recorder having alſo informed them of his ſpeech, in the name of the citizens made to his majeſty, and the king's anſwer thereto, they were ſo pleaſed, that they made an order for the recorder, and a committee of aldermen and commoners to attend his majeſty with their moſt humble thanks for his great and friendly favours to the city. His majeſty received this addreſs with great pleaſure and fair promiſes in favour of the city; created the Lord-mayor a baronet, dubbed all the aldermen attending with the order of knighthood, and cauſed the whole committee, in his name, to be elegantly entertained by the earl of Notwithſtanding theſe reciprocal profeſſions of love between prince and ſubject, yet ſo unſearchable are the ſecrets of the human heart, that on the eleventh of December, Mr. Fookes, attended by two hundred merchants and others, preſented to the houſe of commons a petition ſigned by twenty thouſand citizens, complaining of the growth of popery, and praying the ſaid houſe, that they would take ſpeedy and effectual means to deliver the city and nation from the danger of being ſurprized by their bloody hands, from the obſtructions they cauſed in the trade of this city and kingdom, and for immediate reformation in religion. This petition was inſcribed, "The "humble petition of the aldermen, common-"council-men, ſubſidy-men, and other inhabi-"tants of the city of London and ſuburbs there-"of." Another petition of the like nature was preſented the ſame day by the city apprentices.

On the twenty-third of the ſame month his majeſty having diſcharged Sir William Belfour, a Scotchman, from the lieutenancy of the Tower of London, appointed colonel Lunsford, a perſon obnoxious to the houſe of commons, to ſucceed him. This ſo offended the Londoners, who looked on him as a very bad man, that they drew up a petition in the name of the common-council-men, and others of the city of London to the following effect; "Whereas the petitioners are in-"formed that Sir William Belfour, a perſon of "honour and truſt, is diſplaced from the office "of lieutenant of the Tower of London, and "the ſame place is beſtowed upon colonel Lunſ-"ford, a man outlawed, and moſt notorious for "outrages, and therefore fit for any dangerous "attempt; the petitioners are therefore ſo alarm-"ed at this proceeding, that they cannot reſt till "they have diſcharged their duty in repreſenting "the ſame to this honourable houſe. May it "therefore pleaſe this honourable aſſembly to "take the premiſes into ſuch conſideration as "may ſecure both the city and kingdom againſt "the miſchiefs which may happen, as to your "great wiſdom ſhall be found moſt fitting, &c."

This petition occaſioned the commons to requeſt a conference with the lords; but the latter refuſed joining with them to addreſs his majeſty for the removal of Lunsford; alledging, that they conceived it would be an infringement on his majeſty's prerogative. The Lord-mayor, however, on the Sunday following waited on the king at Whitehall, where he repreſented the diſſatisfaction of the people at the promotion of the ſaid Lunsford, and informed him of a general inſurrection being intended by the citizens in general, ſhould Lunsford be continued in the lieutenancy of the Tower. On which his majeſty was graciouſly pleaſed to remove him from the ſaid office.

Before this was publickly known, the citizens and apprentices who had petitioned againſt Lunsford and the biſhops, aſſembled in a large body, and proceeded to Weſtminſter, crying out, No biſhops, no biſhops, no popiſh lords. This ſo irritated the biſhop of Lincoln, who was then paſſing to Weſtminſter, that he imprudently ſeized one of the moſt active in the mob: but the populace ſo far payed that regard to his cloth and dignity, that after reſcuing their comrade, and dinning his ears with No biſhop, no biſhop, they permitted him to depart. One captain Hyde, with ſome of his friends, being fired with indignation at ſuch treatment of a biſhop, was ſtill more imprudent; for he drew his ſword, and threatened to cut the throats of thoſe round-headed dogs who bawled againſt the biſhops. For which he was ſeized by the apprentices and carried before the houſe of commons, who not only immediately committed him to priſon, but rendered him incapable of ever ſerving his majeſty after.

Colonel Lunsford going to Weſtminſter the ſame day, as imprudently drew his ſword, on which a ſcuffle enſued, and many perſons were wounded. This commotion ſoon reaching the city, the Lord-mayor and ſheriffs took ſuch precautions as prevented any conſiderable number getting out of the city gates. After which his lordſhip patroled the ſtreets all night with a ſufficient guard, and in the morning raiſed the trained bands to keep the city peaceable and quiet. This occaſioned his majeſty to ſend a meſſage to be read in the common-council of the city of London, commanding them to preſerve the peace of the city, and concluding in theſe words: "We do deſire them (the Londoners) not to be "diſturbed by any jealouſies that ill-affected "people may endeavour to ſow, but to reſt moſt "confident and aſſured, that the ſafety, protec-"tion, and proſperity of the city ſhall ever be "with us a principal care."

The connection between the Londoners and parliament was ſo ſtrong, that they reſented every affront or oppoſition made by the court to the houſe of commons. Nor had they yet thrown off their affection for the king, till his majeſty being moſt imprudently and wickedly adviſed to go with an armed force and take five members out of the houſe of commons, whom, with lord Kimbolton, the attorney-general, by his majeſty's command, had impeached in the houſe of lords of high treaſon, the citizens not only gave thoſe members refuge in the city, but armed themſelves for their protection. By this proceeding, the houſe of commons, not thinking themſelves ſafe at Weſtminſter, appointed a committee to ſit in the Guildhall of London, to deliberate on ſuch things as might be moſt beneficial to the ſafety of the city and kingdom.

His majeſty having miſcarried in his deſign of ſecuring the five members impeached, came into the city on the fifth of January to demand the aſſiſtance of the citizens to find them out. On his way thither, the people cried out, in a tumultuous manner, "Privileges of parliament!" And one of them threw into his majeſty's coach a paper, on which was written, "To your tents, "O Iſrael!" for which he was immediately apprehended and committed to priſon. His majeſty being arrived at Guildhall, where the court of common-council, by his order, was aſſembled, he ſpoke to them as follows:

"Gentlemen,

" Gentlemen,

" I come to demand ſuch perſons as I have " already accuſed of high treaſon, and do be- " lieve are ſhrowded in the city. I hope no good " man will keep them from me; their offences " are treaſon and miſdemeanours of an high na- " ture. I deſire your loving aſſiſtance herein, " that they may be brought to a legal trial.

" And whereas there are divers ſuſpicions " raiſed that I am a favourer of the popiſh reli- " gion, I do profeſs, in the name of a king, " that I did and ever will, and that to the utmoſt " of my power, be a proſecutor of all ſuch as " ſhall any ways oppoſe the laws and ſtatutes " of this kingdom, either papiſts or ſeparatiſts; " and not only ſo, but I will maintain and defend " that true proteſtant religion which my father " did profeſs, and I will continue in it during " life."

After this his majeſty dined with one of the ſheriffs, and returned to Whitehall without any farther diſturbance from the populace.

The citizens, however, neither approving of the demand nor declaration, drew up an anſwer by way of remonſtrance from the mayor, aldermen, and common council of the city of London. In which, after repreſenting their fears and danger, by reaſon of the prevailing progreſs of the rebels in Ireland, fermented and acted by the papiſts and their adherents; the throwing out people of truſt and honour from the lieutenancy of the Tower, and the preparations there lately made; the fortifying of Whitehall, in an unuſual manner, with men and ammunition; and the drawing ſwords and wounding many cititizens that were unarmed in Weſtminſter-hall, they conclude as follows: " The petitioners therefore " moſt humbly pray your moſt ſacred majeſty, " that, by the advice of your great council in " parliament, the proteſtants in Ireland may be " ſpeedily relieved; the Tower put into the " hands of perſons of truſt; that, by removal " of doubtful and unknown perſons from about " Whitehall and Weſtminſter, a known and ap- " proved guard may be appointed, for the " ſafety of his majeſty and parliament; and that " the lord Mandeville, otherwiſe Kimbolton, " and the five members of the houſe of com- " mons, lately accuſed, may not be reſtrained " of liberty, or proceeded againſt otherwiſe than " according to privileges of parliament."

His majeſty returned an anſwer to this remonſtrance, the purport of which gave little ſatisfacfaction to the citizens.

The grand committee appointed by the houſe of commons to ſit in Guildhall, finding great inconveniences from the city buſineſs, adjourned to Grocer's-hall, where they conſulted meaſures for their ſafe return to Weſtminſter on the Tueſday following. On which day they, with the lord Kimbolton, and the five members of the houſe of commons above mentioned, went by water, well guarded by a thouſand ſailors in boats, and were received at Weſtminſter by the London trained bands. After which the houſe of commons ordered, that, for their ſecurity, two companies of the ſaid trained bands ſhould attend the houſe daily. And for the more effectually ſecuring the ſtores in the Tower of London, the ſheriffs were ordered to place a ſufficient guard round it both by land and water.

The ſervice of the militia was ſo well approved of by the houſe of commons, that they took them out of the power of the Lord-mayor, whom they found to be under influence of the court, and ordained, " that the perſons entruſted with the or- " dering of the militia of London, ſhould have " power to draw the trained-bands of the city into " ſuch uſual and convenient places, within three " miles of the ſaid city, as to them from time to " time ſhould ſeem meet, for the training and " exerciſing of the ſoldiers; and that the ſaid ſol- " diers, upon ſummons, ſhould from time to time " appear, and not depart from their colours with- " out the conſent of their officers, as they would " anſwer their contempt to the parliament."

In the year 1642 his majeſty, being informed that the parliament had applied to the city for large ſupplies of men and money, ſent a letter to the Lord-mayor, commanding him and the citizens of London not to lend or contribute the ſaid ſupplies to the parliament, under the penalty of his diſpleaſure, and the forfeiture of their charters. The parliament, in conſequence of this made a declaration, juſtifying their demands, and promiſing protection and ſecurity to thoſe who ſhould contribute to their aſſiſtance. And, as an example of their power and authority, they committed Sir Richard Gurney, Lord-mayor, to the Tower of London, for cauſing his majeſty's commiſſion of array to be proclaimed in divers parts of the city; and preferred ſeveral articles of impeachment againſt him: for which he was, by the ſentence of the peers, not only diveſted of the office of mayor, but likewiſe rendered for ever incapable of bearing any office or receiving further honour; and alſo to remain a priſoner in the Tower of London during their lordſhip's pleaſure.

The king finding himſelf in a condition to face his enemies, began his march from Northampton to London with fifteen thouſand men. Of which the parliament receiving information, immediately ordered the London trained bands to be in readineſs, and all the paſſages and avenues leading to the city to be fortified with poſts, chains, and courts of guard. The citizens on this occaſion were ſo alarmed, that a great number of all ranks, ages, and ſexes, applied ſo diligently to work in digging and carrying of earth, that their fortifications were ſoon accompliſhed.

The earl of Eſſex, by an expreſs order from the parliament, haſtening his march after the king, both armies met at Edge-hill on the twenty-third of October, and fought a moſt terrible battle in which much blood was ſpilt on both ſides; and each army claimed the honour of victory. His majeſty, however, was ſo far diſabled from proceeding to London, that he was obliged to retreat to Oxford.

The parliament fearing the bad conſequences that might ariſe from any inſinuations of advantage gained over their forces by the royaliſts, deputed lord Wharton, Mr. Strode, the earl of Pembroke, the earl of Holland, and the lord Say to repreſent repreſent the iſſue of this battle in the moſt favourable circumſtances, and to ſpirit up the citizens to a more vigorous oppoſition to the king's forces. Theſe lords of parliament went to Guildhall on the the 27th of October for this purpoſe; and lord Wharton, who introduced the matter, among other things, ſaid, to the Lord-mayor, aldermen, common-council, &c. "Gentlemen, I "ſhall tell you the worſt as well as the beſt, that "you may know all, and that, when you have "known the worſt, you may find it in your judg-"ments, to give the moſt praiſe to God for his "mercy, after there was ſo much probability of "having ſuch an ill ſucceſs. After that we had "ſhot two or three pieces of ordnance, they be-"gan for to ſhoot ſome of theirs, and truly not "long after, before there was any near execution, "there were three or four of our regiments fairly "run away, I ſhall name you the particulars, and "afterwards name you thoſe that did the extra-"ordinary ſervice, whereof you will find thoſe "of this city to have been very extraordinary in-"ſtruments. There were, that ran away, Sir "William Fairfax's regiment, Sir Henry Cholm-"leys, and my lord Mandevil's, and, to ſay the "plain truth, my own: theſe ran away. Gen-"tlemen, you ſee by this time I am like to tell "you the truth, I hope, of every thing; but "yet I muſt ſay this, that, tho' they did ſo, "yet I hope there will be very convenient "and very good number of them got together "again, that they may ſhew themſelves in bet-"ter condition and better way of ſervice than "yet they have done. I hope ſo, and by the "bleſſing of God it may be ſo." However, continues that noble lord, "Upon the cloſe of the "day we know it for certain that the beſt regi-"ment of the king's was cut off, and the next "his beſt regiment, which was that under my lord "of Linſey; and there was, as we conceive (this "I tell you upon information, as we conceive, "and are informed by the countrymen that ſaw "them bury the dead next day, and bring them "up into heaps, there was, as is informed and "conceived) about three thouſand of theirs ſlain; "and we cannot believe, nor we cannot have any "information to give us reaſon to believe, that "there were above three hundred of ours ſlain. "And this was to be obſerved of God's provi-"dence in this day's work, that though it began "ſo improbably, yet before the cloſe of the night, "which was two hours, (for they began to fight "indeed but about four o'clock) we had got the "ground that they were upon, we had gotton the "wind, and we do not know, nor by information "conceive, that there were twenty men of ours "killed by all the king's cannon."

Mr. Strode then ſpoke: "As God did this great "work, and we aſcribe to him the honour, ſo "you will look upon the perſons by whom he "did it. You have heard when as it was a thou-"ſand to one but that we had loſt the day by run-"ning away of the troop of horſe and the four "regiments, and then the general did draw up "his own regiment, and then did God begin in "them to ſhew his own work. God hath ſhewed "himſelf with us; be you but courageous, and "we never need doubt it; and ſo we ſay all."

The earl of Pembroke producing an intercepted letter to the earl of Cumberland, general of his majeſty's forces, whereby it appeared, that his majeſty was preparing to march to London, addreſſed the Lord-mayor, &c. Gentlemen, you "have ſhewed yourſelves like brave and noble "citizens; you have done it with that nobleneſs, "with that alacrity, with that love to God, "king, and parliament, that none of your an-"ceſtors before you never ſhewed more love, nor "care, nor zeal, nor performed, that you have "done, better. I have only this to ſay to "you: if the times are ſuch (not that I think "there is any great peril in the king's army "now, for they have told you nothing but truth) "yet, when you have ſeen this letter, you will "find there is very good cauſe for you to crown "this work, which muſt be by following it with "the ſame zeal, love, care, and nobleneſs, and "alacrity, which if you do, you may well "crown yourſelves with the name of a glorious "city; and none more."

The earl of Holland, improving the danger threatened in that letter, adds, "If you will "now conſider how God hath ſhewed you firſt, "that he kept the firſt blow from you, by deliver-"ing of you indeed from ſuch an imminent dan-"ger, as it could not be believed it could have "been recovered, but by himſelf, and by the "power of his hand; this may give you juſt "encouragement to purſue all things that are "for his glory, and for the defence of your re-"ligion and his cauſe. I am confident, as you "will do it with thankfulneſs, and duty, and "ſincerity to him, ſo in wiſdom and reaſon you "will (ſeeing what threatnings there are unto "you) defend yourſelves and families; nature "directs you to it, as well as piety: we only re-"commend this to you, that you may but know "it, and take it into your thoughts, and into "your hearts, and then we are confident your "hearts will be raiſed with ſo much piety, with "ſo much courage, and with ſo much reſolution, "as you will defend yourſelves, and in defend-"ing yourſelves, defend us, the parliament, and "the kingdom. You may do it, you have "power, and we expect it from your affections."

The lord Say and Seal then enforced the premiſes in theſe words: "My lords and gentlemen, "That little that I have to ſay ſhall not be to ſet "forth your approaching danger; but I ſhall "rather apply myſelf to ſtir up your ſpirits, to "encourage you, and to ſettle this opinion in "you, that, if you be not wanting unto your-"ſelves, which cannot be imagined in this cauſe, "you will have no cauſe to fear danger: it can-"not be doubted, by that which you have heard, "but that theſe malignant miſchievous counſel-"lors, and theſe men of deſperate fortunes that "they have gathered to them, and into whoſe "hands they have put our king, that their in-"tentions are, that this rich glorious city ſhould "be delivered up as a prey, as a reward to them "for their treaſon againſt the kingdom and the "parliament, and that your lives ſhould ſatisfy "their malice, your wives, your daughters, their "luſt, and religion itſelf, the deareſt thing of "all others to us, ſhould be made merchandize "of,

" of, to invite papiſts, to invite foreigners. Not-" withſtanding their intentions, let no man's heart
" be diſcouraged; you have power enough in " your hands to bring all this wickedneſs upon " their own heads, through God's bleſſing; if " you will uſe your hands, if you will hold them
" up to ſerve your God, to defend the true re" ligion of Almighty God, to defend your lives,
" to defend this kingdom and the parliament,
" you need not fear any thing that can be done
" by this broken army, nor fear thoſe things that

The parliament now endeavoured, to the utmoſt of their power, not only to recruit, but likewiſe to encreaſe their army; for the better effecting of which they gave great encouragement to the city apprentices, who enliſted by an ordinance of parliament which delivered them from the authority of their maſters, who were commanded to receive them on their return and diſbanding from the military ſervice, with a clauſe to indemnify the ſaid maſters from any damages they might ſuſtain by their apprentices being abſent.

The common-council, on the twenty-third of February, paſſed an act for the better defence of the city, by fortifying the ſame with outworks at certain places. It was likewiſe enacted by the ſaid common-council, that all the paſſages and ways leading to the city ſhould be ſhut up, except thoſe entering at Charing-croſs, St. Giles's in the Fields, St. John's-ſtreet, Shoreditch and Whitechapel, and that the exterior ends of the ſaid ſtreets ſhould be fortified with breaſt works and turnpikes, muſket-proof; that the ſeveral courts of guards, and rails at the extreme parts of the liberty of the city, be fortified with turnpikes, muſket proof; that all the ſheds and buildings contiguous to London-wall-without be taken down; and that the city wall, with its bulwarks, be not only repaired and mounted with artillery, but likewiſe that divers new works be added to the ſame at places moſt expoſed. For defraying the expence of which the common-council impoſed eight fifteenths on the ſeveral wards of the city, which was confirmed, on the ſeventh of March following, by an ordinance of parliament.

In conſequence of this the work was begun with the greateſt alacrity, and proſecuted with ſuch amazing diſpatch, that an earthen rampart or wall, with baſtions, redoubts, &c. was in a ſhort time erected round the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and Borough of Southwark.

Excluſive of the above expence the parliament paſſed an order for a weekly aſſeſſment throughout the kingdom, and impoſed the weekly ſum of ten thouſand pounds on the city of London and its liberties; notwithſtanding which, ſo great a ſpirit of oppoſition had the citizens to the king, that they did not think themſelves in the leaſt oppreſſed.

In the year 1643, the common-council ordered their repreſentatives to apply to parliament for leave to take down the croſs in Cheapſide, and deſtroy all the ſuperſtitious figures thereon.

His majeſty finding the Londoners were more ſtrongly attached to the parliament, and that his obtaining their friendſhip was impracticable, iſſued a proclamation, forbidding all commerce with London. On which the common-council, the day following the date of the ſaid proclamation, made an act for raiſing the ſum of fifty thouſand pounds by way of loan, on the ſecurity of the city ſeal, to be employed in defence of the city; and at the ſame time paſſed an order to move the parliament for an ordinance, to compel all monied men, within the bills of mortality, to advance money on this occaſion, in proportion to their reſpective abilities.

A rumour prevailing at this time among the citizens, that the parliament were diſpoſed to accommodate matters with the king, the lord-mayor ſummoned a common-council, who preſented a petition to the houſe of commons, in the ſtrongeſt terms, againſt a reconciliation. When his lordſhip preſented the above petition, he was attended by ſuch a prodigious concourſe of citizens, that many of the members withdrew from the houſe through fear; and thoſe who continued and received the petition, requeſted his lordſhip to prevent ſuch riotous proceedings for the future. The petition was approved of, and the propoſitions of peace with the king were rejected.

This was ſoon after followed by another petition, intituled, "The humble petition of many "civilly-diſpoſed women, inhabiting in the cities "of London and Weſtminſter, the ſuburbs, and "parts adjacent." It was carried up on the 9th of Auguſt, by ſome thouſands of the meaner ſort of women, with white ribbons in their hats. The purport of their petition was, "That God's "glory, in the true reformed religion, might be "preſerved, the juſt prerogatives of king and "parliament maintained, the true liberties and "properties of the ſubject, according to the "known laws of the land, reſtored, and all ho-"nourable ways and means for a ſpeedy peace "endeavoured." The commons, after reading their petition, returned them for anſwer, that they were no enemies to peace, and that they hoped, in a ſhort time, to anſwer the ends of their petition. But this not ſatisfying them, they continued about the houſe, and before noon, encreaſed to upwards of five thouſand; among whom were a great number of men dreſſed in their apparel: at their inſtigation they went to the door of the houſe of commons, and loudly exclaimed, "Peace! peace!" After which they cried out, "Give us thoſe traitors that are againſt "peace, that we may tear them to pieces. Give "us that dog Pym." In ſhort, they grew ſo outrageous, that it was found neceſſary to ſend for a party of the trained-bands to repreſs their fury; but they were ſo little intimidated, that they threw brick-batts and ſtones at them, which occaſioned a fire, and many of them being killed and wounded, the reſt ſoon diſperſed.

The common-council enacted, on the 11th of Auguſt, that a further ſum of fifty thouſand pounds be advanced by the city companies; for which, as a ſecurity, they were to have a bond from the Lord-mayor and commonalty.

The city of Glouceſter, being cloſely beſieged by the king, the committee of trained bands ſent ſix regiments, one of horſe, two of trained bands, and three of auxiliaries, to the relief of the ſaid city, which obliged his majeſty to raiſe the ſiege. Theſe forces behaved with ſuch bravery and reſolution at the battle of Newbury, that they preſerved the army of the Earl of Eſſex, and contributed greatly to the ſucceſs of the parliament in their future proceedings; for it diſabled the king from any farther attempts to reduce London to his obedience, and ruined his intereſt among thoſe who waited the iſſue of a battle, before they would declare themſelves, being determined to join that ſide which was ſtrongeſt. This was the longeſt and moſt deſperate battle during the courſe of that unnatural war; for it began about ſix o'clock in the morning, and continued till near eleven at night, with the greateſt obſtinacy on both ſides.

About this time a parliamentary ordinance was publiſhed, that none ſhould elect, or be elected common-councilmen of this city, but ſuch as had taken the covenant lately brought from Scotland. And, on the 2d of October, the common-council, for the better ſecurity of the city by night, appointed one thouſand and ninety-ſeven watchmen, to be provided and paid by the ſeveral wards and precincts of the city and liberties.

Although his majeſty had, by his proclamation, iſſued the 17th of October, prohibited all manner of trade and commerce with the city of London; yet, on the 26th of December following, matters had been ſo contrived to bring about a treaty of reconciliation, that the king wrote a letter for that purpoſe, directed to the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and all other well-affected ſubjects of the city, with an expectation of having it read and approved of, in a common-hall to be called for that purpoſe, by the contrivance of Sir Baſil Brook, and others. The parliament receiving information of this, Sir Baſil, with two others, were ſecured, and the letter ſeized upon them: after which a committee of eight lords, and ſixteen commoners, was appointed to attend the common-hall, where the earl of Northumberland ſpoke ſo effectually againſt an accommodation, that put an end to all hopes of the city being reconciled to the king.

In the year 1644, the city ſent out two regiments of auxiliaries to join the army under the command of Sir William Waller, who having received conſiderable reinforcements from other parts, marched in queſt of the royaliſts; when both armies meeting on Cheriton-down, a ſharp and bloody battle enſued, in which the latter were defeated. In this action, the city forces behaved with the greateſt honour and intrepidity.

On the ſixteenth of May, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council addreſſed the houſe of commons, thanking them for the great care they had already taken of them and the public ſafety, and praying for a preſervation of the ſaid houſe, for the promoting of the public good. To which the houſe of commons returned a full and ſatisfactory anſwer, concluding with a declaration, that they would, in a moſt peculiar manner, be mindful

mindful of the merit of the city, which, upon all occaſions, they ſhould acknowledge, and would endeavour to requite.

The trade of this city, weſtward, by water, being greatly obſtructed by the garriſons of Greenland and Baſing-houſes, the city ſent out two brigades of horſe and foot, under the command of colonel Brown, who attacked, and obliged them to retire. And the marquis of Newcaſtle, in poſſeſſion of the coal-trade in the river Tyne, prohibited the exportation of coals to London: on which the parliament iſſued an ordinance for ſupplying the city with turf and peat, with power to the Lord mayor to nominate and appoint perſons to enter into, and dig any quantity of turf and peat, in and upon any grounds, except orchards, gardens, and walks.

The clergy of London being tired of the ſtate of ſpiritual anarchy, under which they had ſo long laboured, petitioned to parliament for redreſs of their religious grievances: in which they ſaid, "The orthodox miniſtry is neglected, the "people ſeduced, congregations torn aſunder, "families diſtracted, rights and duties of rela- "tions, national, civil, and ſpiritual, ſcandalouſly "violated, the power of godlineſs decayed, fear- "ful confuſion introduced, and imminent de- "ſtruction threatened." This produced an ordinance of parliament for the ordination of miniſters, according to a form by them preſcribed, with puniſhment for thoſe who ſhould preſume to preach, or exerciſe the miniſterial function, not being ordained according to that form.

In the year 1646, a rumour being ſpread of the king's intending to come privately to London, the parliament gave orders to ſecure the city againſt all attempts that might be projected by ſuch cavaliers; and the more ſtrongly to intimidate his majeſty from making any farther attempt, they paſſed an order, that all papiſts, officers, and ſuch as had borne arms againſt the parliament, and ſoldiers of fortune, ſhould depart the city of London, Weſtminſter, and lines of communication, before the end of the ſixth day of April, on the penalty of being proceeded againſt as a ſpy.

The Londoners, however, found themſelves miſtaken in their apprehenſions, for his majeſty, inſtead of coming to London, proceeded northward, and threw himſelf into the power of the Scotch army, lying before Newcaſtle, with a reſolution to ſubmit to any conditions that might be propoſed through the mediation of the Scots, and fit for a king of England to ſubmit to. Theſe intentions his majeſty communicated to the city of London by a letter to the Lord-mayor and aldermen, dated the nineteenth of May.

To ſuch a height were the independent faction grown at this time, both in the city and the houſe of commons, that it occaſioned the preſbyterians, who had the greateſt ſway in London, to preſent a remonſtrance to both houſes of parliament, againſt ſeparate congregations and ſectaries, and other grievances: among theſe, mentioned the old complaint againſt protections; for, ſaid they, "It may now become a tenure for life, if this "privilege ſhould be ſo made uſe of by ſuch "members of parliament as owe great ſums of "money, and protect divers under them, as ſer- "vants, attendants, officers; yea, and their ſer- "vants. If all this ſhould be exempted from "courſe of law, how many citizens of London, "and other ſubjects of this kingdom, may be "undone!" The lords returned them thanks for this teſtimony of their duty and affection; but the independent members of the commons ſhewed a deteſtation of this freedom taken by the preſbyterian faction in the city, to preſcribe laws to the parliament. And the only anſwer they received was, that the houſe, at a proper time, would take the ſaid remonſtrance into conſideration. In the mean time deſigns were ſet on foot to raiſe diviſions among the citizens; to which end, the independents were prevailed on to preſent a counter petition, ſigned by many thouſands of citizens, ſetting forth the power of parliaments, and the labours and ſucceſſes of the preſent parliament, and praying them to proceed in managing the affairs of the kingdom, according to their own beſt wiſdoms, and truſt repoſed in them; to puniſh delinquents, and to procure peace; and that they would never, on any pretence whatever, ſuffer the free-born people of England to be enſlaved, or any other to ſhare with the parliament, or to preſcribe to them, in the government or power of this nation; adding, that the petitioners will ſtand by the parliament with their lives and fortunes.

In order to ſatisfy the demands of the Scotch army, the city, ſoon after this, advanced two hundred thouſand pounds to the parliament, at eight per cent. on the ſecurity of the exciſe and biſhops lands. And on the ſixth of April following, they were prevailed on to lend the parliament the ſame ſum for the ſervice of England and Ireland.

All things tending to a rupture between the parliament and the army, the Lord-mayor and common council, on the eighth of June 1647, preſented a petition to the houſe to prevent ſuch a dangerous event. Among other things in this petition, they expreſſed their earneſt deſire, "That "according to their allegiance, the covenant and "agreement of both nations, his majeſty's royal "perſon might be preſerved, and ſo diſpoſed of, "that the parliaments of both kingdoms might "have free acceſs unto him; that thereby a right "underſtanding might be obtained between "them, and this tottering church and kingdom, "after all their fears, ſorrows, and ſufferings, "might be better enabled to ſend ſpeedy relief "and help to miſerable bleeding Ireland." But concluding, "As this city, from the beginning "of theſe troubles, had faithfully adhered to the "parliament, ſo they were reſolved by the bleſſ- "ing of God, never to deſert the ſame; but "with the utmoſt of their lives and eſtates, would "ſtand and fall, live and die with the parliament "of England, according to their covenant." An ordinance was brought in acccording to the prayer of the ſaid petition; and the ſpeaker, by command of the houſe, declared to them the true ſenſe the commons had of their conſtant care and ſincere affection for the parliament, who are well well assured, that no vicissitude whatever could alienate their duty and love; for which he gave them the hearty thanks of the house.

The Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, received a letter from the army, encamped at Royston, in Hertfordshire, dated January tenth, 1647, and signed by Thomas Fairfax, Oliver Cromwell, &c. in which, after complaining of false suggestions and misrepresentations, they say, "The thing we insist upon as "Englishmen, is a settlement of the peace of "the kingdom, and of the liberties of the subject, according to the votes and declarations "of parliament."

In consequence of this, both houses immediately dispatched letters to the general, desiring that the army might not advance within twenty-five miles of the city: but the next day intelligence arrived of the army's nearer approach, and that the horse would certainly be at London the day following by noon. On which strong guards were immediately placed round the cities of London, Westminster, Borough of Southwark, and places adjacent.

In the mean time the city, with the approbation of parliament, returned an answer to the above letter, by the hands of four aldermen and eight commoners, who were empowered to treat with the general about a right understanding and fair correspondence between the city and army. In which they requested the army not to come within thirty miles of the metropolis, to prevent the increase of the price of victuals, and discontented people raising tumults. That they detested the very thoughts of engaging the kingdom in a new war; but nevertheless that they had put themselves into a posture of defence against all events; and that they had already recommended their case to the parliament.

The citizens of London now became mediators between the parliament and the army. And the former, which had just before been adored by most men, were now become at one time the dupes of the army, at another those of the city. This is evident from the instability of their proceedings at this juncture; for the army compelled them to reverse the ordinance of the fourth of May, concerning the city militia, and to make a declaration against subscribing an engagement proposed by the citizens for the defence of their religion, property and liberty.

Soon after the young men of London presented a petition to the house of commons against their proceedings on the fourth of May; and keeping open the doors of the house, with their hats on, they cried out, "Vote, vote; agree, "agree; dispatch, we'll wait no longer;" Whilst those without incessantly exclaimed to have such members delivered to them as voted against their interest. In this manner they continued till the house was compelled to repeal both the ordinance and declaration.

General Fairfax, however, pretending to defend the parliament from the insults of those citizens, wrote a letter to the Lord-mayor, dated Bedford, July 29, 1747, in which he says, "It "was a prodigious and horrid force done upon "parliament, and tending to dissolve all government; and demanded the chief actors therein "to be delivered up to justice." These threats were backed with his march towards London. On advice of which the Lord-mayor ordered the city militia to march to the works of fortification; and immediately issued a proclamation, commanding all persons capable of bearing arms to repair to the place of rendezvous early the next morning.

After the departure of those parliament-men, who were intimidated by the young petitioners, the remaining members, who were entirely in the interest of the city, voted

1. That the king should come to London.

2. That the committee of the city militia should have full power to raise such forces as they should deem requisite for the defence of the city; and

3. That they make choice of a commander in chief, to be approved of by parliament; and such commander to present other officers for the approbation of the said committe.

In consequence of these votes the committee chose a general, and ordered that all reformado officers, and others, should appear the next day in St. James's fields, in order for their being taken into the city's service, and the persons already enrolled to be forthwith formed into regiments. They likewise published a declaration by sound of trumpet, that the ordinance which put the land forces under the command of Sir Thomas Fairfax, did not give him any power over the trained bands, garrisons, &c. And on the last day of July the parliament dispatched their commands to the general of their army, forbidding their march towards London. And the next day the power of the city militia was enforced by an ordinance passed for that purpose.

Notwithstanding all precautions were taken, and the greatest encouragement given to the citizens, to oppose the army, yet the nearer they approached London, the more inclined were the citizens to receive them. After various debates the aldermen and common-council sent a submissive message to the general, encamped at Colebrook, who treated them with great haughtiness, and insisted that those members who had been driven away by the young men of London should be immediately restored to their seats in parliament.

The city was greatly agitated by this determination of the army; which occasioned the common-council and commission of the city militia to assemble at Guildhall, whither a great number of citizens repaired to wait the result of their deliberations. In the mean time an express arrived of the army's halting; and the citizens, imagining this arose from a dread of their power, cried out, "let us one and all march out and destroy "them; but soon after, another express arriving, with an account of the army's being in full march to the city, their courage failed, and they instantly changed their tone to "treat, treat, treat." And the common-council being informed that the inhabitants of Southwark had invited general Fairfax, and delivered up the Borough to a party sent by him for that purpose, withdrew the militia, and delivered their fortifications to the different parties sent from the army for that purpose. And so

ſo great was their timidity on this occaſion, that the Lord-mayor and aldermen, in the name of the citizens, met the general next day at Hyde-park, with congratulations on his arrival, and the accommodation between the army and city. He was ſaluted in the ſame manner by the common-council, who waited for him at Charing croſs, and ſoon after the city preſented him with a golden baſon and ewer worth twelve hundred pounds. Notwithſtanding this, he took all meaſures to humble the city of London, and to make the citizens, as well as the parliament, ſubſervient to his dictates.

The parliament at this time wanting money for the ſervice of the army, demanded a loan of fifty thouſand pounds from the city, which being rejected, they, at the deſire of the army, demoliſhed the rampart, baſtions, and other works of fortification, which incircled the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and Borough of Southwark.

The city of London not complying with the requeſt of the parliament, in advancing the above ſum, a committee was appointed to enquire into the late outrageous attempt made on both houſes of parliament, by the London apprentices; when the Lord-mayor, and four aldermen being impeached of abetting the ſaid tumult, were committed to the Tower.

The firſt petition made by the army, after this revolution, was adjudged by the commons to be deſtructive of the being of parliaments, and fundamental laws of the kingdom: on which many of the petitioners were committed to Newgate, and the Gatehouſe in Weſtminſter. This ſo irritated the Londoners, that the week following they attended the houſe with another petition, in much ſtronger terms, reflecting on the proceedings and partiality of the commons; abruptly demanding the reaſons for the committment of theſe laſt mentioned petitioners; what their freedoms were, and the immediate enlargement of thoſe committed for the laſt week's petition. This was backed by another petition from the common-council, to the ſame purport, and demanding a redreſs of grievances.

Such are the viciſſitudes of fortune, and ſuch was the ſituation of the parliament at this time, that the very people who had before ſupported them, at the hazard of their lives and fortunes, now ſcorned, reproached, and deſpiſed them.

The houſe of commons being informed of a conſpiracy in the city for raiſing an army, an ordinance was paſſed by both houſes, for obliging all papiſts, officers, ſoldiers, and others, who had carried arms againſt the parliament, or aſſiſted the enemy in the late war, to depart the city, and all places within twenty miles thereof, in the ſpace of ſix days, on pain of being apprehended, and proceeded againſt as traitors. And the more effectually to prevent the carrying on any ſuch deſign for the future, they paſſed another ordinance for regulating the choice of common-council-men, by which all perſons diſaffected to, or who had appeared in oppoſition to the meaſures and proceedings of parliament, were diſqualified both to be choſen, and to vote, in any city election.

In the year 1647, on Sunday the tenth of April, a great mob aſſembled in Moorfields to divert themſelves at play; but being obſtructed by a party of trained-bands poſted at Finſbury to ſuppreſs the prophanation of the Lord's-day, they fell upon them in the moſt furious manner, ſeized all their colours and drums, and compelled them to diſperſe. After this, the mob encreaſing very faſt, divided themſelves into ſeveral diviſions; one of which went to Whitechapel, and ſeized the colours of a captain's company; another marched to Smithfield; and the greateſt body hurried to Whitehall; after which, being diſperſed by the parliament's troops at the Meuſe, they returned like furies into the city, where, being joined by other parties, they drove all before them: they broke open houſes, priſons, and magazines, carried off arms, plate, money, and other things of value; ſeized the drums belonging to the trained-bands, which they uſed in beating up for others to join them; and after forming themſelves into military order, took poſſeſſion of the gates and chains of the city; attacked the Lord-mayor's houſe, and, with the loſs of one man, forced the guard, and carried off a piece of ordnance, by the uſe of which, they ſoon got poſſeſſion of the magazine of arms lodged in Leadenhall. However, early next morning, they were attacked by two regiments detached by general Fairfax, who received the fire of the cannon, by which many ſoldiers were wounded, and one woman killed. The rioters now finding themſelves not able to make any farther reſiſtance, took to their heels, and diſperſed themſelves into all parts of the city. The ſoldiers purſued them, and after killing ſome, wounding and taking others, the gates were opened, and the whole city became as quiet as before.

The day after this dangerous tumult was ſuppreſſed, the common-council met, and reſolved that the committee of the London militia ſhould attend both houſes of parliament, and, in the name of the city, acquaint them with their utmoſt deteſtation and abhorrence of the late villainous outrage; and humbly to requeſt, that a day of thankſgiving might be appointed for the city's great and wonderful deliverance from ſuch imminent danger; and likewiſe to apply for a ſpecial commiſſion of oyer and terminer, for trying the aggreſſors concerned in the late deteſtable ſedition.

Two days after, the parliament granted their requeſt, and at the ſame time ordered, that the poſts and chains in and about the city ſhould be taken down; and that, for the better ſecurity of the city in future, the garriſon of the Tower ſhould conſiſt of one thouſand foot, and one hundred horſe.

Soon after this the common-council being informed of a dangerous conſpiracy intended by ſome officers of the army againſt the city, they drew up, and preſented a petition to both houſes of parliament, ſetting forth the ſaid information and reports, and expreſſing their uneaſineſs at the late meaſures taken to draw and continue the army ſo near the city, and to increaſe the number of ſoldiers in the Tower; at the removing the poſts and chains, and at the diſuniting of the command of the forces of the city and the parts within the late lines of communication, and the weekly bills of mortality; and praying for redreſs in the ſaid grievances.

The houſe of commons ſoon after acquainted the Lord-mayor and common-council, that they had received intelligence of a dangerous conſpiracy entered into by the cavaliers, who under an oath of ſecrecy had enliſted many thouſands of horſe and foot with intent to deſtroy the city, parliament, preſbyterians and independants: and ordered, that the committee of the London militia ſhould immediately put the ſeveral regiments of trained bands into a good ſtate of defence; and that the city be required to enter into a ſtricter union with the parliament, for their mutual ſecurity, and more effectually defeating the miſchievous deſigns of their enemies. To which the Lord-mayor and common-council anſwered, "that as theirs, and the intereſt of both houſes, "were inſeparable, they would, according to "their proteſtation, live and die with them."

The parliament were ſo highly pleaſed at the conduct of the citizens, that they granted the diſcharge of Mr. Glyn, the recorder, and ſeven others, from priſon. And a few days after the Lord-mayor and common council receiving a letter from the Kentiſh male-contents, deſiring aſſiſtance and an aſſociation with them, communicated the ſame to parliament, which was ſo well received, that they not only returned them thanks, but immediately ordered the diſcharge of three of their aldermen from their long impriſonment in the Tower.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

The citizens petition for a treaty with the king. The army quartered in London and Weſtminſter. They plunder Weavers-hall. The king's trial proclaimed. The common-council petition to try the king. Execution of Charles I. The Lord mayor committed to the Tower for refuſing to proclaim the aboliſhment of the kingly office. Houſe of Commons entertained by the city. Richmond Park given to the city by the parliament. Sixty houſes blown up by gun-powder. Cromwell's new government, protectorſhip, and reception by the city. Death of Oliver, and proclamation of his ſon Richard. A free parliament demanded by the apprentices. Reſtoration of Charles II. His entrance into London; and Coronation. The Iriſh eſtates in the province of Ulſter reſtored. The king grants a charter of confirmation. The citizens advance two hundred thouſand pounds for the Dutch war. Great plague. Fire of London. Deſcription of the monument.

THE citizens being apprehenſive, at this time of general confuſion, that their trade and conſtitution muſt, ſooner or later, be overthrown and ruined, petitioned the parliament, that a perſonal treaty might be had between the king, and both houſes, in London, or ſome other place, convenient and moſt conſiſtent with his majeſty's honour, and the ſafety of the parliament. And they deſired that their brethren of Scotland might be invited; ſo that, according to their allegiance and the covenant, his majeſty's royal perſon, honour and eſtate, might be preſerved, the power and privilege of parliament maintained, the juſt rights and liberties of the ſubject reſtored, religion and church-government in purity eſtabliſhed, all differences compoſed, a firm and laſting peace concluded, the union of the two kingdoms according to the covenant conſtituted, all armies diſbanded, and the ſoldiers arrears juſtly paid.

This petition was received by the parliament with thanks; but their remiſſneſs to proceed to a treaty of accommodation with his majeſty being daily more and more apparent, the citizens preſented the following petition:

"That the militia of London, and parts ad"jacent, might be ſettled in one committee:
"and that if any perſon ſhould be added by "both houſes to the ſaid committee, from the "out-ports, ſuch perſon or perſons to enjoy no

"And that the city, if requiſite, may have power
"to raiſe horſe, for the ſecurity of his majeſty's
"perſon, parliament, and city."

Soon after this, a third petition, to the ſame purport, was preſented to both houſes of parliament, praying that the king's majeſty might be free from reſtraint, and invited to a treaty: that all hoſtilities by ſea and land might, by command of the king and parliament, ceaſe: and in order to defray the expence which might attend the treaty with his majeſty, then under reſtraint at Newport, in the Iſle of Wight, the citizens advanced the ſum of ſix thouſand pounds.

All theſe meaſures taken by the citizens to bring about a reconciliation between the parliament and city, and to reinſtate the king, were ſoon fruſtrated: for, on the fourth of December 1648, the army marched to London, and were quartered in Weſtminſter, and the ſuburbs and villages about the metropolis. This was done in order to extort forty thouſand pounds from the city, to diſarm the citizens, and prevent all kind of reſiſtance to their meaſures, and to prepare matters, matters, not for the ſafety of his majeſty's perſon, and to treat with him about a peace, but to bring him to a ſpeedy and public trial, as had been concerted by the army, in conjunction with many members of the houſe of commons.

The citizens not having anſwered the demand of the army, the general commanded two regiments of foot, and ſeveral troops of horſe, to march into London, and take up their quarters in Black-friars and its neighbourhood; whence, by order, they went and ſecured the treaſuries in Weaver's, Haberdaſher's, and Goldſmith's-hall; from the firſt of which they carried off upwards of twenty thouſand pounds.

The houſe of commons being entirely antimonarchical, reſolved now to puniſh all the citizens that ſubſcribed the petition for a treaty with, and bringing the king to London: for which purpoſe an ordinance was paſſed, that all ſuch citizens ſhould be rendered incapable of being elected mayor, aldermen, or common-councilmen.

On the ninth of January, by order of the houſe of commons, Dendy, ſerjeant at arms, proclaimed the king's trial in Cheapſide, in the city of London, in order to encourage all perſons to bring in their accuſations againſt his majeſty: and general Fairfax iſſued a proclamation, ſtrictly commanding all papiſts, delinquents, and diſaffected perſons, to depart London, and ten miles thereof, in twenty-four hours, and not to return for the ſpace of one month, on pain of being puniſhed as deſerters.

In order to countenance theſe iniquitous proceedings, the common-council moved for a petition to the houſe of commons, to bring the king to juſtice: and though the Lord-mayor and many of the aldermen withdrew before the queſtion was put, yet they carried their point, and the houſe of commons not only received the illegal petition, but ſanctified and confirmed the ſame.

Soon after this every circumſtance of the trial was adjuſted, and the high court of juſtice finally erected. The charge was opened by the ſolicitor-general, who repreſented that Charles Stuart, king of England, was accuſed as a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and a public and implacable enemy to the common-wealth. In anſwer to this his majeſty diſowned the authority of the court, and refuſed to acknowledge their uſurped juriſdiction. The court, however, informed him, that he muſt not deny the authority of his judges: and Charles having, on three ſeveral appearances before the court, refuſed to acknowledge their juriſdiction, on the fourth time ſentence was pronounced againſt him.

On the thirtieth of January, in conſequence of a warrant from the high court of judicature, he was conducted on foot through St. James's Park, to Whitehall, accompanied by doctor Juxon, and guarded by a regiment of foot ſoldiers, commanded by colonel Tomlinſon. When he came on the ſcaffold he directed his diſcourſe to the colonel, doctor Juxon and ſome others about him, declaring himſelf innocent of having commenced the war againſt the parliament, but owned at the ſame time, that his having conſented to the execution of the earl of Strafford had brought the judgment of heaven on himſelf. He died forgiving all his enemies, even the chief inſtruments of his death; but adviſed them, and the whole nation, to reſtore the conſtitution of the kingdom, by paying obedience to their lawful ſovereign, his ſon and ſucceſſor. When he was preparing himſelf for the block, doctor Juxon told him, there was but one ſtage more, which was ſhort, though oubleſome, and would convey him to the regions of ineffable joy. He replied, "I go from a corruptible to "an incorruptible crown, of which I ſhall never "be bereaved." Having thus ſpoke he laid his neck on the block, and at one blow his head was ſevered from his body. After which a man held up the head ſtreaming with blood, and exclaimed, "this is the head of a traitor." Such was the fate of Charles I. king of England.

After the king's execution the houſe of commons paſſed an act for the exheredation of the royal line, the aboliſhment of monarchy, and the erection of a common-wealth: in conſequence of which an order was ſent to the Lord-mayor for proclaiming the ſame perſonally: but his lordſhip refuſing to comply with this command, he was depoſed, impriſoned, and fined. Soon after another was choſen, who, with twelve aldermen, on the thirtieth of May, proclaimed the ordinance for aboliſhing the kingly office in England and Ireland.

The parliament having appointed a day of thankſgiving for ſuppreſſing the levellers, accepted of an invitation from the city to hear the ſermon on that occaſion at Chriſt-church, Newgate ſtreet, and to dine at Grocer's hall, where they were moſt ſumptuouſly entertained by the city: and the ſurplus of the proviſions, together with the ſum of four hundred pounds, were given to the poor. The next day, the commons ſent a committee to return thanks to the Lord-mayor and common-council. And the city, as a proof of their ſincere affection, preſented the general of the army with a large baſon and ewer of maſſy gold; and lieutenant-general Cromwell with plate, to the amount of three hundred pounds, and a purſe containing two hundred pieces of gold.

In conſideration of the many ſervices the parliament received from the city, they made the citizens a preſent of Richmond-park in Surry; beſides which, they alſo gave them many houſes, and a thouſand pounds for the uſe of the poor: the citizens, in return, promiſed to ſtand by them on all emergencies, with their lives and fortunes.

In the year 1649, on the fourth of January, about ſixty houſes were blown up by a blaſt of twenty-ſeven barrels of gun-powder, which accidentally took fire at a ſhip-chandler's, in the neighbourhood of Barking-church, Tower-ſtreet. It unfortunately happened, that a pariſh-feaſt was then held at the Roſe-tavern, next door but one to the church, at which the principal part of the pariſhioners were aſſembled; all of whom periſhed, and were mangled in a moſt dreadful manner, except the miſtreſs of the tavern, who was found ſitting upright in the bar, and a drawer ſtanding without it, with a pot in his hand, both being ſuffocated with ſmoke and duſt, and preſerved in theſe poſtures by the caſual falling of timber, timber, without the leaſt ſign either of fracture or contuſion. But the moſt remarkable thing was, a cradle with a child in it, blown upon the upper leads of Barking-church, which the next day was taken down, without either of them receiving the leaſt damage.

In the year 1653, Cromwell having the chief command of the army, diveſted the parliament of all power, by turning them out of doors; and though the aldermen and citizens petitioned for their being reinſtated, yet Oliver paid no regard to their intreaties. On the contrary, he conſtituted a certain number of perſons, who were his creatures, to take upon them the government of the kingdom, by the name and ſtile of the Supreme Authority, with power to aſſume the name of Parliament. The Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, immediately acknowledging this new form of government, and his creatures reſigning their ſham power into his hands, he was, by the officers of the army, choſe "Oliver Cromwell, Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland;" after which he was inſtalled in Weſtminſter-hall. The Lord-mayor, aldermen, and recorder attended the inſtallation in their ſcarlet gowns: and the inſtrument of the protector's government, which he ſwore to preſerve inviolable, contained the following heads: 1. To call a parliament every three years. 2. No parliament to be diſſolved before it had ſat five months. 3. Bills offered to and not ſigned by the protector within twenty days, to be laws without him. 4. The protector's council not to exceed twenty one, nor be leſs than thirteen. 5. Future protectors eligible by the council immediately upon the demiſe of any one. 6. No protector, except the preſent, to be general of the army. 7. The power of war and peace in the protector. 8. A power for the protector and his council to make ſome laws during the intervals of parliament. Soon after this, he was entertained at Guildhall, with all thoſe formalities which are uſual at the reception and entertainment of a crowned head. And ſo great was his vanity, that, at his departure, he conferred the honour of knighthood on the Lord-mayor. On the ſixteenth of May following, he returned the favour of the entertainment, by a ſplendid dinner which he gave the Lord-mayor and aldermen.

In the year 1654, Cromwell, in order to render himſelf and his government popular, pretending to diſcover a conſpiracy againſt his life, ſeemed to place great confidence in the citizens, whom he granted the power of the militia, and to raiſe forces under the command of their favourite leader, major general Skipton; remitted them ſome impoſitions and taxes, and permitted the citizens to revive the artillery company, on promiſe, that only thoſe who were well affected to his highneſs ſhould be admitted into that company.

The following year an ordinance was paſſed by the protector, to limit the number of hackney-coaches to two hundred, and to place them under the care and government of the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen.

In the year 1656, the protector revived the ſeveral proclamations and orders prohibiting the increaſe of new buildings. To effect which, he paſſed an ordinance, that all perſons who had erected houſes in contempt of former prohibitions, ſince the twenty-fifth of March 1620, ſhould, for every ſuch houſe, not having four acres of land thereunto belonging, pay to the protector one year's rent; and for every houſe, erected after the twenty-ninth of September 1656, without land, as aforeſaid, to forfeit one hundred pounds for his uſe.

In the year 1658, Cromwell was removed from his uſurped dominion by the interpoſition of death. In conſequence of which, the privy-council, attended by the Lord-mayor, proclaimed his ſon Richard protector, to ſucceed him in the government of theſe kingdoms. And the Lord-mayor and aldermen, attended by a great number of the principal citizens, aſſiſted at the celebration of the funeral obſequies of Cromwell.

The citizens continued to join with the ſame zeal in the meaſures taken under Richard's protectorſhip for the continuance of the uſurpation; till, worn out by the continual changes and apprehenſions under the new adminiſtration, and diſpirited by the puſillanimity of their councils, which began to render England deſpicable abroad, and jealous that the time of the royal family's reſtoration was not very diſtant, (it being ſuſpected by the very houſes in being that general Monk, who was now at the head of the common-wealth's army, was concerting a plan to bring in king Charles II.) the citizens very wiſely declined all invitations to join either the parliament or the army, when it appeared that a rupture between them was unavoidable. Although the magiſtrates acted with ſo much caution to keep as clear as poſſible of the fatal conſequences of a new war, yet the apprentices, who were ſpirited up to ſhew a diſlike to the preſent government, aſſembled in great numbers, and demanded a free parliament. This commotion was ſoon ſuppreſſed by colonel Hewſon, who marched into the city, and killed many of the apprentices; the loſs of whom ſo inflamed the citizens againſt the army, that the common council from that time, fell off from their attachment to a government which placed all their hopes in the power and ſpirit of an army; and reſolved, "that they conceived the "city of London to be in imminent and extra-"ordinary danger; that they judged it abſolutely "neceſſary to put the city forthwith into a poſ-"ture of defence; that the mayor, aldermen, "and common-council ſhould forthwith ſettle ſix "regiments of trained bands, with officers and "commanders of their own appointment, and "their commiſſions ſealed in open court with "the common ſeal of the city; and that com-"miſſioners ſhould be appointed to confer with "the officers of the fleet, in order to the ſafety "of the city, and the peace and ſettlement of "the nation; to give an anſwer to general Monk; "and to propound the convention of a free "parliament."

This conduct of the citizens was ſupported by a revolt of part of the army and fleet, who declared clared for a free parliament, in oppoſition to the government by a committee of ſafety. And the citizens, on the eighth of January, preſented a remonſtrance to the common council, touching freedom and liberty, in which they thankfully acknowledged the above reſolutions to be juſt and prudent; and humbly remonſtrated, that no power or perſons whatever might impoſe any law or tax upon any of thoſe citizens, with whoſe general concernment that court was entruſted, till the authority thereof be derived from their repreſentatives in parliament.

This remonſtrance produced great debates; and it was put to the vote, whether they ſhould proſecute thoſe lawful means that might lead to the attainment of a free parliament: but the Lord-mayor diſſenting, the ſenſe of the court was tranſmitted to the council of ſtate. The powers in being immediately ordered general Monk to march with his army into the city, and to reduce it to the obedience of the parliament. Accordingly ſeveral regiments, both of horſe and foot, were poſted round the metropolis, at the city gates, and in the ſtreets; and two aldermen and eight common-council-men were ſeized and committed to cuſtody, for exerting themſelves in the cauſe of liberty.

Soon after this, by an ordinance of parliament, general Monk pulled down the poſts and chains, broke and cut to pieces the city gates, and took took down and deſtroyed the portculliſſes at Cripplegate, Biſhopſgate, and Aldgate; but ſuch was the extraordinary ſtrength of the works at Alderſgate and Newgate, that they could only diſmount the gates from their hinges, and rent part of the portculliſſes.

In the year 1659, general Monk finding the parliament had come to reſolutions, which, by joining others with him in the command of the army, threatened his deſtruction, conſulted with his officers; and being aſſured of their friendſhip and aſſiſtance, reſolved, if poſſible, to counteract their reſolutions, to maintain his ſupreme command, and to recover his loſt favour with the citizens. For theſe purpoſes he next morning drew up his army in Finſbury fields, from whence he diſpatched a meſſenger to the Lord-mayor, with the declaration of his ſorrow for what he had done to the prejudice of the city, and earneſtly deſired a conference with his lordſhip and the common-council, hoping therein to make reparation for his paſt miſconduct.

In compliance with this requeſt, a common-council was immediately ſummoned to receive his propoſals: at which the general teſtified his great concern for having accepted a command, which in the execution had given ſo much uneaſineſs to the citizens; urging, that he was under a neceſſity of accepting thereof, or throwing up his commiſſion, which he judged neceſſary to keep for the good of the city and kingdom, whoſe happineſs and proſperity no man had more at heart than himſelf. After this he produced a coppy of a letter ſent by him to the parliament at his leaving Whitehall, in which he upbraided them with their unjuſt and unreaſonable proceedings, adviſing them (by way of command) within a certain time, to iſſue out writs for a new parliament, as the only expedient to reſtore peace and happineſs to the kingdom, which both the army and nation expected from them.

There appeared ſo great ſincerity in this open manifeſtation of the general's ſentiments, that the citizens reſolved to join him, and they mutually agreed, at all events, to ſtand by each other. This happy coalition was no ſooner publiſhed than a univerſal joy ſpread all over the city; and the day concluded with ringing of bells, illuminations, and bonfires. The moſt contemptible marks of ridicule were ſhewn to the parliament; and there was no invention of fancy, wit, or ribaldry, that was not exerciſed that night, either to extol the general or degrade the parliament.

General Monk having thus regained the city's favour, returned to his quarters at Whitehall, and diſpoſed of his army as he thought moſt proper and convenient. Soon after, having reſtored the excluded members to their ſeats in the houſe of commons, an ordinance paſſed to reſtore the common-council to their ancient rights, the impriſoned apprentices releaſed, and the poſts, chains, gates, and portculliſſes of the city to be replaced. In return for this, the city chearfully advanced the parliament the ſum of ſixty thouſand pounds; and farther, to evince their good opinion for Monk, they choſe him major-general of all their forces. By whoſe advice, the citizens diſarmed all perſons ſuſpected to favour the Rump, and kept a ſtrong guard for the peace and quiet of the city, till the meeting of a free parliament, which was now reſolved upon, as well as to call home the king, and to reſtore the monarchy, the royal family, and the church. The citizens contributed all in their power for accompliſhing this great work; and declared, that they were firmly reſolved to adhere to their general, the council of ſtate, and the enſuing parliament.

All things being now ripe for the reſtoration, king Charles II. among many others, ſent a letter, dated at Breda, April fourteen, 1660, to the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of the city of London; in which his majeſty expreſſed extraordinary ſatisfaction with their conduct, and good intention to aſſiſt in the work of his reſtoration, and his peculiar regard for the city, which, ſays he, "we will manifeſt on all "occaſions, not only by renewing their charter, "and confirming all thoſe privileges which they "have received from our predeceſſors, but by "adding and granting any new favours which "may advance the trade, wealth, and honour of "that our native city."

The receipt of this letter produced ſuch an effect upon the citizens, that they preſented the meſſengers with three hundred pounds, and deputed fourteen of the common-council to proceed immediately to Holland, with a preſent of ten thouſand pounds to his majeſty, and to aſſure him of their fidelity and moſt chearful ſubmiſſion, and that they placed all their felicity and future hope of proſperity in the aſſurance of his royal grace and protection; for the meriting of which, their lives and fortunes ſhould be always at his majeſty's diſpoſal.

The common-council, four days after, made an order, that Richmond-park, lately conferred on the city by Cromwell, ſhould be preſented to his majeſty at his return, with aſſurances, that they had kept it with no other view than to preſerve it for the royal intereſt.

The day following his majeſty was proclaimed king at the uſual places in London, with the greateſt ſolemnity, in the preſence of the Lord-mayor, aldermen, recorder, and ſheriffs, amidſt the univerſal and joyful acclamations of the citizens.

In the mean time, the city deputies, being arrived at the Hague, were introduced to his majeſty, who, in return to their meſſage, told them, that he had ever a particular affection for the city of London, the place of his birth; and that he was exceedingly pleaſed to find them ſo anxious for his reſtoration, which he acknowledged, not only by returning them thanks, but likewiſe conferring on them the honour of knighthood.

On the twenty-ſixth of May, 1660, his majeſty arrived at Dover; and on the twenty ninth, made his public entry into London. He was met at St. George's-fields, in Southwark, by the Lord-mayor and aldermen; the former of which, delivering the city ſword to his majeſty, had the ſame returned with the honour of knighthood. From this place his majeſty, after taking ſome refreſhment under a magnificent tent erected for that purpoſe, proceeded through the ſtreets of London, which were lined with the city companies in their liveries, and the trained bands. On this occaſion, the houſes were adorned with the richeſt ſilks and tapeſtries; and the windows and balconies were crouded with a great concourſe of ſpectators. The manner of the cavalcade was thus: Firſt, a troop of gentlemen in cloth of ſilver, brandiſhing their ſwords, and led by major-general Brown. Another troop of two hundred, in velvet coats, attended by footmen in purple liveries. Alderman Robinſon's troop in buff coats, with cloth of ſilver ſleeves, and very rich green ſcarves. Another troop of two hundred men, in blue uniform, trimmed with ſilver, and attended by ſix trumpets and footmen in ſea-green, trimmed with ſilver lace. A troop of two hundred and twenty, with thirty footmen, in grey and ſilver liveries, and four trumpeters, richly cloathed. Another troop of one hundred and five, in grey uniform, with ſix trumpets. Another of ſeventy, with five trumpets. Three troops, two of three hundred, and one of one hundred men, all glorioufly habited and gallantly mounted. Two trumpets with the king's-arms, Eighty ſheriff's men in red cloaks, richly laced with ſilver, and half pikes in their hands. Six hundred liverymen on horſeback, in black velvet coats and gold chains, divided according to their companies; each company having footmen in their proper liveries, and carrying ſtreamers, &c. Kettle drums and trumpets, with ſtreamers. Twelve miniſters at the head of his majeſty's life-guards of horſe, commanded by Lord Gerard. City marſhal, and eight footmen in divers colours, attended by the city waits and officers, in due order. The two ſheriffs. The aldermen in their ſcarlet gowns on horſeback, with rich trappings, and footmen in red liveries, trimmed with ſilver, and cloth of gold. Heralds and maces in rich coats. Lord-mayor carrying the ſword bare, and ſupported by the general and duke of Buckingham. The king himſelf on horſeback, between his brothers the dukes of York and Glouceſter. A troop of horſe with white colours. The general life-guard. A troop of gentry. Five regiments of the army, horſe, with back, breaſt, and head pieces.

On the fifth of July following, the citizens entertained the king and royal family, the great officers of ſtate, and both houſes of parliament, at Guildhall, where they were ſumptuouſly regaled with thoſe dainties, adapted for the entertainment of ſuch illuſtrious gueſts.

On the twenty-third of April, being the day appointed for the coronation, his majeſty, according to ancient cuſtom, rode from the Tower of London, through the city to Weſtminſter; and the cavalcade was performed with more magnificence and ſplendor than had ever been ſeen before on the like occaſion.

In the year 1662, the hackney-coaches having created an extraordinary charge on the inhabitants of London and Weſtminſter, by deſtroying the pavements, the parliament enacted, that all hackney-coaches, in and about the cities of London and Weſtminſter, ſhould annually pay towards the charge of paving and cleanſing the ways and ſtreets in and about the ſaid cities, the ſum of five pounds each, and every load of hay ſixpence, and ſtraw twopence. The ſame act likewiſe provided for enlarging the paſſages at Stock's-market, from Fleet-conduit to St. Paul's church, the paſſage and gateway out of Cheapſide into St. Paul's church yard, the paſſage at St. Dunſtan's church, in Fleet ſtreet, from Cheapſide into Bucklerſbury, the paſſage at Temple-bar, and ſeveral others in the out parts; and to pave Petty-France to St. James's houſe, St. James's-ſtreet, Pall-mall, and Hedge-lane.

The citizens of London having been violently deprived of the Iriſh eſtates in the province of Ulſter by an arbitrary decree in the ſtar-chamber during the reign of Charles I. his majeſty, on the tenth of April, granted the ſaid lands again to the city of London, and incorporated the ſociety for the plantation in Ulſter a-new; and by a charter of licence empowered them to re-grant the manors and lands to the reſpective companies. Accordingly the ſociety conveyed to each of the twelve companies the manor and lands which formerly belonged to it; and the companies have quietly enjoyed their eſtates ever ſince, under the direction of a governor and deputy governor, choſen annually, and twenty-four aſſiſtants, viz. two out of each of the twelve companies; of whom twelve go off every year, and twelve new ones are choſen in their ſtead by the common-council.

Theſe meet by the appointment or ſummons of the governor or deputy governor, as often as neceſſary, in a place called the Iriſh chamber, in Guildhall, to tranſact their affairs; and nine, whereof the governor or deputy governor to be one, make a court. This ſociety have a ſecretary and a meſſenger of their own appointment: they alſo chuſe a general agent in Ireland to correſpond with

They have a right of preſentation to the churches of Londonderry and Colerain: and all by-laws made by the corporation of Londonderry muſt be confirmed by the Society before they can be of any effect.

In the year 1663 his majeſty, in return for the late tokens of loyalty diſcovered in the citizens towards his perſon and government, by their effectual aid to reſtore him to the crown and dominion over theſe realms, granted them a confirmation of all their charters, privileges, liberties, rights and cuſtoms: in which, after having recited the particular charters granted to them by his predeceſſors, he proceeds as follows:

In the year 1665, about the beginning of May, there broke out in London the moſt dreadful plague that ever infeſted this kingdom, which ſwept away ſixty-eight thouſand, five hundred and ninety-ſix perſons, which, added to the number of thoſe who died of other diſtempers, raiſed the bill of mortality in this year to ninety-ſeven thouſand three hundred and ſix. " or otherwiſe travelled or employed their agents " to meet the ſhips and veſſels coming from New- " caſtle and other parts toward this city, loaden " with coals; and at diſtant places from the ſaid " city, or by precontract within the ſame city " and liberties, have bought up, foreſtalled and " ingroſſed great quantities of coals, (which " ſhould have been brought to the ſaid city by " the owners and ſellers thereof, to be there ſold " and uttered at reaſonable prices) and the ſame " have been conveyed and brought to the ſaid " city, to ſell again at high and exceſſive prices, " againſt the cuſtom and privileges of this city, " and to the public detriment, oppreſſion of the " poor, and great charge of all others inhabiting " and dwelling within the ſaid city and liberties " thereof:

" For reformation whereof, be it enacted, or- " dained and eſtabliſhed by the authority afore- " ſaid, That no perſon or perſons whatſoever, " inhabiting or dwelling, or that hereafter ſhall " inhabit and dwell within the ſaid city or liber- " ties thereof, ſhall, from and after the feaſt of " the nativity of St. John Baptiſt, now next en- " ſuing, either by themſelves, or any for them, " or to their uſe, provide, buy, bargain, or con- " tract for any ſea-coals, Scotch-coals, pit-coals, " or other coals, coming towards this city to be " ſold, other than ſuch as ſhall be provided and " bought to be ſpent within their own private " houſes; nor ſhall ſell or utter the ſame by re- " tail or in groſs within this city or liberties to " any perſon or perſons; but that the owners " and ſellers thereof, at their own coſts and " charges, ſhall and may bring the ſame coals to " the city themſelves, here by them to be ſold; " upon pain that all and every perſon or perſons " whatſoever, that ſhall offend contrary to the " true intent and meaning hereof, ſhall forfeit and " loſe five ſhillings for every chaldron of ſea- " coals, and the like ſum for every ton of Scotch " or pit-coals, that ſhall be bought, bargained " or contracted for."

In the year 1666, on the 2d day of Septem- ber, about one o'clock in the morning, a moſt dreadful fire broke out in Pudding-lane, near new Fiſh-ſtreet; from whence, in about thirty hours, it ſpread to Gracechurch-ſtreet, towards the north-weſt, and to the Three Cranes in the Vintry, towards the ſouth-weſt, including Canon- ſtreet, and the lanes, allies, and courts in the way. The flames being aſſiſted by a violent eaſt- erly wind, communicated themſelves in various and diſtant places, and the conflagration became ſo general, that there was not a houſe, hall, or church left ſtanding, from the weſt-end of Tower- wharf in the eaſt, to the Temple-church in the weſt; nor from the north-end of Mincing-lane, in Fenchurch-ſtreet, from the weſt-end of Leaden- hall-ſtreet, and from the ſouth-weſt end of Bi- ſhopſgate-ſtreet, as far as the entrance into Thread- needle-ſtreet, to Holborn-bridge, on the weſt, in a direct line; excluſive of the damage done in Throgmorton-ſtreet, Lothbury, Coleman-ſtreet, Baſinghall-ſtreet, Cateaton-ſtreet, Aldermanbury, Addle ſtreet, Love-lane, Wood-ſtreet, Staining- lane, Noble-ſtreet, and Silver-ſtreet: after all which ravagements, it ſtopped at Pye-corner, near Weſt-ſmithfield.

By this horrid conflagration, many thouſand citizens were compelled to retire to the fields, deſtitute of all neceſſaries, and expoſed to the inclemency of the weather, till a ſufficient number of huts could be erected for their relief: his majeſty immediately ordered a great quantity of naval bread to be diſtributed amongſt them, and gave command to the magiſtrates of the city to en- courage the bringing of all ſorts of proviſions.

This dreadful and deſtructive fire laid waſte and conſumed, the buildings on four hundred and thirty-ſix acres of ground, four hundred ſtreets, lanes, &c. thirteen thouſand two hundred houſes, the cathedral church of St. Paul, eighty- ſix pariſh churches, ſix chapels, the magnificent buildings of Guildhall, the Royal Exchange, Cuſtom-houſe, and Blackwell-hall, many hoſpi- tals and libraries, fifty-two of the companies halls, and a great number of other ſtately edifices; to- gether with three of the city-gates, four ſtone- bridges, and the priſons of Newgate, the Fleet, the Poultry and Wood-ſtreet Compters; the loſs of which, by the beſt calculation, amounted to ten millions ſeven hundred and thirty thouſand and five hundred pounds. And notwithſtanding all this deſtruction, yet only ſix perſons loſt their lives.

Various have been the conjectures reſpecting the cauſe of this dreadful cataſtrophe: but the beſt authority we have is that upon the monu- ment, erected and inſcribed by act of parliament, to perpetuate the memory of the above calamity. And in order to preſerve our intended plan, of inſerting all public buildings in their proper order of time, we ſhall here give

A Deſcription of the MONUMENT

This beautiful piece of architecture, which is ſituated on the eaſt-ſide of Fiſh-ſtreet-hill, was be- gun by Sir Chriſtopher Wren, in the year 1671, and finiſhed by him in 1677. It is a round pillar of the Doric order, all built with the beſt Port- land ſtone, 202 feet in height from the ground, and fifteen in diameter. It ſtands on a pedeſtal forty feet high, and twenty-one ſquare; and over the capital is an iron balcony, encompaſſing a cone thirty-two feet high, which ſupports a blazing urn of gilt braſs. Within is a large ſtair-caſe of black marble, containing three hundred and forty- five ſteps, each ſix inches thick, and ten inches and a half broad.

The front of the pedeſtal, on the weſt-ſide of the plinth, is adorned with a very curious em- blem in alt relief, denoting the deſtruction and reſtoration of the city. The firſt female figure re- preſents the city of London, at her back many houſes in a blaze, and ſhe ſitting on the ruins, in a languiſhing and diſconſolate poſture, with her head dejected, hair diſhevelled, her hand careleſsly lying on her ſword, and the cap of maintenance lying at her ſide. Behind is Time, gradually raiſing her up; at her ſide a woman gently touch- ing her with one hand, whilſt a winged ſcepter in the other directs her to regard the goddeſſes in the clouds; clouds; ſhe with the Cornu-copia denoting Plenty, and that with the palm-branch Peace. At her feet a beehive, ſhewing, that by induſtry and application, the greateſt difficulties are to be ſurmounted. Behind Time are divers citizens, exulting at his endeavours to reſtore her; and beneath, in the midſt of the ruins, is a dragon, who, as ſupporter of the City-arms, with his paw endeavours to preſerve the ſame. Oppoſite the city on an elevated pavement, ſtands Charles II. in a Roman habit, with a laurel on his head, and a truncheon in his hand; and approaching her, commands three of his attendants to deſcend to her relief. The firſt repreſents Science, with a winged head, and circles of naked boys dancing thereon: and in its hand Nature, with her numerous breaſts, ready to give aſſiſtance to all. The ſecond is Architecture, with a plan in one hand, a ſquare and a pair of compaſſes in the other. The third is Liberty waving her hand in the air, ſhewing her joy at the pleaſing proſpect of the city's recovery. Behind the king is his brother, the duke of York, with a garland in one hand, to crown the riſing city, and a ſword in the other for her defence. The two figures behind are Juſtice and Fortitude; the former with a coronet, and the latter with a reined lion. Under the royal pavement lieth Envy, gnawing upon a heart, and emitting peſtiferous fumes from her invenom'd mouth. In the uppermoſt part of the plinth the re-conſtruction of the city is repreſented, by builders and labourers at work upon houſes. The whole emblem is finely imagined, and executed as well.

The north and ſouth ſides of the pedeſtal have each a latin inſcription; one deſcribing the deſolation of the city laid in aſhes, and the other its glorious reſtoration. That on the north ſide in Engliſh runs thus:

"In the year of Chriſt 1666, the ſecond day "of September, eaſtward from hence, at the diſ-"tance of two hundred feet, (the height of this "column) a fire broke out about midnight, which, "being driven on by a ſtrong wind, not only "waſted the adjacent parts, but alſo very remote "places, with incredible noiſe and fury. It "conſumed eighty-nine churches, the city-gates, "Guild-hall, many hoſpitals, ſchools, and li-"braries; a vaſt number of ſtately edifices, "above thirteen thouſand two hundred dwelling-"houſes, and four hundred ſtreets; of the twenty "ſix wards it deſtroyed fifteen, and left eight "others ſhattered, and half burnt. The ruins "of the city were four hundred and thirty-ſix "acres, from this pillar, by the Thames ſide, to "the Temple-church; and, from the north-eaſt "ſide, along the City-wall, to Holbourn-bridge. "To the eſtates and fortunes of the citizens it "was mercileſs, but to their lives very favour-"able; that it might in all things reſemble the "laſt conflagration of the world. The deſtruc-"tion was ſudden; for in a ſmall ſpace of time "the ſame city was ſeen moſt flouriſhing, and re-"duced to nothing; and three days after, when "this fatal fire had baffled all human counſels and "endeavours, it ſtopt, as it were, by the will "of Heaven, and was extinguiſhed on every "ſide."

The ſouth inſcription in Engliſh runs thus:

"Charles the ſecond, ſon of Charles the firſt, "martyr, king of Great-Britain, France, and "Ireland, defender of the faith, a moſt clement "prince, who compaſſionating the loſs by fire, "which happened to the greateſt part of the in-"habitants of this city, (the ruins of which were "yet ſmoaking) and which, before that, was his "greateſt glory, was pleaſed to provide for it; "he remitted the taxes, and recommended them "to the parliament, who thereupon ordered, that "the public buildings ſhould be rebuilt in a bet-"ter ſtructure than they were before, from the "monies ariſing from the duties upon coals; viz. "the churches, and the cathedral of St. Paul's, "were to be rebuilt from the foundation, with "all poſſible ſpeed and magnificence; that they "ſhould rebuild the bridges, gates and priſons; "that the common ſewers ſhould be cleanſed; "that the deſcents ſhould be levelled; that the "narrow ſtreets or lanes, highways, and markets, "ſhould be made wider; that no houſe ſhould "be built without a ſeparation-wall between "each; that they ſhould be all of the ſame height "forwards, and of poliſhed free-ſtone, or bricks. "And, laſtly, that none ſhould be above ſeven "years in rebuilding his houſe; adding alſo an "annual faſt-day, for a perpetual memory there-"of to poſterity. Three years compleated what "was thought would have been the work of an "age."

The eaſt-ſide of the pedeſtal has alſo an inſcription, ſignifying, that "this pillar was begun in "1671, Sir Richard Ford being then Lord-"mayor; carried on in the mayoralty of Sir "George Waterman, Sir Robert Hanſon, Sir "William Hooker, Sir Robert Viner, Sir Joſeph "Sheldon, and finiſhed in 1677, Sir Thomas "Davis being Lord-mayor."

As it appeared at the time, that this dreadful fire was contrived and carried on by the popiſh faction, the ſame is expreſſed in a line, round the pedeſtal, beginning on the weſt ſide, in theſe words:

"This pillar was ſet up in perpetual remem-"brance of the moſt dreadful burning of this "proteſtant city, begun and carried on by the "treachery and malice of the popiſh faction, in "the beginning of September, in the year of our "Lord 1666, in order to execute their horrid "plot, to extirpate the proteſtant religion, and "the old Engliſh liberty, and to introduce po-"pery and ſlavery."

CHAPTER XXXVII.

The king's declaration to the city of London on occaſion of the late fire. Proceedings of parliament thereon. Act of common-council for enlarging the ſtreets. The ſame confirmed and enforced by his majeſty and council. Precept from the Lord-mayor againſt immorality and beggars. Public markets regulated by act of common-council. His majeſty made free of the city of London. Princeſs Mary given in marriage to the prince of Orange. The papiſts attempt to burn London; for which five of them are executed. Solemn proceſſion for burning the effigy of the pope. Remarkable ſtorm of hail. Violent conteſt at election of ſheriffs. An alderman and the two ſheriffs committed to the Tower. A Quo Warranto iſſued out to ſeize the city charter. The city's petition to the king. Conditions impoſed on the city. A violent froſt. Death of Charles II.

THE general conflagration having reduced the city of London to a mere heap of rubbiſh, his majeſty iſſued a proclamation for prohibiting the rebuilding of houſes, till public care might be had to re-edify it with ſuch propriety, uniformity, and ſecurity as might effectually prevent the like deſtruction for the future. For which purpoſe his majeſty made the following declaration to the city of London.

" CHARLES R.

" As no particular man hath ſuſtained any loſs " or damage by the late terrible and deplorable " fire in his fortune or eſtate, in any degree to be " compared with the loſs and damage we ourſelf " have ſuſtained, ſo it is not poſſible for any man " to take the ſame more to heart, and to be more " concerned and ſolicitous for the rebuilding this " famous city, with as much expedition as poſ- " ſible: and ſince it hath pleaſed God to lay this " heavy judgment upon us all in this time, as " an evidence of his diſpleaſure for our ſins, we " do comfort ourſelf with ſome hope, that he will, " upon our due humiliation before him, as a new " inſtance of his ſignal bleſſing upon us, give us " life, not only to ſee the foundations laid, but " the buildings finiſhed, of a much more beau- " tiful city than is at this time conſumed; and " that as the ſeat and ſituation of it is the moſt " convenient and noble, for the advancement of " trade, of any city in Europe; ſo that ſuch care " will be taken for the re-edification of it, both " for uſe and beauty, and ſuch proviſion made " for the future, againſt the ordinary and caſual " accidents by fire, as may, as far as human " wiſdom can provide, upon the ſad experience " we have had, reaſonably ſecure the ſame, and " make it rather appear to the world as purged " with the fire (in how lamentable a manner ſo- " ever) to a wonderful beauty and comelineſs, " than conſumed by it: and we receive no ſmall " encouragement in this our hope, by the alacrity " and chearfulneſs we obſerve in thoſe who have " undergone the greateſt loſs, and ſeem the moſt " undone: who, with undaunted courage, ap- " pear to deſire the ſame we do, and reſolved to " contribute their utmoſt aſſiſtance thereunto. " We have therefore thought fit, moſt neceſſary, " and agreeable to the great and conſtant affec- " tion we have always had, and always ſhall re- " tain for this our native city, to uſe this expe- " dition in publiſhing our thoughts, reſolutions, " and intentions, upon this great affair; that " though ſuch preſent rules and directions cannot " be formed, as muſt upon more mature deli- " beration be eſtabliſhed for the re-edification, " yet ſuch inconveniences may and ſhall be pre- " vented, which may ariſe by the haſty and un- " ſkilful buildings many may propoſe to erect, for " their preſent conveniences, before they can " know how the ſame will ſuit and conſiſt with " the deſign that ſhall be made: and if this can- " dour of ours, which reſolves with the bleſſing " of God, ſo to provide for the juſt right and " intereſt of all, that no man ſhall have cauſe to " complain of wrong and oppreſſion: and if this " our ſeaſonable animadverſion ſhall not meet " with that prudent ſubmiſſion we expect, but " that ſome obſtinate and refractory perſons will " preſume to erect ſuch buildings as they ſhall " think fit, upon pretence that the ground is " their own, and that they may do with it what " they pleaſe, ſuch their obſtinacy ſhall not pre- " vail to the public prejudice; but we do hereby " require the Lord-mayor, and the other magiſ- " ſtrates of the city of London, in their ſeveral " limits, to be very watchful in ſuch caſes, and " ſpeedily to pull down whatſoever ſuch men " ſhall preſume to ſet up, ſo much to the diſ- " turbance of public order and decency, and " that they forthwith give notice to us, or our " privy-council, of ſuch their proceedings, and " return the names of ſuch refractory perſons " who preſume to contemn this our injunction, " and we ſhall give order for their exemplary " puniſhment, without the violation of the pub- " lic juſtice.

" And becauſe no men ſhall complain or ap- " prehend that by this caution or reſtraint of " ours, they ſhall or may, for a long time be " kept from providing habitations for themſelves, " and for the carrying on their trades, though " we make no queſtion, but in a ſhort time, " with the aſſiſtance and advice of the Lord-mayor

" mayor and court of aldermen, (who have be-
" ſought us for ſome time to put this reſtraint)
" to finiſh the whole deſign, even before any men
" can make proviſion of materials for any valu" able edifices: we do declare, that if any conſi-
" derable number of men (for it is impoſſible to " comply with the humour of every particular " man) ſhall addreſs themſelves to the court of " aldermen, and manifeſt to them in what places
" their ground lies, upon which they deſign to " build, they ſhall in a ſhort time receive ſuch
" order and direction, for their proceeding there-
" in, that they ſhall have no cauſe to complain:
" and ſo we proceed to the ſetting down ſuch
" general, to which all particular deſigns muſt
" conform themſelves.

" in the firſt place, the woeful experience in " this late heavy viſitation hath ſufficiently con" vinced all men of the pernicious conſequences
" which have attended the building with timber,
" and even with ſtone itſelf, and the notable be" nefit of brick, which in ſo many places hath " reſiſted, and even extinguiſhed the fire; and
" we do therefore hereby declare our expreſs will
" and pleaſure, that no man whatſoever ſhall
" preſume to erect any houſe or building, great
" or ſmall, but of brick or ſtone; and if any " man ſhall do the contrary, the next magiſtrate
" ſhall forthwith cauſe it to be pulled down, and
" ſuch further courſe ſhall be taken for his pu-
" niſhment as he deſerves: and we ſuppoſe that
" the notable benefit many men have received " from thoſe cellars which have been well and " ſtrongly arched, will perſuade moſt men, who " build good houſes, to practiſe that good huſ-
" bandry, by arching all convenient places.

" We do declare, that Fleet-ſtreet, Cheapſide,
" Cornhill, and all other eminent and notorious " ſtreets, ſhall be of ſuch a breadth, as may, with " God's bleſſing, prevent the miſchief that one
" ſide may ſuffer if the other be on fire, which " was the caſe lately in Cheapſide; the preciſe
" breadth of which ſeveral ſtreets, ſhall be, upon
" advice with the Lord-mayor and aldermen,
" ſhortly publiſhed, with many other particular
" orders and rules, which cannot yet be adjuſted;
" in the mean time we reſolve, though all ſtreets
" cannot be of equal breadth, yet none ſhall be
" ſo narrow as to make the paſſage uneaſy or
" inconvenient, eſpecially towards the water-ſide;
" nor will we ſuffer any lanes or alleys to be " erected, but where, upon mature deliberation,
" the ſame ſhall be found abſolutety neceſſary;
" except ſuch places ſhall be ſet aſide, which
" ſhall be deſigned only for buildings of that " kind, and from whence no public miſchief
" may probably ariſe.

" The irreparable damage and loſs by the late
" fire, being, next to the hand of God in the " terrible wind, to be imputed to the place in " which it firſt broke out, amongſt ſmall timber
" houſes, ſtanding ſo cloſe together, that as no
" remedy could be applied from the river for the " quenching thereof, to the contiguouſneſs of the " buildings, hindering and keeping all poſſible
" relief from the land ſide, we do reſolve and " declare, that there ſhall be a fair key or wharf
" on all the river ſide, that no houſe ſhall be " erected within ſo many feet of the river, as ſhall
" be within few days declared in the rules for" merly mentioned; nor ſhall there be in thoſe
" buildings which ſhall be erected next the river,
" which we deſire may be fair ſtructures, for the " ornament of the city, any houſes to be inha-
" bited by brewers, or dyers, or ſugar-bakers,
" which trades by their continual ſmoak, contri" bute very much to the unhealthineſs of the " adjacent places; but we require the Lord-
" mayor and aldermen of London, upon a full
" conſideration, and weighing all conveniences
" and inconveniences that can be foreſeen, to
" propoſe ſuch a place as may be fit for all thoſe
" trades which are carried on by ſmoak to habit
" together, or at leaſt ſeveral places for the ſe-
" veral quarters of the town for thoſe occupa" tions, and in which they ſhall find their ac" count in convenience and profit, as well as " other places ſhall receive the benefit in the " diſtance of the neighbourhood; it being our " purpoſe, that they who exerciſe thoſe neceſſa-
" ry profeſſions, ſhall be in all reſpects as well
" provided for and encouraged as ever they have " been, and undergo as little prejudice as may " be, by being leſs inconvenient to their neigh" bours.

" Theſe grounds and foundations being laid,
" from the ſubſtance whereof we ſhall not depart,
" and which, being publiſhed, are ſufficient ad-
" vertiſements to prevent any man's running into,
" or bringing an inconvenience upon himſelf,
" by a precipitate engagement in any act which " may croſs theſe foundations, we have, in order
" to the reducing this great and glorious deſign
" into practice, directed, and we do hereby direct,
" that the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen
" do with all poſſible expedition cauſe an exact
" ſurvey to be made and taken of the whole
" ruins, occaſioned by the late lamentable fire,
" to the end that it may appear to whom all the " houſes and ground did in truth belong, what " term the ſeveral occupiers were poſſeſſed of;
" and at what rents, and to whom, either corpo-
" rations, companies, or ſingle perſons, the re-
" verſion and inheritance appertained; that ſo
" proviſion may be made, that though every " man muſt not be ſuffered to erect what build" ings and where he pleaſes, he ſhall not in any " degree be debarred from receiving the reaſon-
" able benefit of what ought to accrue to him
" from ſuch houſes or lands; there be nothing leſs
" in our thoughts, than that any particular per-
" ſon's right and intereſt ſhould be ſacrificed to " the public benefit or convenience, without ſuch
" recompence as in juſtice he ought to receive
" for the ſame. And when all things of this " kind ſhall be prepared and adjuſted, by ſuch
" commiſſioners, and otherwiſe, which ſhall be " found expedient, we make no doubt but ſuch
" an act of parliament will paſs, as ſhall ſecure
" all men in what they ſhall and ought to " poſſeſs.

" By the time that this ſurvey ſhall be taken,
" we ſhall cauſe a plot or model to be made for " the whole building through thoſe ruined places;
" which being well examined by all thoſe perſons
" who have moſt concernment as well as experience,

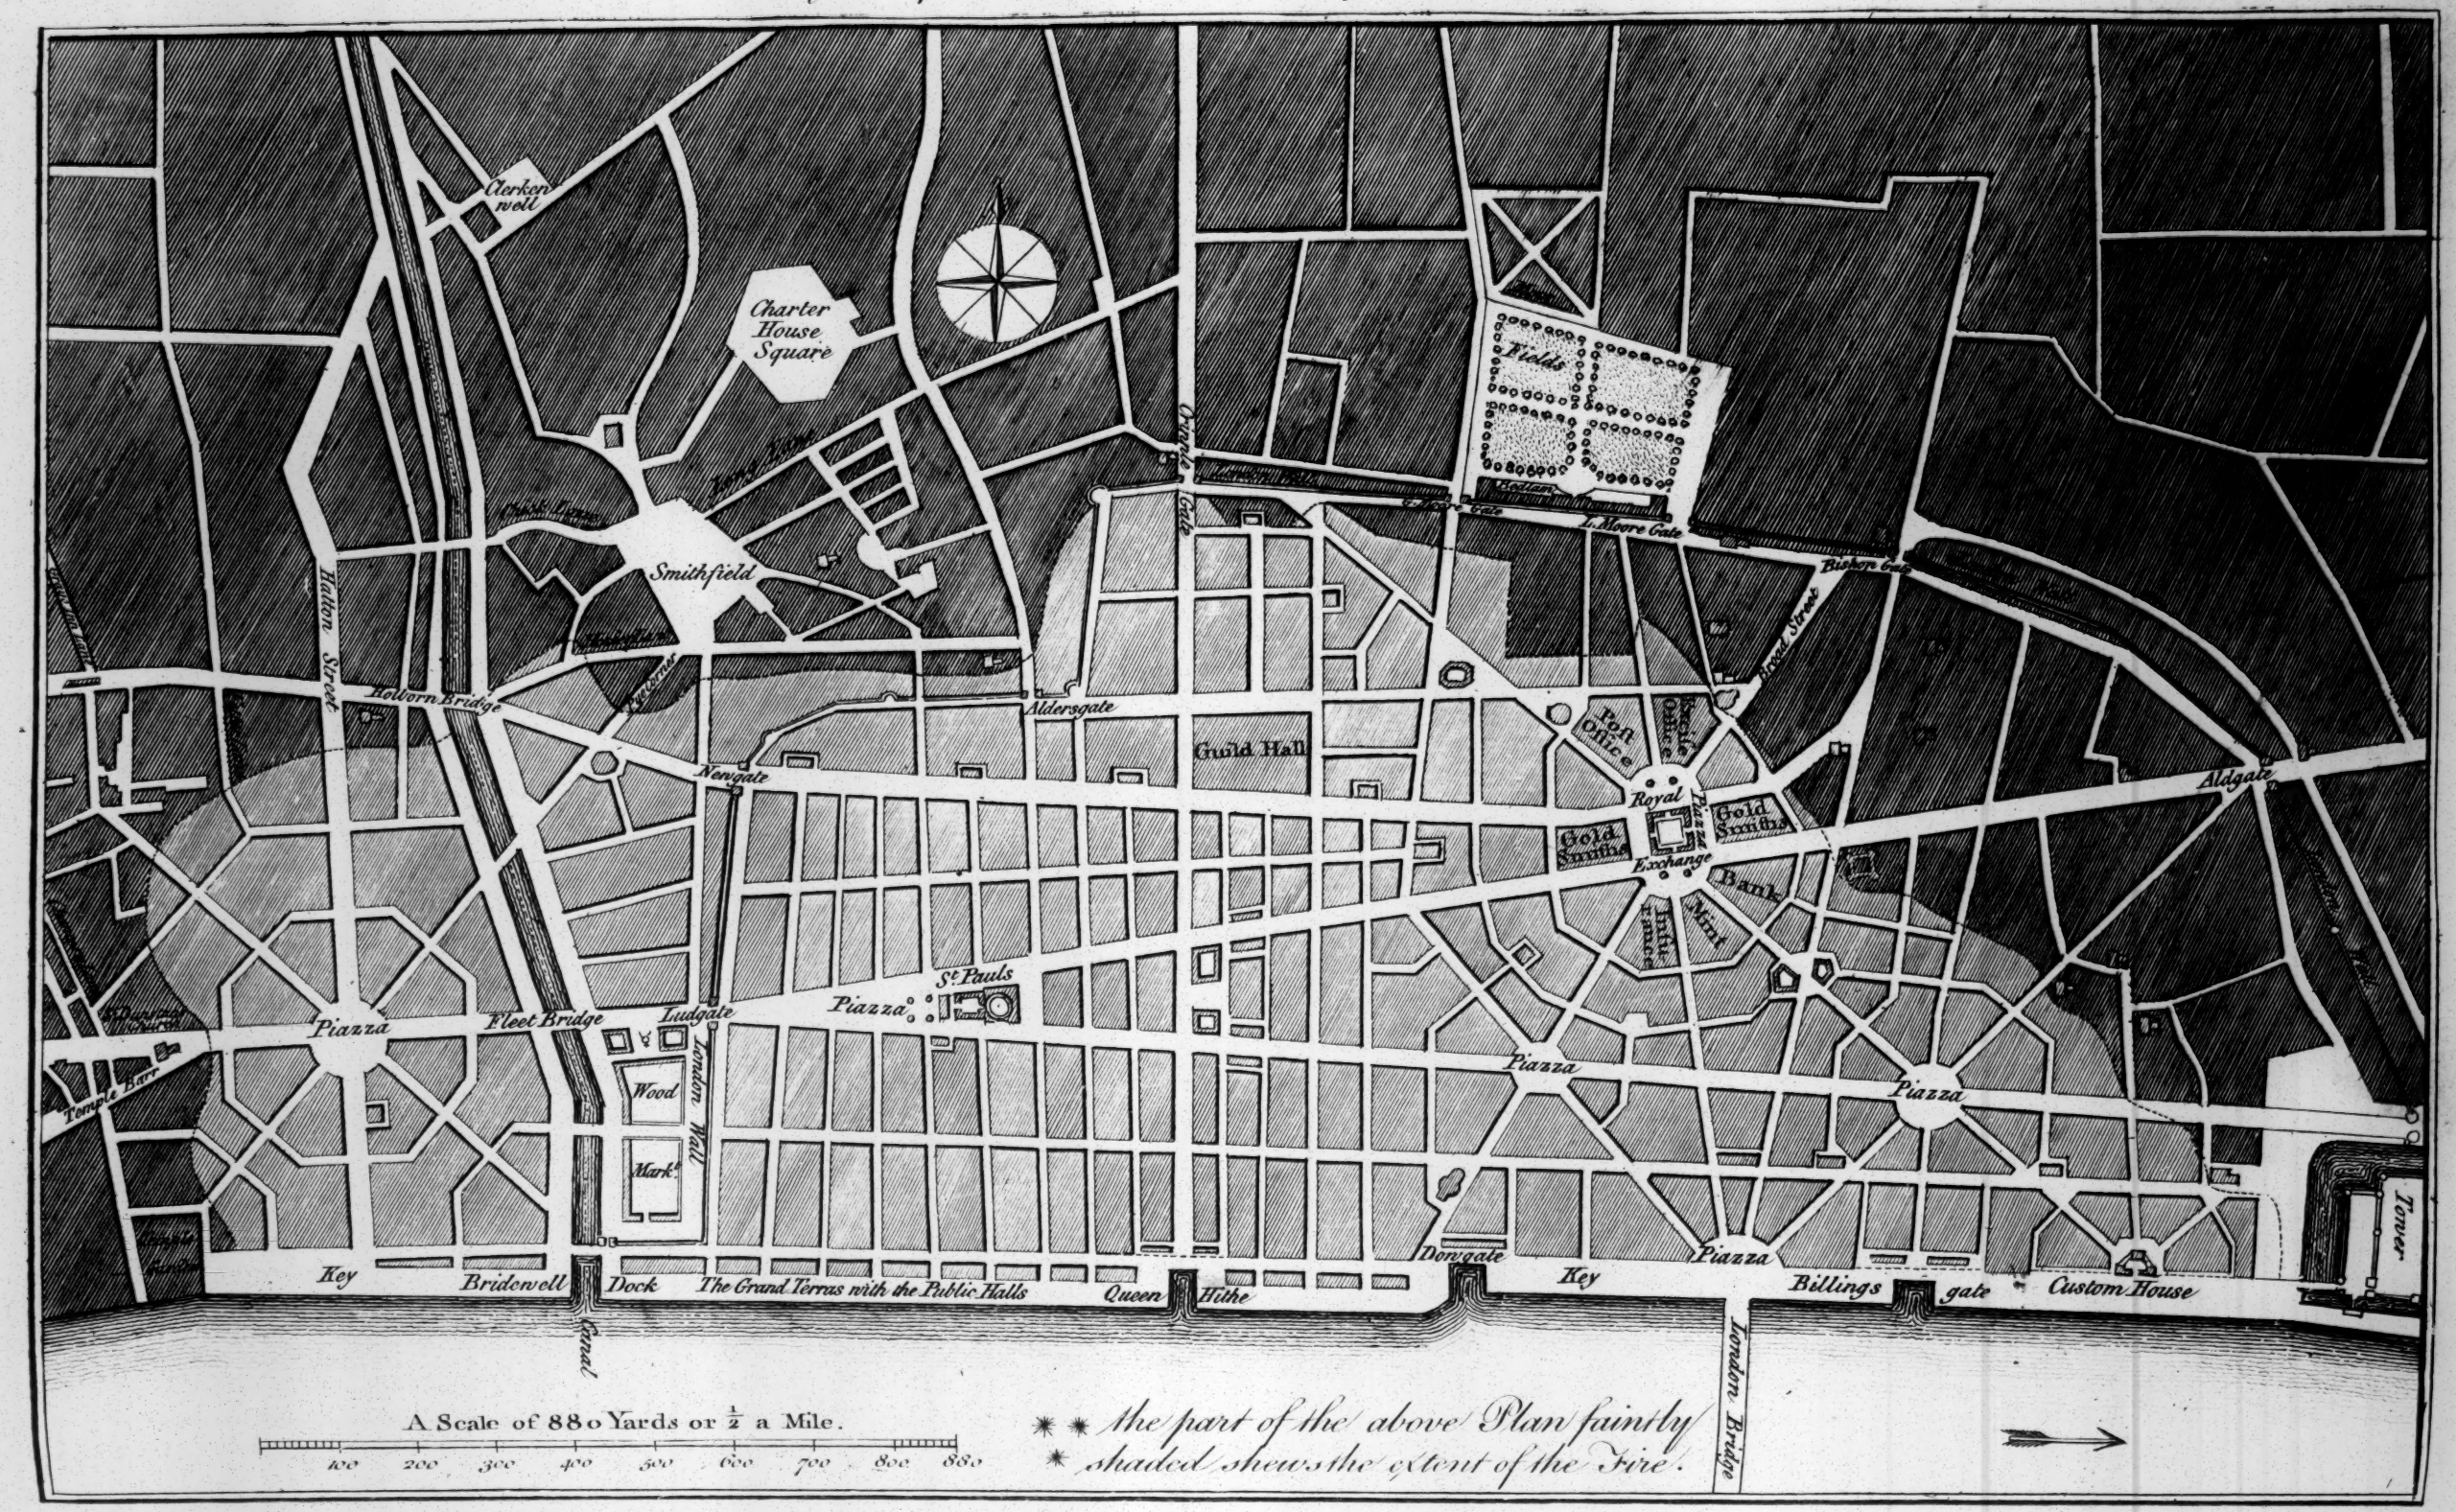
Engraved for Chamberlains History of London.



Sr Christopher Wrens Plan for Rebuilding the City of London after the dreadfull Conflagration in 1666.

" perience, we make no queſtion, but all men " will be well pleaſed with it, and very willingly " conform to thoſe orders and rules which ſhall " be agreed for the purſuing thereof.

" In the mean time we do heartily recom- " mend it to the charity and magnanimity of all " well diſpoſed perſons, and we do heartily pray " unto almighty God, that he will infuſe it into " the hearts of men ſpeedily to endeavour by " degrees to re-edify ſome of thoſe many churches " which in this lamentable fire have been burnt " down and defaced, that ſo men may have " thoſe public places of God's worſhip to reſort " to, to humble themſelves together before him " upon this heavy diſpleaſure, and join in their " devotion for his future mercy and bleſſing up- " on us; and, as ſoon as we ſhall be informed " of any readineſs to begin ſuch a good work, " we ſhall not only give our aſſiſtance and direc- " tion for the model of it, and freeing it from " buildings at too near a diſtance, but ſhall en- " courage it by our own bounty, and all other " ways we ſhall be deſired.

" Given at our court at Whitehall the thir- " teenth day of September, 1666 in the " eighteenth year of our reign."

On the 18th of September, the parliament met, and immediately paſſed an act for erecting a court of judicature, and for ſettling all differences between landlords and tenants with reſpect to houſes which had been deſtroyed by the late fire. At the ſame time, they appointed the juſtices of the courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas, and the barons of the exchequer to be judges of the ſaid court. Theſe judges conducted themſelves with ſuch impartiality and ſtrict juſtice, that they obtained the general eſteem of the citizens, who, as a teſtimony of reſpect, cauſed their portraitures to be hung up in Guildhall.

Soon after an act of parliament paſſed for re-building the city; in which were laid down rules and directions for the regulation of all perſons concerned in re-edifying the city of London.

On the twenty-ninth of April 1667, the common-council, in conſequence of the before-mentioned royal declaration, paſſed an act, in which they allotted what ſtreets ſhould be enlarged and widened within the ſaid city and liberties thereof. Which act was ſo highly approved of by his majeſty, that on the eighth of May following, he confirmed and enforced the ſame by an order of council *.

* The following is the order made by the Lord-Mayor, aldermen, and common-council of the city of London, on the twenty-ninth of April.

" It is ordered that the ſurveyors take ſpecial care, that " the breaſt-ſummers of all the houſes do range of an equal " height, houſe with houſe, ſo far as ſhall be convenient, " and there to make breaks by their directions.

" And that they do encourage and give directions to all " builders, for ornament ſake, that the ornaments and pro- " jections of the front-buildings be of rubbed bricks; and " that all the naked part of the walls may be done of rough " bricks, neatly wrought, or all rubbed, at the diſcretion " of the builder, or that the builders may otherwiſe enrich " their fronts as they pleaſe.

" That if any perſon or perſons ſhall deſire, in any ſtreet " or lane of note, to build on each ſide of the ſtreet or lane, " oppoſite one to the other, ſix or more houſes of the third " rate, or that the upper rooms or garrets may be flat roofs, " encompaſſed with battlements of bricks covered with " ſtone, or gable ends, or rails, and banniſter of iron or " ſtone, or to vary their roofs for the greater ornament of " building; the ſurveyors, or one of them, ſhall certify their " opinions therein to the committee for re-building, who " ſhall have liberty to give leave for the ſame, if they ſee " cauſe.

" That in all the ſtreets no ſign-poſts ſhall hang croſs, but " the ſigns ſhall be fixed againſt the balconies, or ſome other " convenient part of the ſide of the houſe.

" It is ordered that a poſtern ſhall be made on the north- " ſide of Newgate, for conveniency of foot paſſengers, and " that Holborn-bridge ſhall be enlarged to run ſtraight on " a bevil line from the timber houſe on the north-ſide there- " of, known by the ſign of the Cock, to the front of the " buildings at the Swan-inn on the ſaid north-ſide of Hol- " born-hill.

" Foraſmuch as it is provided in the late act for re-build- " ing, that the ſurveyors ſhall take care for the equal ſetting " out of all party-walls and piers, and that no perſon be " permitted to build till that be done; therefore, for pre- " vention of any exaction in the taking of ſuch ſurveys, and " of all quarrels and contentions that may ariſe between the " builders, it is ordered, that no builder ſhall lay his foun- " dation until the ſurveyors, or one of them, according to " the act, ſhall view it, and ſee the party-walls and piers " equally ſet out, and that all perſons obſerve the ſurveyors " directions concerning the ſuperſtructure to be erected over " the ſaid foundation.

" And that for the defraying that and all other incident " charges of meaſuring, ſtaking out, taking the level, and " ſurveying the ſtreets and ground, each builder, before he " lay his foundation, or ſuch ſurvey ſhall be taken, do repair " to the chamber of London, and there enter his name, with " the place where his building is to be ſet out, and to pay to " the chamberlain the ſum of ſix ſhillings and eight-pence " for every foundation to be rebuilt. For which Mr. Cham- " berlain ſhall give acquittances upon receipt of which ac- " quittance the ſurveyors ſhall proceed to ſet out ſuch per- " ſons foundations.

" And it is ordered, that all perſons who have already laid " any foundations, ſhall forthwith pay into the chamber of " London, ſix ſhillings and eight-pence for every founda- " tion.

" And this court is conſenting and deſirous that all ſtraight " and narrow paſſages, which ſhall be found convenient for " common benefit and accommodation, and ſhall receive his " majeſty's order and approbation, ſhall and may be en- " larged and made wider, and otherwiſe altered, before the " 20th of May now next enſuing, as ſhall be fitting for the " beauty ornament, and conveniency thereof, and ſtaked " and ſet out accordingly.

" Several late inhabitants of Fleet-ſtreet, intending to re- " build their houſes, which did formerly ſtand backward of " other foundations near adjoining, and deſiring liberty to " advance their houſes, that the whole front may run on a " a ſtraight line; the committee did agree to the ſame, if " the right honourable the lord high chancellor of England " and the other lords ſhall approve thereof, and procure his " majeſty's approbation to the ſame: and the committee do " deſire liberty may be given for other perſons in other pla- " ces where it ſhall be found convenient.

On the fifteenth of November following, the common-council paſſed another act, for preventing and ſuppreſſing of fires within the city of London and its liberties: in which, among other things, they enacted as follows:

" That the city and liberties thereof ſhall be " divided into four equal parts or quarters. The " eaſt part or quarter to contain the wards " of Portſoken, Aldgate, Tower, Billingſgate, " Bridge, Langborn, and Lime-ſtreet. The weſt " part or quarter to contain Farringdon Within, " Farringdon Without, Caſtle Baynard, Cheap- " ſide, and Alderſgate. The north part or quar- " ter to contain Cornhill, Broad-ſtreet, Coleman- " ſtreet, Baſſiſhaw, Biſhopſgate and Cripplegate. " And the ſouth part to contain Queenhithe, " Bread-ſtreet, Vintry, Cordwainer, Dowgate, " Wallbrook, and Candlewick-ſtreet.

" That each of the ſaid quarters ſhall be pro- " vided with eight hundred leathern buckets, " fifty ladders of different ſizes, from twelve to " forty two feet in length; and to each pariſh " forty ſhod ſhovels, twenty-four pick-ax-ſledges, " and two brazen hand-ſquirts.

" That thirty buckets, one engine, ſix pick- " ax-ſledges, three ladders, and two hand-ſquirts " of braſs, be provided and kept in readineſs by " each of the twelve companies: and that the " inferior companies provide buckets and engines " in proportion to their reſpective abilities; the " number of which are to be allotted and pre- " ſcribed, from time to time, by the direction " of the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen.

" That every alderman, who hath paſſed the " office of ſheriff, provide twenty-four buckets, " and one hand-ſquirt of braſs; and all thoſe " who have not been ſheriffs, twelve buckets, " and one hand-ſquirt of braſs, to be kept at " their reſpective dwellings: and all other prin- " cipal citizens and inhabitants, and every other " perſon, being a ſubſidy-man, or of the degree " of a ſubſidy-man, ſhall provide and keep in " their houſes a certain number of buckets, ac- " cording to their quality.

" That every houſeholder, upon any cry of " fire, ſhall place a ſufficient man at his door, " well armed, and hang out a light at his door, " if in the night; upon default whereof, every " party offending ſhall forfeit twenty ſhillings.

" That every inhabitant procure ſome ſecure " place in their dwellings (not under or near any " ſtair-caſe) to lay in their ſeacoal-aſhes, embers, " or any other ſort of fire-aſhes; and that the " ſaid aſhes be quenched with water every night " before they go to bed: and that all conſtables " make enquiry of the ſecurity of hearths, ovens, " and ſtoves, and places for laying fire-aſhes in, " twice every year.

" That plugs be put into the pipes in the moſt " convenient places of every ſtreet.

" That the ſeveral companies of carpenters, " bricklayers, plaiſterers, painters, maſons, ſmiths, " plumbers, and paviors, do yearly, for each " company, elect two maſter-workmen, four " journeymen, eight apprentices, and ſixteen la- " bourers, to be ready, upon all occaſions of fire, " to attend the Lord-mayor and ſheriffs for " quenching the ſame; and that all workmen " and labourers, belonging to any public water- " works within the city, the ſeacoal meters, por- " ters, Blackwell-hall porters, Leadenhall por- " ters, ticket-porters, and package porters, do " conſtantly attend the Lord-mayor and ſheriffs " for the ſaid purpoſe.

" That all perſons, except ſuch as are employed " or allowed by the Lord-mayor or ſheriffs, al- " dermen, deputies, or common-councilmen, do " keep, during the time of any fire, within their " own houſes, till they are ſummoned to attend, " that the ſtreets may be kept clear from diſor- " der and confuſion.

" That where any fire happens, the conſtables " and watchmen of that ward ſhall immediately " aſſemble at ſuch place, and there attend on, " and follow the directions of the Lord-mayor " and ſheriffs.

" That all brokers on the Exchange, accord- " ing to their obligation at their admittance, do " attend, in order to take care of ſuch goods and " houſhold ſtuff as may be removed.

" That no perſon whatever be permitted, at " any time, to make, or cauſe to be made, any " ſort of fire-works, within the city or liberties " thereof, except ſuch perſons only as ſhall be " thereunto appointed by his majeſty, or any other " lawful authority.

" That no perſon lay hemp, flax, wax, gun- " powder, pitch, tar, roſin, brimſtone, or the like " combuſtible commodities, in any cellar, ware- " houſe, or other place, on that ſide next the " ſtreet, which, by the ſhaking of links, torches, " or caſting in of other fire at the windows next " the ſtreet, may be in danger of ſuch fire."

In the year 1668, the Lord-mayor iſſued a precept to prevent immoralities, prophanation of the Lord's-day, drunkenneſs, and gaming; and for ſuppreſſing rogues, vagrants, and ſturdy-beggars. And, in conformity to a late act of parliament, the citizens were ordered to keep the ſtreets before their houſes and ground, duly paved and ſwept, and to preſerve their dirt in tubs or baſkets, till the coming of the raker, on pain of forfeiting three ſhillings and fourpence; and that they ſhould not ſuffer any aſhes, dirt, or other filth, to lay before their doors, on the penalty of five ſhillings, nor before their neighbour's, or any church, church-yard, or other public place or building, on the penalty of twenty ſhillings; and that the inhabitants ſhould duly hang and keep out their candles lighted to the accuſtomed hour; and the conſtables ſhould ſit and continue their watches at ſuch time as had been directed and appointed by former acts of common-council.

In the year 1669, on the eighth of September, the common-council paſſed an act for aboliſhing the market, which had been kept in Alderſgate-ſtreet, and for eſtabliſhing Newgate-market, Honey-lane-market, and the market at Woolchurch. And,

The following year the parliament enacted, that, excluſive of the ſtreets which had already been appointed to be widened, the following ſhould alſo be enlarged: Pater-noſter-row, Warwick-lane, Watling-ſtreet, Candlewick-ſtreet, Eaſtcheap, Swithin's-lane, Little Wood ſtreet, Milk-ſtreet, Tower ſtreet, Water-lane, in Tower-ſtreet, Rood-lane, St. Mary-hill, Thames-ſtreet, from London-bridge to Puddle-dock, Pye-corner, and Threadneedle-ſtreet. That the ſum of one ſhilling per chaldron on coals, which had been granted to the Lord-mayor and citizens, for the term of ſeventeen years and five months, not being found ſufficient, for the accompliſhment of the ſaid works, the ſame ſhould be increaſed to three ſhillings per chaldron; and that the ſole power for regulating and paving the ſtreets of the city of London, and making and cleanſing drains and ſewers ſhall remain in the mayor, commonalty, and citizens, to be executed by ſuch perſons as the mayor, aldermen, and common-council ſhall appoint.

The commiſſioners of the ſewers, in conſequence of theſe powers granted them by parliament, did, on the firſt of March 1670, publiſh an act of common-council, which had been made the twenty-ſeventh of October preceding. In this act, they appointed a lay-ſtall in Whitechapel road, leading to Mile-end, now called White-chapel Mount; others contiguous to Dowgate-dock, to Puddle-dock, and to Whitefriars-dock; and after having ſummed up the ancient cuſtoms and other ſtatutes relative to the paving and cleanſing the ſtreets and lanes in the city of London, they appointed the following rules, orders, and directions:

1. That hereafter all ſtreets within this city, called, known, or ſet down to be high ſtreets, ſhall be paved round or cauſeway faſhion, and, upon notice given to the commiſſioners of any defective pavements in any of the ſtreets, lanes, and paſſages within this city and liberties, the ſame ſhall be forthwith made good and amended, unleſs by general conſent ſome better expedient be found and publiſhed.

2. That inaſmuch as it hath been found by common experience, that the paviors, to hide and cover their bad workmanſhip, have oftentimes ſpread and laid great quantities of gravel over their pavements, to greater charge to the perſons ſetting them on work than was needful, and which, upon a ſudden rain, did either choak the common ſewers, or turn to dirt and mire in the ſtreets; therefore the ſaid paviors are required, that hereafter they do forbear to lay or ſpread any more gravel on the pavements than will only fill up the joints of their work, and cauſe the ſame to be ſwept and well rammed, and leave the pavements bare of gravel, and keep a regular method of paving, not paving one door higher than another, upon pain of paying five ſhillings for every complaint.

3. That the breadth of ſix feet at the leaſt, from the foundation of the houſes in ſuch of the ſaid high ſtreets which ſhall be allowed to be poſted, ſhall be paved by the inhabitants or owners with flat or broad ſtone for a foot-paſſage, unleſs ſuch parts thereof as ſhall lie before any gate-way, which may be done with ſquare rag by the ſaid breadth of ſix feet, upon pain of paying five ſhillings for every week the ſame ſhall be omitted to be done after notice given.

4. That every perſon, having occaſion to rebuild or repair any houſe or houſes fronting any ſtreet, lane, or common paſſage, do firſt procure licence of Mr. Chamberlain, for the time being, to board in a piece of ground before his building, within which to lay his materials for building, or in default, ſhall pay forty ſhillings, and twenty ſhillings for every week's omiſſion ſo to do.

5. That a fall or ceſt-pool, of convenient bigneſs, ſhall be made and continued to every grate of the common ſewer within this city and liberties, to receive the ſand or gravel coming to the ſame, ſo to prevent the choaking thereof: and upon complaint at any time made of the want, decay, or defect thereof, the commiſſioners will forthwith cauſe the ſame to be made or amended.

6. That the fellowſhip of carmen of this city, having undertaken for one year, to commence from the firſt of January, 1671, to ſweep and cleanſe the ſtreets, lanes, and common paſſages, within the ſaid city and liberties, from dung, ſoil, filth, and dirt, and to carry the ſame, together with what ſhall be brought out of the houſes of the inhabitants, unto certain lay-ſtalls appointed or that ſhall be appointed, by the ſaid commiſſioners for the time being, the ſeveral perſons by them employed in and about this affair, whoſe names, places of abode, number of tunbrils or carts, and the wards to which they are reſpectively deſigned, are hereafter ſet down, or ſuch others as, by death or removal of any of them, ſhall be employed therein, ſhall keep, obſerve, and follow the rules and orders hereafter following, viz.

7. That they, their agents, or ſervants, ſhall come out with their tunbrils, or carts and horſes, on Mondays, Tueſdays, Wedneſdays, Thurſdays, and Fridays, in every week of the year, from the eleventh of October, to the eleventh of February, by five of the clock every morning of the ſame days, and not continue and remain in the ſtreets, lanes, or paſſages, after the hour of nine of the clock the ſame morning; and from the eleventh of February, to the 11th of October to come out, as aforeſaid, by four of the clock every morning of the ſame day, and not to continue or remain in the ſtreets, lanes, or paſſages, after the hour of ſeven of the clock the ſame morning; and upon every Saturday in the year to come out as aforeſaid, by two of the clock in the afternoon of the ſame day, to remain and continue till night, if need be: and within the hours and times aforeſaid, ſhall cleanſe all the ſtreets, lanes and paſſages, every man within his or their reſpective diviſions, from its ſoil, filth, and dirt, by ſweeping of the ſame, and carrying it away, together with what what ſhall be brought out of the houſes of the inhabitants to the lay-ſtalls appointed, or that ſhall be appointed, upon pain to forfeit, for every offence, twenty ſhilllings.

8. That the ſeveral inhabitants within this city and liberties, or their ſervants, do take care that the dirt, aſhes, and ſoil of their houſes be in readineſs for the carmen, their agents or ſervants, either by ſetting out the ſame over night in tubs, boxes, baſkets, or other veſſels, near and contiguous to their houſes, or by bringing out the ſame within convenient time before the hours for their departure as aforeſaid.

9. That the ſaid carmen, their agents, or ſervants, in their ſeveral wards or diviſions, with the aſſiſtance of the ſervants of the inhabitants who are hereby directed to give ſuch aſſiſtance, ſhall, in times of froſt or ſnow, daily employ themſelves in the opening of the channels, and heaping up the ice and ſnow, that ſo the paſſages may be cleared; and, upon a thaw of the ſame, that all the ſoil and filth found in the ſtreets, lanes, and paſſages, be carried away, upon pain of ten ſhillings for every day's omiſſion.

10. 11. That the ſeveral tunbrils or carts, employed or to be employed in this work, ſhall be marked or numbered according to the number of carts appointed for each ward, upon the penalty of two ſhillings for every load carried without ſuch mark.

12. That the ſeveral carmen, undertakers in this affair, ſhall ſet upon the fore-part of his tunbril or cart, open and plain to view, a board, whereon to be painted the city arms, the ward to which he or they are appointed, and the mark or number of his tunbril or cart, upon the penalty of paying three ſhillings and four-pence a day for want thereof, which ſaid marking is to betoken the allowance of the commiſſioners, and to caution the in habitants from employing of foreign carts.

15. That the aforeſaid carmen, their agents or ſervants, and no other, ſhall alſo carry away, to the lay-ſtalls aforeſaid, all ſuch ſoil, dirt, and dung, (rubbiſh or earth excepted) that ſhall be made or found in any of the houſes or ſtables of any inn keeper, livery-ſtable-keeper, brewer, dyer, ſugar-baker, ſope-maker or other trader or inhabitant within any the wards to which they are reſpectively appointed and deſigned; for which ſuch quarterly allowance (over and above the cuſtomary rates by the ſcavengers book) ſhall be made by the aſſeſſors of each ward according to their beſt diſcretion, reſpect being had to the trade, or other occaſions, in the making of more or leſs dung and ſoil by ſuch traders or inhabitants.

16. That the aforeſaid carmen, their agents or ſervants, and no other, ſhall take up and carry away, to ſuch perſons or places as will receive the ſame, all ſuch rubbiſh or earth that ſhall be made or found within their reſpective wards or diviſions; for which there ſhall be paid them by the owners or proprietors thereof one ſhilling per load, and no more, provided they carry it away within one day after notice given for the conveniency of the owners, and to avoid complaint of them, upon pain that the perſon, offending in either of theſe caſes, ſhall pay two ſhillings per load.

17. 34. That the carmen undertakers, their agents or ſervants, ſhall have liberty to carry rubbiſh from any parts of the city or liberties into the vineyard near Aldgate, for levelling the ſame, till the firſt of May next, and to ſhoot the ſame there gratis, and after that time to pay ſuch ſum, for what they there ſhoot as the commiſſioners ſhall require.

35. That inaſmuch as the ſaid carmen have undertaken to do this work in better manner and to greater ſatisfaction than heretofore hath been done, and the commiſſioners believing, from what they have already obſerved, that they will accordingly perform the ſame, do therefore exhort all perſons, that ſhall be rated towards this work, willingly and readily to pay the ſame, ſo to prevent trouble to themſelves, and diſcouragement to the ſaid carmen in a work of this nature, ſo requiſite and neceſſary to the health and trade of the inhabitants of this city.

36. That the ſeveral pains and penalties beforementioned, not particularly expreſſed to whom to be paid, ſhall be paid into the chamber of London, upon ſummons or warning by the officers attending the commiſſioners, or either of them; or in default, the offender or offenders to be indicted at the ſeſſions for his or their reſpective offences.

37. That if any of the aforeſaid carmen, their agents or ſervants, do offend in any of the particulars aforeſaid, or otherwiſe relating to this affair, that complaint be made thereof to the commiſſioners at the Guildhall, who will deal with them according to their offences.

38. That the ſcavengers for the time being, in the ſeveral wards or precincts within the city and liberties, do take care, either by their own obſervations or complaints made to them by any of the inhabitants, that the ſaid carmen their agents or ſervants, do accordingly perform the ſeveral branches afore-mentioned to them relating, or to make complaint thereof to the commiſſioners, upon pain that the ſaid ſcavengers ſhall from time to time, for their negligence, or remiſſneſs, be indicted at the ſeſſions, unleſs they ſhall ſubmit to the cenſure and judgment of the ſaid commiſſioners for the time being.

Notwithſtanding this act the clergy ſuffered greatly by many of the houſes in the reſpective pariſhes ſtanding untenanted. This, however, was adjuſted by lord-chancellor Harcourt, aſſiſted by Mr. Baron Bury and Mr. Baron Price, on the 24th of December, 1713, who decreed, that the ſums aſſeſſed purſuant to this act became a real charge upon the houſes, buildings, and other hereditaments whereupon they were ſo aſſeſſed, and that arrears might be levied by diſtreſs and ſale of the goods of the preſent occupiers, which ſhall be found in or upon the ſaid premiſes.

On the ſeventeenth of September 1674, the common-council, for the better regulation of public markets, enacted, that any country perſon, not keeping ſhop, in or within two miles of London, may ſell openly in each market, all ſorts of butchery, poultry, and other country proviſions, on Mondays, Wedneſdays, Fridays, and and Saturdays. That a bell, in each reſpective market, ſhall ring thrice every day; and if any perſon ſell, or expoſe to ſale, any of the aforeſaid goods before the firſt bell rings, he ſhall be proceeded againſt as a foreſtaller; or, if he ſells, or expoſes to ſale any goods after the laſt bell has rung, he ſhall forfeit twenty ſhillings for each offence.

The market being principally intended for the benefit and advantage of houſekeepers, and others, who buy for their own uſe, to be ſpent in their families, the common-council farther enacted, that if any retailer or trader in this city, who buys to ſell again, do come into any of the ſaid markets, to buy, or cauſe to be brought, or carry away, or cauſe to be carried away, any of the proviſions brought into the market to be ſold, to his, her, or their reſpective houſes or ſhops before the ringing of the bell, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, ſuch offenders ſhall, for every offence, forfeit and pay the ſum of forty ſhillings.

On the twenty-ninth of October 1675, the Lord-mayor magnificently entertained his majeſty at Guildhall, where he was moſt graciouſly pleaſed to accept the freedom of the city, from the hands of Sir Thomas Player, the chamberlain. In conſequence of this, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, willing to teſtify their ſenſe of his majeſty's ſuperior condeſcenſion to any of his progenitors, waited on him in the banqueting-houſe at Whitehall, on the eighteenth of December following, when the Lord-mayor, on his knees, preſented his majeſty with a copy of his freedom, in a large ſquare box of maſſy gold, and the ſeal thereof incloſed in another box of the ſame metal, beautifully enriched with large diamonds of great value, which his majeſty accepted of, with many expreſſions of great kindneſs to the city.

In the year 1676, the common-council, being compoſed of many perſons, whoſe characters did not redound to the honour of that reſpectable body, it was ordered, by the Lord-mayor and aldermen, on the twelfth of December, that the precepts to be iſſued for holding of wardmotes, require, that no perſon be choſen a common-councilman, who has been convicted of defrauding in weights, meaſures, or ſuch like crimes, nor any perſon who has compounded, through inability, to pay his debts.

The following year, in the month of October, the marriage was concluded between William, prince of Orange, and the princeſs Mary, eldeſt daughter to the Duke of York. This news no ſooner reached the city, than it was proclaimed in all parts by ringing of bells, firing of guns, and every other mark which could demonſtrate univerſal ſatisfaction.

In the year 1678, his majeſty granted a charter for erecting a corporation for the relief of poor widows and children of clergymen, in which was ſet forth, that they ſhould be a body politic and corporate, with perpetual ſucceſſion, and power to purchaſe and hold lands, to the value of two thouſand pounds per annum, ſubject to the viſitation of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, Lord chancellor, archbiſhop of York, lord keeper of the great ſeal, lord high treaſurer, biſhop of London, lord almoner, and Lord mayor of London, to ſettle all differences about the government thereof, and the diſpoſition of their revenues.

The following year, about the beginning of May, the citizens diſcovered a horrid conſpiracy formed by the jeſuits and other papiſts, for deſtroying the city of London a ſecond time by fire. One Elizabeth Oxley, a ſervant in Fetter-lane, having ſet fire to her maſter's houſe, was apprehended and committed to priſon; when ſhe confeſſed the fact, and declared, that ſhe had been hired to do it by one Stubbs, a papiſt, who was to give her five pounds as a reward. Stubbs being immediately ſecured, confeſſed that he had perſuaded her to it; but that he himſelf had been prevailed on by one father Gifford, his confeſſor, who aſſured him, that inſtead of its being a ſin, it would be a great ſervice to the church, to burn and deſtroy all the houſes of heretics; ſaying that he had converſed many times on that affair with Gifford and two Iriſhmen. And the maid and Stubbs jointly declared, that the papiſts intended to riſe in London, in expectation of being aſſiſted by a powerful army from France. Soon after a proſecution was commenced againſt many of the jeſuits for the above plot, and five of them were convicted and executed; and the king iſſued a proclamation for baniſhing all papiſts from the city of London, and ten miles of the ſame.

This wicked plot ſo highly incenſed the citizens of London againſt the papiſts, that on the ſeventeenth of November, being the annual ſolemnity of burning the pope, they were determined to ſhew their abhorrence to popery, by celebrating the day with peculiar pomp and magnificence. For which purpoſe, the proceſſion began with a perſon on horſeback, perſonating Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, (who was murdered by the papiſts for being too active in diſcovering their late attrocious crimes) attended by a bell-man, proclaiming his execrable murder; then went a large ſilver croſs, followed by prieſts in copes; after theſe Carmelites and Grey-friars, followed by ſix jeſuits; then proceeded divers waiters; and after them ſeveral biſhops, ſome with lawn ſleeves, and others adorned with copes and mitres: next went ſix cardinals, who preceded the pope, enthroned in a ſtately pageant, attended by a great number of boys with pots of incenſe, and the devil whiſpering in his ear. About five o'clock in the evening, they marched in this order from Biſhopſgate to Fleet-ſtreet, where they committed his holineſs to the flames, in the preſence of an innumerable multitude of ſpectators.

On the tenth of May 1680, a moſt violent ſtorm of hail fell in this city and its neighbourhood, which did incredible damage; the ſtones whereof were of ſuch prodigious ſize, that many of them meaſured above nine inches in circumference.

Although the citizens received and entertained the duke of York on his arrival from Scotland, with great reſpect, yet the influence his highneſs had in the cabinet, and over the king, his brother, deprived him by degrees of the hearts and affections of the Londoners, who were determined, for the future, to chuſe ſuch ſheriffs as were proof againſt the corruption of the court, and who would not ſuffer traitors to eſcape, as had been lately done by ſeveral juries, to ſerve the intereſt of the popiſh faction. For this purpoſe, on Midſummer-day following, the citizens, in the intereſt of their country, put up and ſupported Slingſby Bethel and Henry Corniſh, in oppoſition to Box and Nicholſon, who were offered by the court; the former of whom, having obtained a very conſiderable majority, and a poll being demanded in behalf of the latter, a tumult enſued, which was improved by the Lord-mayor, and other devotees to the duke of York, into a riot; who repreſenting it to the king in the moſt aggravating manner, his majeſty, the ſame evening, iſſued out a commiſſion for trying the rioters. This, however, was ſo far from deterring the anti-courtiers, that they ſupported the country intereſt with greater ſpirit, and not only purſued all meaſures for a vigorous proſecution againſt the popiſh conſpirators, but likewiſe for excluding the duke of York.

ed,

His majeſty, to prevent their proceeding in the enquiry into the popiſh plot, and in the bill of excluſion, prorogued the parliament on the tenth of January, which ſo greatly affected the citizens of London, that on the thirteenth following, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, preſented a petition to his majeſty, repreſenting the prejudice it would be to him and the nation, ſhould the parliament's enquiry into the late plot be ſtopped and prevented; and the bad conſequences that muſt attend their being diſenabled to proceed againſt chief juſtice Scroggs, and other judges, impeached for treaſon. That, as the welfare of the city, the proteſtant religion, and tranquillity of the nation, were greatly endangered thereby, they moſt humbly prayed, that his majeſty would be pleaſed to permit the parliament to ſit from the day to which they were prorogued.

This petition ſo highly offended his majeſty, that inſtead of complying with their requeſt, he immediately diſſolved the parliament; and writs being iſſued out for a new election, the citizens applied themſelves ſo diligently, that notwithſtanding the greateſt efforts uſed by the court-party to oppoſe them, they carried their election with a high hand, in favour of their late four worthy repreſentatives, to whom the citizens immediately gave the following inſtructions: firſt, "thanking them for their faithful and unwearied endeavours, in the two laſt parliaments, to ſearch into and diſcover the deſign of the popiſh plot, to preſerve his majeſty's royal perſon, the proteſtant religion, and the well eſtabliſhed government of this realm, to ſecure the meeting and ſitting of frequent parliaments, to aſſert our undoubted rights of petitioning, and to puniſh ſuch as have betrayed thoſe rights; to promote the long-wiſhed-for union of his majeſty's proteſtant ſubjects, to repeal the thirty-fifth of Elizabeth, and the corporation act, and more eſpecially for their aſſiduous endeavours in promoting the bill of excluſion of James duke of York." And concluded thus: "that being confidently aſſured, that the ſaid members for the city will never conſent to the granting any money ſupply, till they have effectually ſecured them againſt popery and arbitrary power, they reſolved, by God's aſſiſtance, to ſtand by their ſaid members with their lives and fortunes."

In the year 1681, on the nineteenth of May, the common-council, (to prevent abuſes, which had been diſcovered in the weighing of goods and merchandize at the kings beam, to the prejudice of the freemen of London) enacted, "that an abatement ſhall be made of the ancient duties and rates, unto all perſons that ſhall be ſellers to the freemen of the ſaid city, viz. That a freeman buying of a non-freeman's goods ſold by weight, ſhall be acquitted of the fourth part of the duties and rates which have been paid by the freeman buyer thereof." They likewiſe further enacted, "that the weigh-houſe ſhould be for the future in Little Eaſtcheap, and that it ſhould be the market for hops of Engliſh growth brought into London."

On the fifteenth of October following another act of common-council paſſed, in which it was enacted, "that every car, cart or caroon, ſhall have the arms of the city of London on its ſhaft, and a piece of braſs with the number engraven on it; and that thoſe who ſhall work unlicenſed carrs ſhall, for every offence, pay thirteen ſhillings and four-pence.

About this time the duke of York's picture in Guildhall being very much cut and mangled by ſome perſon unknown, (which was looked upon by the York faction as an act of the city) the Lord-mayor and aldermen, to remove the imputation of it, offered a reward of five hundred pounds for diſcovering the perpetrator.

Soon after this the duke was invited by the artillery company to their annual feaſt at Merchant-taylor's-hall; which, as their captain-general he accepted of; and at the time prefixed, attended by a great number of the nobility, and other perſonages, he was there entertained in a very ſplendid and elegant manner. But the citizens, who were more active againſt popery, and a popiſh ſucceſſion, and, as it were, in oppoſition to the abovementioned entertainment, appointed a public meeting, with a ſermon and a dinner, as is uſual among public ſocieties; and the gueſts were invited by a ticket to the following purport: "It having pleaſed Almighty God, by his wonderful providence, to deliver and protect his majeſty's perſon, the proteſtant religion, and Engliſh liberties, hitherto, from the helliſh and frequent attempts of their enemies the papiſts; in teſtimony of thankfulneſs herein, and for preſerving and improving mutual love and charity among ſuch as are ſenſible thereof, you are deſired to meet many of the loyal proteſtant nobility, gentry, clergy, and citizens, on Friday the twenty-firſt inſt. April 1682, at ten of the clock, at St. Michael's church, in Cornhill, there to hear a ſermon, and from thence to go to Haberdaſher's-hall to dinner, and to bring this ticket with you." This amicable propoſition being repreſented to the king and council, in a moſt dangerous light, on the nineteenth of the ſaid month, they iſſued out an order, ſtrictly charging and commanding them, as they ſhould anſwer the contrary at their peril, "To take immediate " mediate and effectual care to prevent and hinder " the ſaid meeting, as an unlawful aſſembly."

Party-matter running very high, each ſide exerted themſelves to ſecure the ſheriffs of London and Middleſex in their intereſt. And the Lord-mayor, who was a tool to the court, inſiſted on his right of nominating one, by the ceremony of drinking to a fellow-citizen; and accordingly, at the Bridge-houſe feaſt, on the eighteenth of May, his lordſhip was pleaſed to paſs the compliment of drinking to Dudley North, Eſq; a ceremony, by which the perſon ſo drank to, has been looked upon as put in nomination, or to be, in the judgment of the chair, a very fit man to be one of the ſheriffs, if he ſhall be elected by the common-hall.

In conſequence of this nomination, Mr. North, before he was choſen by the common-hall, and indeed a conſiderable time before the election, came to a court of aldermen, and gave bond to hold ſheriff. After which, the Lord-mayor iſſued forth his precept to the ſeveral companies in the following unaccuſtomed manner:

" By the MAYOR.

" Theſe are to acquaint you, that at Midſum-" mer-day next, being the day appointed, as " well for confirmation of the perſon who hath " been by me choſen, according to the ancient " cuſtom and conſtitution of the city, to be " one of the ſheriffs of this city and county " of Middleſex, for the year enſuing, as for the " election of the other of the ſaid ſheriffs, and " other officers, you cauſe the livery of your " company to meet together at your common-" hall, early in the morning, and from thence " to come together, decently and orderly in their " gowns, to Guildhall, there to make the ſaid " confirmation and election. Given the nine-" teenth of June, 1682.

" JOHN MOOR."

This precept occaſioned great diſtraction among the companies; ſome iſſuing out ſummons to their members to meet and chooſe ſheriffs, &c. as anciently: others after this new mode, for confirmation and election; and ſome only, for electing city officers. However, on the twenty-third of June the matter being taken into debate at the court of aldermen, after ſome time it was deſired, that Mr. recorder would deliver his ſentiment; who, in a judicious ſpeech, gave his opinion, that the right of election of both the ſheriffs lay in the commonalty; and that the ſheriffs, pro tempore, were judges of the poll, if any were, and the whole court acquieſced therein. On which ſome companies, who had ſent out ſummons for confirmation and election, awarded new ones only for election.

The appointed time for choice being arrived, the livery aſſembled very numerous in common-hall. And after the Lord-mayor and aldermen were arrived on the huſtings, the common-cryer made proclamation, and ſaid to this purpoſe: " you gentlemen of the livery of London attend your confirmation." On which the common-hall vigorouſly interrupted, and cried, " no confirmation! no confirmation!" and continued to urge their right in that behalf near half an hour, not ſuffering him to go on. Mr. recorder then ſtepped on the huſtings, and made a ſpeech; in which he ſet forth the excellency of government in general, and the happineſs particularly of our own, and eſpecially of this great and oppulent city, more immediately as to their great privilege of chooſing their own ſheriffs, citing for the ſame, the grant of the charter of king John, &c. After this the Lord-mayor and aldermen withdrew, and Mr. common ſerjeant offering to ſpeak, the common-hall cried, " election! election! and the work of the day!" but the ſheriffs deſiring their patience, he went on and ſpake a few words relating in general to the buſineſs of the day.

The hall then proceeded in the uſual ancient method, and the conteſt about confirmation being relinquiſhed, there were put in nomination for ſheriffs the before named Dudley North, Thomas Papillion, John Dubois, and Ralph Box, eſquires. On a view of the hands the election was declared to fall upon Mr. Papillion and Mr. Dubois, they having apparently the majority by one thouſand or twelve hundred hands. However, a poll was demanded and granted for all the ſaid four candidates.

About three o'clock the poll began; previous to which eight or nine books and writers were prepared in Guildhall-yard, and perſons to inſpect them on either ſide. Some deſired that a diſtinct column might be adapted for ſuch as were for confirmation; but that being before reſolved in the negative, and the only diſpute now not being for or againſt confirmation, but which two of the four gentlemen ſhould be choſen by the common-hall for ſheriffs, the ſame was refuſed as impracticable and impertinent; but all left at liberty to poll for which of the four competitors they pleaſed.

The choice appearing likely to fall on Papillion and Dubois, many that were for North and Box applied themſelves to the Lord-mayor, ſuggeſting, as if they were denied to poll, and that many of their party were abſent, and the like complaints, occaſioned his lordſhip's coming to the hall; where, ſending for the ſheriffs into the council-chamber, they excuſed themſelves for the preſent, being buſy in the work of the day, but promiſed to wait on his lordſhip as ſoon as the poll was over. His lordſhip went to the polling place, and ſeemed to forbid their farther proceeding; but the ſheriffs offered ſeveral reaſons why they ought to go on, being in the legal diſcharge of their office, and ſo continued the poll.

The mayor, and ſome few aldermen came to the huſtings about ſeven o'clock in the evening, where the common-crier, by direction from his lordſhip, ſpoke to the company in the hall to the following purpoſe: " All you that " were ſummoned to appear here this day, are re-" quired to depart, and to give your attendance " on Tueſday at nine o'clock in the morning." The occaſion not being mentioned, ſome of the people aſked, for what? but the generality called " a poll! a poll!" His lordſhip going ſoon after, the ſheriffs continued the poll as before, intending, for the eaſe of their fellow citizens, to have diſpatched it that night; but it growing near nine o'clock, and there being ſome ſmall number of perſons who then unſeaſonably demanded to be polled, the ſheriffs thought proper to adjourn for half an hour into the hall: in which time there were aſſembled in the great-hall three or four thouſand people, calling out, "a hall! a hall!" till the ſheriffs came upon the huſtings; one of whom ſpoke as follows: "Gentlemen, we have "had a poll to day, and we the ſheriffs, as we "are the king's miniſters, ſo we have done and "will act therein with all fairneſs and honeſty, as "becomes us. My Lord-mayor hath taken upon "him to adjourn this court: but we do now tell "you, that we do adjourn the court until Tueſ-"day morning nine o'clock, then to declare the "poll, or to poll any ſuch as have right to poll, "and have not yet polled already." After which the ſheriffs went home, attended by a great concourſe of citizens, who followed them with loud and grateful acclamations of "God bleſs the pro-"teſtant ſheriffs, God bleſs Papillion and Du-"bois, &c."

The Lord mayor, however, made complaint to the king and council of his having been inſulted: on which he, together with the aldermen and ſheriffs were ordered to attend the privy-council on the Monday following: when Mr. Pilkington and Mr. Shute, the ſheriffs and alderman Corniſh, were committed priſoners to the Tower by warrant ſigned by twenty-four privy-counſellors; who, at the ſame time gave orders to the attorney-general to proſecute with the utmoſt ſeverity all ſuch as ſhould be found to have been promoters and encouragers of the late tumult.

On the Friday following theſe priſoners were admitted to bail at the king's bench bar, by virtue of the Habeas Corpus act; and on the firſt of July, they called a common-hall; where, in defiance to the Lord-mayor's order to the recorder to adjourn it to the ſeventh, they proceeded in the election, and declared Papillion and Dubois duly elected.

This ſo irritated the Lord-mayor, that he and his party met at Guildhall on the fourteenth, when his lordſhip produced an order of council to begin all proceedings anew, and to carry them on in the uſual manner as they ought to have been on the twenty-fourth of June laſt.

This order was vigorouſly oppoſed by many of the moſt eminent citizens, as an innovation tending to deſtroy their ancient rights and privileges.

The Lord-mayor, however, in obedience to the ſaid order, declared North duly elected by him, without the ſanction of a common-hall; and then proceeded to a poll for another ſheriff, to which none coming that had voted for Papillion and Dubois at the former election, Box was choſen without oppoſition; and North and he were returned duly elected, while Papillion and Dubois were left to ſeek their remedy at law.

Soon after Box, finding that the manner of his election could not be legally juſtified, prudently declined ſerving the office, by paying the accuſtomed fine of exemption. In conſequence of which a common-hall was ſummoned to proceed to a new election; when Mr. Peter Birch being choſen, he, together with Mr. North, was ſworn in before the Lord-mayor.

Theſe arbitrary proceedings are a convincing proof that the court was determined to carry their point at any rate: not that their motives roſe from a principle of ſerving any particular man, but for ſecuring the ſheriffs of London in their intereſt; by which means they could ſelect ſuch juries as might acquit or condemn thoſe whom they pleaſed to favour or ruin. As a proof of which we refer to the juries that found lord Ruſſel guilty of treaſon: that fined alderman Pilkington, on a falſe information of Sir William Hooker and Sir Henry Tulſe, one hundred thouſand pounds for ſaying, "that the duke of York had fired the city, and was now come to cut their throats:" and that brought in Sir Patience Ward guilty of perjury, becauſe he, on the trial of alderman Pilkington, ſwore that he did not hear him ſay the words above-recited.

The common-council having appointed a committee to inſpect the acts and proceedings entered into the journals of the court in the times of uſurpation, or at any time before or ſince, that might be fit to be explained or repealed; the ſaid committee, on the ſixth of June 1683, made the following report:

To the right honourable the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common-council aſſembled.

"Whereas by a late order of this honourable "court it was referred unto us, whoſe names are "ſubſcribed, to inſpect the acts and other pro-"ceedings entered in the journals of this court "in the times of uſurpation, or at any time be-"fore or ſince, that may be thought fit to be ex-"plained or repealed; now we do humbly certify, "That in purſuance of the ſaid order, we have "peruſed and examined the journals of this court "in the times of the late rebellion, wherein we "find not only many innovations and irregulari-"ties brought into this court and the government "of this city; but alſo moſt pernicious and abo-"minable proceedings, in abetting and carrying "on thoſe wicked and unnatural diviſions then "raiſed in the kingdom, and ſerving the uſurpa-"tion of thoſe times. All, or moſt of which, "we perſuade ourſelves, could never have had "place in this court, had not violence been of-"fered to the government of this city, the Lord-"mayor been arreſted and impriſoned, divers "loyal aldermen and commons, ſome impriſoned, "others diſgraced, and all loyal citizens ge-"nerally diſcountenanced and diſcouraged; and "others of factious, unquiet, and turbulent ſpi-"rits, got themſelves into the common-council, "and made up the greater number therein. All "which acts and proceedings might, as they well "deſerve, be obliterated and wholly expunged, "that no remembrance thereof ſhould be tranſ-"mitted to poſterity, to the ſhame and diſhonour "of this court and city; but that other matters "are therewith intermixed, which for the ſub-"ſtance of them are, in our opinions, inoffenſive, "uſeful, and fit to be continued. Several com-"mittees have formerly been appointed by this "court to obliterate the ſaid unjuſt proceedings.

" and there are lines croſſed over divers of them, " which, we preſume, were made by the ſaid " committees; but not being thereby obliterated, " and ſtill remaining in the books as the acts and " proceedings of this court, and never having " been particularly diſclaimed and repealed by " any vote or act of this court, that we have ob- " ſerved; we think it very fitting, that the ſame " and all other like diſloyal and irregular pro- " ceedings, ſhould by an expreſs act of this court, " be renounced, repealed, and made abſolutely " null and void. Which proceedings, or moſt of " them, we have here ſet down and preſent to " this honourable court for that purpoſe; and " deſire that ſome few of them may be here " openly read, to beget in this court, as it hath " done in us, a juſt abhorrence and deteſtation " of ſuch proceedings."

After reciting the heads and dates of theſe proceedings, the ſaid report continues thus:

" All which particulars aforeſaid being highly " diſloyal, or favouring of the faction and uſur- " pation of thoſe unhappy times, are fit by act of " this court to be diſclaimed, revoked, abrogated, " and repealed to all intents and purpoſes what- " ſoever; which as it will demonſtrate the loyalty " and good affections of the preſent members of " this court to his majeſty and the eſtabliſhed " government, and vindicate them from all im- " putation of the like pernicious and deſtructive " principles and practices, and will alſo expreſs " their diſlike of all factious innovation in the " uſages and conſtitutions of this city; ſo will " it prevent any ill uſe that may be made in time " to come of the ſaid irregular actions."

Theſe reports being openly read in court, they were approved of, agreed, to, and confirmed. And it was enacted by the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons, " that all the ſeveral acts, " orders, and proceedings, therein propounded " to be diſclaimed and repealed, be repealed and " made void; and they and every of them were, " by authority of the court, diſclaimed, re- " pealed and made null and void.".

The ſaid court then paſſed an act for regulating the election of ſheriffs: in which it was enacted, " that every perſon choſen ſheriff of London " and county of Middleſex, and refuſing to " ſerve the ſaid office; ſhall pay four hundred " pounds to the mayor and commonalty of the " ſaid city, unleſs he can purge himſelf upon " oath on account of his want or defect of ability " in wealth: if an alderman he ſhall pay ſix " hundred. And whereas it hath been an ancient " cuſtom and uſuage in chooſing the ſheriffs of " London and county of Middleſex allowed and " approved by divers acts of common-council, " for the Lord-mayor to elect a perſon to be one " of the ſaid ſheriffs, and the commons in com- " mon-hall, to confirm the ſaid election; and " there have been of late great and fierce diſ- " putes and conteſts within this city touching " the ſaid uſage, which hath given great diſturb- " ance to very many good citizens, and offence " to his majeſty, upon whoſe grace and favour " the welfare of this city ſo much depends; and " feuds and animoſities have thereby ariſen, and " are ſtill too much continued among many citi- " zens; and other manifold inconveniencies and " miſchiefs have been occaſioned thereby to this " city, and greater may enſue, if due remedy be " not provided to take away and remove all oc- " caſion of the like differences for the future: " for prevention therefore of the ſaid miſchiefs, " and to remove all diſputes and controverſies " that may ariſe in time to come, touching the " confirmation of ſuch perſon as ſhall be choſen " to be one of the ſaid ſheriffs by the Lord-mayor, " for the time being. Be it declared and enacted, " by the authority aforeſaid, that hereafter the " perſon who ſhall be nominated and elected ac- " cording to ancient uſuage, by the Lord-mayor of " this city for the time being, to be one of the " ſheriffs of the city of London and county of " Middleſex, and ſuch election ſhall be declared " to the commons of the ſaid city, aſſembled in " common hall, upon the twenty-fourth day of " June, being the day appointed by the afore- " recited act, as well for confirmation and allow- " ance of ſuch perſon as ſhall be choſen and " elected by the Lord-mayor to be ſheriff of the " ſaid city and county, as alſo for the choice and " election of ſuch other perſons as by the Lord- " mayor, aldermen, and commons, ſhall be cho- " ſen to be ſheriffs of the ſaid city and county, " ſhall there, by the ſaid commons, be confirmed " and allowed to be one of the ſheriffs of the ſaid " city and county accordingly. And that upon " propoſing the ſaid perſon to be confirmed to the " ſaid common-hall, in caſe any hands ſhall be " holden up in token of confirmation, the ſaid " perſon ſhall be taken to be confirmed and al- " lowed: and then another perſon ſhall be choſen, " by majority of hands, to be the other of the ſaid " ſheriffs, and to join with him that ſhall be ſo " confirmed; any former law, uſuage, or other " matter whatſoever to the contrary notwith- " ſtanding."

The court, having long before determined to " ſeize on the chartered rights of the citizens, " took this additional opportunity of executing " their intentions. And in the Michaelmas term " following, a quo warranto was iſſued, by the " attorney-general, for overthrowing the city " charters, and depriving them of the rights " and liberties therein contained."

The information of this quo warranto ſet forth, " that the mayor and commonalty and citizens " of the city of London, by the ſpace of a month " laſt paſt, and more, uſed, and yet did claim to " have or uſe, without any lawful warrant or regal " grant, within the city of London aforeſaid, the " liberties and privileges of the ſame city, viz. " theſe liberties and privileges following: 1. To " be of themſelves a body politic, by the name " mayor and commonalty and citizens of the " city of London. To be ſheriffs of the city of " London and county of Middleſex, and to " name, elect, make, and conſtitute them. 3. " That the mayor and aldermen of the ſaid city " were juſtices of peace, and held ſeſſions of " peace. All which liberties privileges, and " franchiſes, the ſaid mayor and commonalty, and

" citizens of London, upon the king, had by the " ſpace aforeſaid uſurped, and yet did uſurp."

This conduct of the court aroſe from a petition which had been preſented to the king by the city, on his proroguing the parliament, when they were about to try ſeveral noble perſons on the popiſh plot; and for their printing and publiſhing the ſaid petition, which was deemed ſeditious, and poſſeſſing the people with an ill opinion of the king and his government.

Notwithſtanding all the arguments uſed by the citizens to ſupport their conduct, and defend the infringement on their dear-bought liberties and privileges, yet the miniſtry were determined, at all events, to cruſh them. Accordingly the counſel and judges having diſplaced thoſe from the bench who diſapproved of theſe proceedings, juſtice Jones, on the twelfth of June 1683, pronounced the following ſentence againſt the city:

" That a city might forfeit its charter; that " the malverſations of the common-council were " acts of the whole city; and that the two points " ſet forth in the pleadings, were juſt grounds " for the forfeiting of a charter. Upon which pre- " miſes, the proper concluſion ſeemed to be, " that therefore the city of London had forfeited " their charter."

Although it was judged that the king might ſeize the liberties of the city; yet, being afraid of the conſequences, the attorney-general, contrary to what is uſual in ſuch caſes, was directed to move, that the judgment might not be recorded.

The citizens being greatly ſurpriſed at this unjuſt and arbitrary ſentence, a common council was immediately ſummoned to deliberate on this exigency. At which the country party moved to have the judgment entered. This, however, was over-ruled by the court party, who inſiſted upon an abſolute ſubmiſſion to the king, before judgment was entered; and though this was in effect a voluntary ſurrender of the city liberties, and depriving themſelves of the means of obtaining the judgment reverſed, the act of ſubmiſſion was carried by a great majority. And, in a petition from the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, " they acknowledged their own miſgo- " vernment, and his majeſty's lenity; begged his " pardon, and promiſed conſtant loyalty and " obedience; and humbly begged his majeſty's " commands and directions."

The anſwer returned by his majeſty was, that he would not reject their ſuit, if they would agree to the following particulars:

1. That no Lord-mayor, ſheriff, recorder, common-ſerjeant, town-clerk, or coroner of the city of London, or ſteward of the Borough of Southwark, ſhall be capable of, or admitted to, the exerciſe of their reſpective offices, before his majeſty ſhall have approved them under his ſign manual.

2. That, if his majeſty ſhall diſapprove the choice of any perſon to be Lord-mayor, and ſignify the ſame under his ſign manual to the Lord-mayor, or, in default of a Lord-mayor, to the recorder, or ſenior alderman; the citizens ſhall, within one week, proceed to a new choice: and, if his majeſty ſhall, in like manner, diſapprove the ſecond choice, his majeſty may, if he pleaſe, nominate a perſon to be Lord-mayor for the enſuing year.

5. If his majeſty ſhall, in like manner, diſapprove the perſons choſen to be ſheriffs, or either of them, his majeſty may appoint perſons to be ſheriffs for the enſuing year.

4. That the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen may alſo, with the leave of his majeſty, diſplace any alderman, recorder, &c.

5. Upon the election of an alderman, if the court of aldermen ſhall judge and declare the perſon preſented to be unfit, the ward ſhall chuſe again; and, upon a diſapproval of a ſecond choice, the court may appoint another in his room.

6. The juſtices of the peace are to be by the king's commiſſion; and the ſettling of theſe matters to be left to his majeſty's attorney and ſolicitor-general, and council learned in law.

To which the lord keeper added, " that theſe regulations being made, his majeſty would not only pardon this proſecution, but confirm their charter in ſuch a manner as ſhould be conſiſtent with them." Concluding thus: " My Lord-mayor, the term draws towards an end, and Midſummer day is at hand, when ſome of the officers uſed to be choſen: whereof his majeſty will reſerve the approbation. Therefore, it is his majeſty's pleaſure, that you return to the city, and conſult the common-council, that he may ſpeedily know your reſolutions thereupon: and accordingly give his directions. That you may ſee the king is in earneſt, and the matter is not capable of delay, I am commanded to let you know, he hath given order to his attorney-general to enter upon judgment on Saturday next, unleſs you prevent it by your compliance in all theſe particulars."

In conſequence of this order, a common-council was immediately ſummoned, when the friends of liberty treated theſe ſlaviſh conditions with the contempt they deſerved; declaring, at the ſame time, that they were ready to ſacrifice all that was near and dear to them, rather than ſubmit to ſuch arbitrary impoſitions. However, when the queſtion was put, it was carried for a ſubmiſſion by a majority of eighteen.

Notwithſtanding the citizens complied with every thing the king required of them, in reſpect to their charter, yet he departed from his promiſe, and commanded the quo warranto to be entered; which was no ſooner effected, than he commiſſioned Sir William Pritchard, the Lord-mayor, to hold the ſaid office during his majeſty's pleaſure: in which manner he appointed the ſheriffs. At the ſame time he appointed William Jenner recorder of the city, in the room of Sir George Treby, diſplaced; degraded eight aldermen in the country intereſt, appointed eight others to ſupply their places; and, on the twentieth of October, appointed Sir Henry Tulſe one of the informers againſt Pilkington, to execute the office of Mayor during pleaſure.

In

In the year 1684, a violent froſt began about the beginning of December, and continued ſo ſharp till the fifth of February following, that the Thames appeared as firm as the land; and all manner of trades, and every kind of diverſion were exerciſed upon it.

The year following, king Charles II. being ſeized with a kind of apoplectic fit, languiſhed only a few days, and died on the ſixth of February, in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and thirty-fifth of his reign.

ON the demiſe of king Charles II. the duke of York, who had a long time governed in the king's name, aſcended the throne by the title of James II. and the arbitrary meaſures impoſed on the citizens in the late reign, were ſtill preſerved in the preſent. For the firſt ſtep taken by the king, after his acceſſion, was the iſſuing out a proſecution againſt alderman Corniſh, who had exerted himſelf, when ſheriff, in the year 1680, to detect and proſecute the popiſh plot. In conſequence of which, on the 13th of October 1685, he was apprehended and committed to Newgate, without the uſe of pen, ink, or paper, till the Saturday following, when he received notice, that an indictment of high treaſon was preferred againſt him, and that he was to be tried on the Monday following. During this ſhort interval, he earneſtly requeſted time to prepare for his defence; but the attorney-general abruptly told him, that he had not ſo well deſerved of the government, as to expect ſuch an indulgence. And although he ſtrongly urged that his moſt material evidence was then above one hundred and forty miles from London, yet, on the Monday following, he was indicted for conſpiring with other falſe traitors to raiſe a rebellion in the kingdom, in the late reign, to deſtroy the king, and ſubvert the conſtitution. The principal evidence againſt him was colonel Ramſay, an infamous and profligate villain, and one Goodenough, who had been outlawed, but was pardoned on purpoſe, that he might have the opportunity of bearing teſtimony againſt him. And notwithſtanding the evidence of theſe two baſe men, did not in the leaſt affect the priſoner, he was nevertheleſs condemned, and, on the twenty-third of the ſame month, hanged, drawn, and quartered, facing his own houſe, at the end of King-ſtreet, Cheapſide.

This year the duke of Monmouth was beheaded on Tower-hill. When he went to the ſcaffold, he was attended by a very ſtrong guard, who were ordered, in caſe of a reſcue, (as was apprehended, he being the favourite of the people) to ſhoot him. When he laid his head on the block, and made the ſignal, the executioner ſtruck three times ineffectually, and then threw down the ax, declaring, that he could not go on; but the ſheriff compelled him to reſume the work, which, with three other ſtrokes, he finiſhed.

In the year 1687 there arrived in England fifteen thouſand five hundred French proteſtants, who had been compelled to fly from the perſecution of their reformed religion in France. Theſe unhappy people were immediately relieved by money ariſing from a brief, on which was collected the ſum of ſixty-three thouſand ſeven hundred and thirteen pounds, two ſhillings and threepence. And out of the above number thirteen thouſand five hundred, ſettled in and about the city of London and parts contiguous.

The following year the archbiſhop of Canterbury, with ſix other biſhops, were committed to the Tower. Soon after which they were brought to their trial, and acquitted.

In conſequence of theſe arbitrary proceedings, the moſt zealous patriots came to a reſolution of inviting the prince of Orange to come with an armed force, and deliver them from that ſlavery, oppreſſion and popery, to which otherwiſe their laws and religion muſt ſubmit.

This was no ſooner heard at court, than the king ordered his chancellor Jefferies to carry back the charter of the city of London, with the grants under the broad ſeal for reſtoring the ſame. And the next day the Lord-mayor held a ſpecial court of aldermen, when an order was made for reſtoring the liverymen of the ſeveral companies of the city, that were on the livery at the time when judgment was given againſt the city upon the quo warranto. Which order the clerks of the ſeveral companies were to enter in their reſpective books.

Information being received of the prince of Orange landing at Torbay, the king declared his reſolution to march againſt him with his army. On which occaſion he ſent for the Lord-mayor, and earneſtly recommended to him the care of the city during his abſence: told him that he had left ſufficient troops for their defence; and that upon any emergency he might apply to the privy-council for aſſiſtance and advice; at the ſame time aſſuring him, that if he returned victorious, he would punctually perform all he had promiſed, for the ſecurity of their religion and liberties.

This ſecurity, however, was providentially brought about and eſtabliſhed upon much better engagements, and a more laſting foundation: for the defection became ſo general, not only in moſt parts of the kingdom, but likewiſe in the army, that it occaſioned the king's ſpeedy return to London; where, apprehending himſelf in great danger, he reſolved to provide for his ſecurity by abdicating the throne and leaving the kingdom.

In this reign the ſettlement of Carolina was effected; and that of Penſylvania was alſo compleated by one Pen, a leading perſon among the quakers, who poſſeſs a great part of the colony to this day.

As ſoon as the king's flight was known, the lords ſpiritual and temporal met at Guildhall, and ſigned and publiſhed their declaration to apply to the prince of Orange, and to aſſiſt his highneſs to obtain a free parliament, and to be ready to do all other matters that ſhould tend to the public good. This was followed the ſame day by an addreſs from the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common council; and by another from the lieutenancy of the city of London to the prince of Orange. The contents of the city addreſs, which was ſent to his highneſs by a deputation of four aldermen and eight commoners, were as follows:

"We, taking into conſideration your high-
"neſs's fervent zeal for the proteſtant religion,
"manifeſted to the world in your many hazar-
"dous enterprizes, wherein it hath pleaſed al-
"mighty God to bleſs you with miraculous ſuc-
"ceſs, do render our deepeſt thanks to the "divine majeſty for the ſame, and beg leave to "preſent our moſt humble thanks to your high-
"neſs, particularly for your appearing in arms
"in this kingdom, to carry on and perfect your "glorious deſigns to reſcue three kingdoms
"from ſlavery and popery, and in a free parlia"ment to eſtabliſh the religion and the laws and "liberties of theſe kingdoms upon a ſure and
"laſting foundation.

"We have hitherto looked for ſome remedy
"for thoſe oppreſſions and imminent dangers,
"which we, together with our proteſtant fellow-
"ſubjects, laboured under, from his majeſty's con-
"ceſſions and concurrences with your highneſs's
"juſt and pious purpoſe expreſſed in your gra-
"cious declaration. But herein finding ourſelves
"finally diſappointed by his majeſty's with"drawing himſelf, we preſume to make your "highneſs our refuge, and do, in the name of "this capital city, implore your highneſs's pro"tection; and moſt humbly beſeech your high-
"neſs to repair to this city, where your highneſs
"will be received with univerſal joy and ſatis-
"faction."

Notwithſtanding the greateſt precautions were taken to preſerve the peace of the cities of London and Weſtminſter, yet the magiſtrates could not prevent the populace from aſſaulting the papiſts, whom they looked on as the authors of their late misfortunes and preſent diſtractions. They furiouſly fell upon the new-erected maſs-houſes both in the city and ſuburbs, which they plundered, burnt and levelled to the ground with the greateſt acclamations. Nor did their fury ſtop here: for being informed that the principal papiſts had taken ſanctuary in the houſes of the Spaniſh and Tuſcan ambaſſadors, where they had depoſited their beſt and moſt valuable effects, they plundered every thing of value, and what they could not take away they burnt. But, by the ſucceeding parliament, the ambaſſadors received ample ſatisfaction for their reſpective loſſes. They afterwards proceeded to the king's printing-houſe, where all the papers found therein were committed to the flames.

About this time, lord-chancellor Jeffries, who, in order to facilitate his eſcape, lay concealed in Wapping, diſguiſed in a ſeaman's habit, being obſerved by a clerk in chancery careleſsly looking out of the window, was ſeized by the mob, who treated him with ſuch ſeverity, that he died in a ſhort time after.

In the year 1688, the prince of Orange, being thoroughly ſatisfied that king James had left the kingdom, publiſhed the following order:

"Whereas the neceſſity of affairs does require
"ſpeedy advice, we do deſire all ſuch perſons as "have ſerved as knights, citizens, or burgeſſes
"in any of the parliaments that were held during "the reign of the late king Charles the ſecond,
"to meet us at St. James's, upon Wedneſday the "twenty-ſixth of this inſtant December, by ten
"of the clock in the morning; and we do like-
"wiſe deſire, that the Lord-mayor and court of "aldermen of the city of London would be pre-
"ſent at the ſame time; and that the common-"council would appoint fifty of their number to "be there likewiſe. And hereof we deſire them
"not to fail."

In return for the great honour done the city by the prince of Orange, they ſoon after lent the government two hundred thouſand pounds, of which Sir Samuel Daſhwood ſubſcribed ſixty thouſand pounds. And the zealots for the houſe of Orange drew up a petition to the lords, humbly requeſting, that his moſt illuſtrious highneſs and his royal conſort might be ſpeedily ſettled on the throne.

This, however, was diſcountenanced by the prince, who deſired the Lord-mayor to iſſue the following order:

"By

" By the LORD-MAYOR, &c.

" Whereas his highneſs the prince of Orange " has been pleaſed to ſignify to me this day, that " divers perſons, pretending themſelves to be " citizens of London, in a tumultuous and diſ- " orderly manner, have lately diſturbed the pre- " ſent convention of the lords and commons at " Weſtminſter, upon pretence of petitioning: it " being regular and uſual for the citizens of this " city, that are under the apprehenſions of any " grievance, to make their application to myſelf " and the court of aldermen: therefore, with " the advice of my brethren the aldermen of " this city, theſe are to require you, that you " command, within your ward, that they for- " bear any tumultuous diſturbance or aſſembly, " as they will anſwer the contrary at their utmoſt " peril."

This motion, however, ſoon after took place; and the ſtates of the kingdom offering them the crown, they accepted thereof, and were ſeated on the throne by the ſtile of king William and queen Mary.

In the year 1689, many letters from king James being intercepted, his majeſty was graciouſly pleaſed to communicate the ſame not only to the parliament, but likewiſe to the citizens, who were ſo highly pleaſed, that on the twenty-ſecond of June, the Lord-mayor and ſheriffs preſented a loyal and dutiful addreſs to his majeſty; in which they aſſured him, " that they would, as " far as in their power, oppoſe themſelves to and " ſuppreſs all deſigns of that nature; that they " would ſearch after, diſarm, ſeize, ſecure, and " bring to juſtice, all perſons concerned therein, " or contributing thereto; and that they were " unanimouſly, firmly, and unalterably reſolved " and determined to ſtand by, defend, and main- " tain his majeſty and his government, with the " utmoſt hazard of their lives and eſtates, againſt " all perſons whatſoever that ſhould conſpire or " attempt any thing againſt the ſame."

This year the Lord-mayor and citizens, deſirous of farther teſtifying their gratitude to their deliverer, invited the king, queen, prince and princeſs of Denmark, and both houſes of parliament, to dine at Guildhall on the Lord-mayor's day enſuing. At which time their majeſties, attended by a numerous train of the nobility, repaired to Cheapſide, when, after having beheld the paſſing of the ſplendid cavalcade, they were conducted by the ſheriffs to Guildhall, where they were ſumptuouſly entertained in a manner properly adapted for ſuch royal gueſts. And the evening concluded with bonfires, ringing of bells, and univerſal illuminations in all parts of the city.

In acknowledgment for theſe tokens of loyalty and affection from the city, towards their government and perſons, their majeſties immediately ordered the reſtoration of the citizens to their franchiſes. And a bill was brought into parliament, and ſoon after paſſed, for reverſing the judgment of the quo warranto againſt the city of London, and for reſtoring the ſame to its ancient rights and privileges. This was done in ſuch a manner and form, as to prevent any arbitrary miniſter, or corrupt judge and jury, from making any depredations on their chartered liberties for the future. The manner of which run thus:

" Whereas a judgment was given in the court " of king's-bench, in or about Trinity term, in " the thirty-fifth year of the reign of the late king " Charles II. upon an information in the nature " of a quo warranto, exhibited in the ſaid court " againſt the mayor, and commonalty, and ci- " tizens of London, that the liberty, privilege, " and franchiſe of the ſaid mayor, and common- " alty, and citizens, being a body politick and " corporate, ſhould be ſeized into the king's " hands as forfeited; and foraſmuch as the ſaid " judgment, and proceedings thereupon, is and " were illegal and arbitrary; and for that the re- " ſtoring of the ſaid mayor, and commonalty, and " citizens, to their ancient liberties, of which " they had been deprived, tends very much to " the peace and good ſettlement of this king- " dom:

" Be it declared and enacted, by the king and " queen's moſt excellent majeſties, and with the " advice and conſent of the lords ſpiritual and " temporal, and commons in this preſent parlia- " ment aſſembled, and by authority of the ſame, " that the ſaid jugdment, given in the ſaid court " of king's-bench, in the ſaid Trinity term, in the " thirty fifth year of the reign of the ſaid king " Charles the IId. or in any other term; and all " and every other judgment given or recorded " in the ſaid court, for the ſeizing into the ſaid " late king's hand, the liberty, privilege, or fran- " chiſe of the mayor, and commonalty, and citi- " zens of the city of London, of being themſelves " a body corporate and politick, by the name of " the mayor, and commonalty, and citizens of the " city of London, and by that name to plead, and " be impleaded, and to anſwer, and to be an- " ſwered, or in what manner or words ſoever ſuch " judgment was entered, is, ſhall be, and are " hereby reverſed, annulled, and made void, to " all intents and purpoſes whatſoever; and that " vacates be entered on the rolls of the ſaid judg- " ment, for the vacating and reverſal of the ſame " accordingly.

" And be it further declared and enacted, by " the authority aforeſaid, that the mayor, and " commonalty, and citizens of the city of Lon- " don, ſhall and may, for ever hereafter, remain, " continue, and be, and preſcribe to be, a body " corporate and politick, in re, facto & nomine, " by the name of mayor, and commonalty, and " citizens of the city of London, and by that " name, and all and every other name and " names of incorporation, by which they at any " time before the ſaid judgment were incorpo- " rated, to ſue, plead, and be impleaded, and " to anſwer and be anſwered, without any ſei- " zure or forejudger of the ſaid franchiſe, li- " berty, and privilege, or being thereof excluded " or ouſted, for or upon any pretence of any for- " feiture or miſdemeanor at any time heretofore " or hereafter to be done, committed, or ſuffer- " ed; and the mayor and commonalty, and ci- " tizens of the ſaid city, ſhall and may, as by law

" they ought, peaceably have and enjoy all and " every their rights, gifts, charters, grants, li- " berties, privileges, franchiſes, cuſtoms, uſa- " ges, conſtitutions, preſcriptions, immunities, " markets, duties, tolls, lands, tenements, eſtates, " and hereditaments whatſoever, which they law- " fully had, or had lawful right, title, or intereſt " of, in, or to, at the time of recording or giv- " ing the ſaid judgment, or at the time or times " of the ſaid pretended forfeitures.

" And be it enacted, by the authority aforeſaid, " that all charters, letters patents, and grants " for incorporating the citizens and commonalty " of the ſaid city, or any of them, and all char- " ters, grants, letters patents, and commiſſions " touching or concerning any of their liberties or " franchiſes, or the liberties, privileges, fran- " chiſes, immunities, lands, tenements, heredi- " taments, rights, titles, or eſtates of the mayor " and commonalty, and citizens of the city of " London, made or granted to any perſon or " perſons whatſoever, by the late king Charles " the ſecond, ſince the ſaid judgment given, or " by the late king James the ſecond, be and are " hereby declared and adjudged null and void to " all intents and purpoſes whatſoever.

" And be it enacted, by the authority aforeſaid, " that all and ſeveral of the companies and cor- " porations of the ſaid city ſhall from henceforth " ſtand and be incorporated by ſuch name and " names, and in ſuch ſort and manner, as they " reſpectively were at the time of the ſaid judg- " ment given, and every of them are hereby re- " ſtored to all and every the lands, tenements, " hereditaments, rights, titles, eſtates, liberties, " powers, privileges, precedencies, and immuni- " ties, which they lawfully had and enjoyed at the " time of giving the ſaid judgment; and that as " well all ſurrenders, as charters, letters patents, " and grants, for new incorporating any of the " ſaid companies, or touching or concerning any " of their liberties, privileges, or franchiſes, " made or granted by the ſaid late king James " the ſecond, or by the ſaid king Charles the " ſecond, ſince the giving of the ſaid judgment, " ſhall be void, and are hereby declared null and " void, to all intents and purpoſes whatſoever."

In the year 1690, advice being received that the Dutch had been defeated by the French in the Britiſh channel, it was apprehended that the enemy would attempt an invaſion. To defend which the patriotic citizens, (in the abſence of the king, who was then at the head of his army in Ireland,) immediately raiſed nine thouſand trained bands, and offered them to her majeſty ready to march wherever ſhe ſhould command, declaring that they were determined to ſupport their majeſties perſons and government at the hazard of their lives and fortunes. Their ſuſpicions, however, being ill-founded, aſſiſtance became unneceſſary.

On the tenth of September following, his majeſty, after a ſucceſsful campaign in Ireland, and driving king James from thence, arrived ſafe at Kenſington; and the next day he was attended by the Lord-mayor, aldermen and recorder, who, in the name of the city, congratulated his majeſty on his happy ſucceſs and ſafe return to his kingdom.

Many diſagreeable controverſies having aroſe reſpecting the nomination of aldermen, and election of common-council-men, it was thought neceſſary to adjuſt theſe matters on ſuch a principle as might prevent the like for the future. To effect which the common-council, in the year 1692, enacted, that none but freemen, being houſeholders, and paying ſcot and bearing lot, and none other whatſoever, have the right or privilege to nominate aldermen, and elect common-council men.

In the year 1694, the citizens of London finding themſelves indebted to the orphans in their truſt in the ſum of ſeven hundred forty-ſeven thouſand five hundred pounds, occaſioned by various accidents and public calamities, applied to parliament for relief to diſcharge the ſame; and they obtained an act, whereby all the city eſtates, except thoſe belonging to the hoſpitals and the bridge, were charged with raiſing the annual ſum of eight hundred pounds clear of all deductions, for ſettling a perpetual fund for paying four pounds per annum intereſt, for every hundred due by the city to the ſaid creditors. They farther enacted, that the profits ariſing from the ſeveral aqueducts belonging to the city, ſhould be applied towards the payment of the ſaid intereſt: that the Lord-mayor and common council might raiſe two thouſand pounds per annum by equal aſſeſſments upon the perſonal eſtates of the citizens, that the ſix hundred pounds per annum paid by the lighters of the convex lamps ſhould be applied in the ſame manner: that every apprentice at his binding to pay two ſhillings and ſixpence, and every perſon made free five ſhillings towards the fund: that five ſhillings ſhall be paid for every ton of wine, and four-pence extraordinary meetage for a chaldron of coals, in the port of London, to the ſaid fund: and that after the twenty-ninth of September 1700, the ſaid four-pence per chaldron ſhould be raiſed to ſix-pence, or, if weighable, ſix-pence per ton.

Sir John Trevor, ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, having greatly oppreſſed the citizens in paſſing this act, and the houſe being informed thereof, a committee was appointed to inſpect the accounts of the chamberlain's office; when, finding that Sir John had extorted from them one thouſand and fifty pounds, he was degraded the office of ſpeaker, and expelled the houſe.

On the twenty-ninth of October, his majeſty being returned from Holland, was received by the citizens in a moſt dutiful and affectionate manner; three days after which the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and recorder waited on his majeſty, and congratulated him on his ſafe arrival after ſo dangerous a campaign.

The citizens of London having been greatly injured by the increaſe of hawkers and pedlars, the Lord-mayor and common-council enacted, " That no perſon ſhould preſume to ſell any " goods or merchandize in any public place with- " in the city, or liberties thereof, except in open " markets and fairs, on the penalty of forty " ſhillings, That all citizens buying goods of " ſuch

" ſuch perſon, ſhould forfeit the like ſum. And " that every citizen who ſhould permit or ſuffer " ſuch goods to be expoſed for ſale in their houſes " ſhould likewiſe forfeit the ſum of forty ſhillings " for each offence."

On the twenty-eighth of December, this year, died queen Mary, the royal conſort of king William III. the Lord-mayor and aldermen attended her funeral obſequies, which were celebrated on the fifth of March, with the greateſt ſolemnity.

In the year 1695 the hawkers and pedlars, in order to evade the beforementioned act of common-council, carried their goods to the public markets, which occaſioned another act of common-council to be made, whereby it was ordained, " that no perſon or perſons whatever, whether " free or not free of this city, ſhall ſell or expoſe " to ſale in the public market, or any ground be- " longing to them, within the city and liberties, " any mercery wares, lace and linen, grocery or " confectionary wares, hoſier's wares, cutler's " wares, tin wares, drapery wares, millenery " wares, glaſs or earthen wares, toys or any ſuch " like commodities, or merchandizes, which are " ſold in open ſhops, or warehouſes of the free- " men of this city, and liberties thereof, upon " pain, to forfeit and pay, for every ſuch offence, " the ſum of three pounds with coſts of ſuit, if " proſecuted within fourteen days, in the name " of the chamberlain, in the Lord-mayor's court; " one moiety of which is to be converted to the " uſe of St. Thomas's-hoſpital, and the other to " the proſecutor."

On the twenty-firſt of June the common-council paſſed an act for farther regulating the method and rule of proceedings upon elections: in which, after taking notice of the diſputes concerning ſuch rights and powers to call and adjourn, they enact, " that the right for aſſembling common halls for the election of Lord-mayor, ſheriffs, and other public officers for the city, is and ought to be in the Lord-mayor, for the time being. That the right of taking a poll and ſcrutiny, and of adjourning the hall from time, to time till the ſame ſhall be concluded, ſhall be in the ſheriffs; that, if the ſheriffs diſagree, ſo as to impede the completing of a poll or ſcrutiny, and refuſe to obſerve the orders ſent to them on that occaſion by the Lord-mayor, to put an end to the difference, his lordſhip may proceed himſelf in granting and taking the poll and ſcrutiny, and in adjourning the hall, until all ſhall be finally concluded."

In conſequence of this eſtabliſhment, it is the cuſtom at all common halls for the Lord-mayor to come upon the huſtings attended by the aldermen and ſheriffs; and the buſineſs and intent of the meeting being opened to the livery by the recorder and common ſerjeant, the lord Mayor and aldermen retire, and leave the execution of the intermediate proceedings to the ſheriffs only. When a candidate is propoſed, the ſheriffs declare upon the queſtion; they appoint clerks for a poll; and after a ſcrutiny has been made, they declare the majority to the mayor, who then returns to the huſtings, certifies the election to the common-hall, by the recorder; and then the court, by his lordſhip's order, is diſſolved; except in the election of repreſentatives for the city in parliament, as they do not come under the denomination of city officers. They are choſen at a common-hall, ſummoned by the ſheriffs, in purſuance to a writ directed to them only. In which caſe the ſheriffs only are concerned in the return, and have excluſive power, given and ſpecified by other ſtatutes, to convene the voters, to preſide at the poll, to adjourn from time to time, to make the final declaration, and they are perſonally anſwerable for any miſtake made in the return.

In the election of Lord-mayor, all the aldermen under the chair, who have ſerved the office of ſheriff, are propoſed in rotation; out of which the livery, if they think proper, elect the two ſenior aldermen under the chair; and theſe two being preſented to the court of aldermen, they uſually elect the ſenior; though each have a right to deviate from this uſual method: the only queſtion is, how far the exerciſe of that right may be juſtified, when it is not founded on ſuch motives as have a real tendency to the greater dignity and better government of the community in general.

On the election of ſheriffs, thoſe aldermen who have not ſerved that office, are put up in the order of their ſeniority; then ſuch citizens as have been nominated, or drank to by the Lord-mayor, after theſe any others that ſhall be regularly propoſed at the time of election, and have not paid the fine to be excuſed. And out of the whole number of aldermen and commoners, the liverymen chooſe whom they think proper.

In the year 1697, king William being returned from Holland after the concluſion of the treaty of Ryſwick, he was earneſtly requeſted by the Lord mayor and citizens to make his public entry into the city. In compliance with which, on the ſixteenth of November his majeſty ſet out from Greenwich, attended by his royal highneſs the prince of Denmark, the principal officers of ſtate, and a great number of the nobility and gentry. His majeſty was received at St. Margaret's-hill, in Southwark, by the Lord-mayor, aldermen, &c. in their formalities on horſeback, who, after congratulating him on the joyful occaſion, conducted him through the city to Whitehall, amidſt the acclamations of a prodigious concourſe of ſpectators. The proceſſion was ſolemn, and the city was embelliſhed with the moſt pompous decorations.

The following year an act of parliament paſſed in which it was enacted, " that the public market of Blackwell-hall ſhall be held every Thurſday, Friday and Saturday, from eight to twelve in the forenoon, and from two to five in the afternoon, except days of humiliation and thankſgiving; and the keepers are not to admit any buying or ſelling of any woollen cloth at the ſaid hall, upon any other days or hours, than aforeſaid, upon the penalty of one hundred pounds."

In the year 1699, the market of Billingſgate, purſuant to act of parliament, commenced, on the tenth of May, a free market for fiſh ſix days in the week, with permiſſion to ſell mackarel on Sundays any time before or after divine ſervice. And it was enacted, " That all perſons buying any fiſh in the ſaid market may ſell the ſame again in any other market or place within London, or elſewhere, by retail; being ſound and wholeſome fiſh; except that none but fiſhmongers ſhall ſell in public or fixed ſhops, or houſes. And that no perſons ſhall employ, or be employed by, any other perſon, in buying at Billinſgate any quantity of fiſh, to be divided by lots, or in ſhares, amongſt any fiſhmongers, or others, to be afterwards ſold by retail or otherwiſe; nor ſhall any fiſhmonger engroſs, or buy, in the ſaid market, any quantity of fiſh, but what ſhall be for his own ſale or uſe, and not for any other fiſhmonger to ſell again, under penalty of twenty pounds for each offence; one moiety whereof to go to the proſecutor, the other to the pariſh."

On the ſixth of September 1701, the late king James II. died at St. Germain's in France; and the French king cauſed his ſuppoſed ſon to be proclaimed king of Great Britain and Ireland. This was ſo highly reſented by the city of London, that the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council preſented the following addreſs to the lords-juſtices in his majeſty's abſence:

" Great Sir!

" We are deeply ſenſible how much we are in " duty bound highly to reſent that great indignity " and affront offered to your moſt ſacred majeſty, " by the French king, in giving the title of king " of England, Scotland, and Ireland, to the pre- " tended prince of Wales, contrary to your ma- " jeſty's moſt juſt and lawful title, and to the ſe- " veral acts of parliament for ſettling the ſucceſ- " ſion to the crown in the proteſtant line. By " this it is apparent, he deſigns, as much as in " him lies, to dethrone your majeſty, to extirpate " the proteſtant religion out of theſe your ma- " jeſty's kingdoms, and to invade our liberties " and properties; for the maintaining whereof, " your majeſty hath ſignalized your zeal, by the " often hazarding your precious life. We, there- " fore, your majeſty's moſt loyal ſubjects, do ſin- " cerely, unanimouſly, and chearfully aſſure your " majeſty, that we will, at all times, and upon " all occaſions, exert the utmoſt of our abilities, " and contribute whatever lies in our power, for " the preſervation of your perſon, (whom God " long preſerve) and the defence of your juſt " rights, in oppoſition to all invaders of your " crown and dignity."

On the twenty firſt of February 1702, his majeſty riding from Kenſington to Hampton-Court, his horſe fell under him, and he was thrown with ſuch violence as produced a fracture in his collar-bone; ſoon after which he was ſeized with a violent fever and diarrhæa, which terminated in his death on the eighth of March following. In conſequence of which the princeſs Anne, daughter to the late king James, ſucceeded to the crown with the univerſal joy and ſatisfaction of the nation.

The great ſucceſſes obtained over the French in the preceding campaign, occaſioned her majeſty to appoint the twelfth of November for a day of public thankſgiving; on which day her majeſty went in grand proceſſion to St. Paul's cathedral, whither ſhe was attended by both houſes of parliament; and the citizens exerted their utmoſt abilities to render that day more pompous and brilliant than had ever been done on any other caſion.

In the year 1703 there happened the moſt dreadful ſtorm of wind that perhaps ever was known. It began on the twenty-ſix of November about eleven o'clock at night, and increaſed with redoubled fury till ſeven next morning. The houſes were entirely ſtripped of their covering, and the brick walls and ſtacks of chimnies fell with ſuch impetuoſity, that many people were killed, and others dreadfully mangled in the ruins. It deſtroyed a great number of ſpires and turrets; and upon churches and other public buildings ſheets of lead were rolled up like ſcrolls, and blown from their places to the diſtance of many feet. The damage at ſea far exceeded that at land; for, in that dreadful night, twelve men of war were loſt, with above eighteen hundred men on board; beſides the loſs of a great number of merchant ſhips computed at ten times the value. All the ſhips in the river Thames were drove from London-bridge to Limehouſe, except four, which were ſo damaged by beating againſt each other, as to be entirely unfit for any future ſervice. The great deſtruction made in the tiles of houſes, occaſioned that commodity to riſe from one guinea to ſix pounds the thouſand.

In the year 1704 her majeſty was pleaſed to order, that all the ſtandards and colours taken by the Britiſh troops at the battle of Blenheim ſhould be put up in Weſtminſter-hall. Agreeable to which order they were, on the third of January, brought from the Tower of London by a detachment of the horſe-guard and grenadiers, and a battalion of the foot-guards, who marched through the city in military order.

This year the common-council paſſed an act for better regulating the city watch; by which all former acts concerning the regulation of the night-watches within the city of London, and liberties thereof, were repealed, annulled, and made void. In this act they ordained, that each ward ſhould provide a number of ſtrong able-bodied men; and that the deputy and common-council of every ward ſhould have power to oblige every perſon occupying any houſe, ſhop, or warehouſe, either to watch in perſon, or to pay for an able-bodied man, to be appointed thereto by the ſaid deputy and common-council-men: that the ſaid watchmen be provided with a lanthorn and candle, and well and ſufficiently armed with halberts; and watch from nine in the evening till ſeven in the morning, from Michaelmas to the firſt of April, and from ten till five from the firſt of April to Michaelmas.

In the year 1707 many dreadful fires having happened in the city of London, and its ſuburbs, principally occaſioned by the careleſsneſs of ſervants, the parliament paſſed an act for preventing ſuch fatal accidents for the future; and the Lord-mayor and common-council, for the more effectual publication thereof, cauſed the following reſolution to be printed and ſent to every houſe within the city of London, and liberties thereof:

" Whereas

" Whereas divers fires often happen by the " negligence and careleſſneſs of ſervants; be it " therefore enacted, that if any menial, or other " ſervant, or ſervants, through negligence, or " careleſſneſs, ſhall fire, or cauſe to be fired, any " dwelling-houſe, or out-houſe, or houſes; ſuch " ſervant or ſervants, being thereof lawfully con- " victed, by the oath of one or more credible " witneſſes, made before two or more of her " majeſty's juſtices of peace, ſhall forfeit and pay " the ſum of one hundred pounds, unto the " church-wardens of ſuch pariſh where the fire " ſhall happen, to be diſtributed amongſt the " ſufferers by ſuch fire, in ſuch proportions as to " the ſaid church-wardens ſhall ſeem juſt. And " in caſe of default, or refuſal to pay the ſame " immediately after ſuch conviction, the ſame be- " ing lawfully demanded by the ſaid church-war- " dens, that then and in ſuch caſe, ſuch ſervant " or ſervants ſhall, by warrant under the hands " of two or more of her majeſty's juſtices of the " peace, be committed to the houſe of correc- " tion, there to be kept to hard labour for the " ſpace of eighteen months." At the ſame time it was enacted by parliament, " That the church- " wardens of each pariſh within the bills of mor- " tality, ſhould be empowered, at the charge of " their reſpective pariſhes, to fix upon the ſeve- " ral main water pipes in the ſtreets, ſtop blocks, " or fire-cocks; and alſo to provide a large and " hand engine, with a leathern pipe and ſocket to " ſcrew upon the fire cock. And, for the fu- " ture, all party-walls (except the houſes on " London-bridge) ſhould be entirely of brick or " ſtone."

About the middle of Auguſt this year, there fell ſuch a prodigious quantity of flies in London, that many of the ſtreets were ſo covered with them, that the people's feet made as full an impreſſion on them as upon thick ſnow; and notwithſtanding many hundred buſhels were ſwept into the kennels, yet no diſtemper enſued.

In the year 1708 there arrived in England near twelve thouſand diſtreſſed proteſtants of the Palatinate in Germany, who had been ſtripped of all the conveniences of life by the French armies that invaded and plundered their country. Theſe unhappy people were at firſt aſſiſted by the benevolence of her majeſty, then by the private charity of the nobility, and at laſt from a collection on a brief iſſued for that purpoſe to all parts of the kingdom, amounting to twenty-two thouſand and thirty-eight pounds. With this relief, above three thouſand were ſent to Ireland; ſix hundred to each of the provinces of North and South Carolina; and three thouſand five hundred to that of New York; where, by their induſtry, they cultivated ſuch large tracts of unimproved land, as afterwards became very beneficial to this nation.

This year the fiery zeal of contending parties broke out into a moſt violent flame at the proſecution of doctor Henry Sacheveral, chaplain of St. Saviour's Southwark, before the houſe of lords, on an impeachment of high crimes and miſdemeanors by the commons for preaching two ſermons. The populace were perſuaded by the to- ries that inſtead of the doctor's ruin, that of the church was intended; and believing the ſame to be a contrivance of the preſbyterians, breathed deſtruction to them and all other diſſenters. Thus ſpirited up, they ran like as many enraged furies to the meeting-houſe of Mr. Burgeſs, a preſbyterian miniſter, in New-court, Little Lincoln's-inn-fields, which they inſtantly breaking open, ſtripped it of its doors, caſements, ſconces, wainſcot, pews and pulpit, which they carried into Lincoln's-inn-fields; and while they were erecting the ſame into a pile, a party was ſent to ſurprize Burgeſs at his houſe, in order to have burnt him in his pulpit on the top of the ſame: but he luckily, however, avoided their fury by eſcaping out at a back window. After this they divided into different parties, and deſtroyed the meeting-houſes in St. John's-ſquare, New-ſtreet, Drury-lane, and Leather-lane. But before next morning this dangerous tumult was ſuppreſſed by her majeſty's guards ſent for that purpoſe. The trained bands continually kept on duty during the trial of the doctor, who at laſt was condemned not to preach for three years, and his two ſermons to be burnt at the Royal-Exchange by the common hangman.

In the year 1710, the number of houſes and inhabitants being greatly increaſed in the city of London, and its ſuburbs, the churches were thereby rendered inſufficient for their accommodation: wherefore the parliament enacted, that fifty new churches ſhould be erected in or near the populous cities of London and Weſtminſter or ſuburbs thereof; for which purpoſe they appropriated two ſhillings per chaldron, or ton of coals, that ſhould be brought into the port of London.

This being the year in which the ſtately building of St. Paul's Cathedral was finiſhed, after the fire of London, it may not be improper, in this place, to inſert an account of it.

Deſcription of St. PAUL'S.

After the deſtruction of the old fabrick a reſolution being taken to build a new cathedral, Sir Chriſtopher Wren was ordered to prepare a deſign, and cauſe a model thereof to be made as a rule and direction for the whole work. And in order to raiſe a fund ſufficient for carrying the work into execution, the chamber of London was made an office for the receipt of contributions to defray the expence; into which in ten years only, was paid the ſum of one hundred and twenty-ſix thouſand pounds, king Charles II. generouſly giving a thouſand pounds a year out of his privy-purſe, beſides a new duty on coals which produced five thouſand pounds a year, over and above all other grants in its favour.

Among the various deſigns projected by Sir Chriſtopher was that of the preſent mighty ſtructure, which being made choice of by the biſhops, he immediately ſet to work; but, unluckily, in digging its foundation, when he wanted but ſix or ſeven feet to compleat his deſign, fell upon a pit, where the potters of old time had taken their pot earth from, and filled up the hole with broken fragments of urns, vaſes, and ſuch like rubbiſh.

rubbiſh. This obliged him to dig through the ſand, to the depth of forty feet at leaſt, to the ſolid earth: he therefore ſunk a pit eighteen feet wide, through all the ſtrata, and laid the foundation of a ſquare pier of ſolid maſonry upon the hard ſea-beach that covered the original clay, which he raiſed within fifteen feet of the preſent ſurface, and then turned a ſhort arch under ground to the level of the ſtratum of the hard pot-earth; upon which arch the north eaſt coin of the choir of St. Paul's now ſtands.

All neceſſary preparations being now made, and many difficulties ſurmounted, in pulling down, clearing away, &c. Sir Chriſtopher Wren laid the firſt ſtone on the twenty-firſt day of June, 1675, in the reign of Charles II.

The foundations being laid, portland ſtone was made choice of to complete the ſuperſtructure, as thoſe from thence were of the largeſt ſcantlings; yet theſe could not be preſumed upon for columns exceeding four feet in diameter: this determined Sir Chriſtopher to make choice of two orders, inſtead of one and an attic ſtory, as St. Peter's at Rome, in order to preſerve the juſt proportions of his cornice, otherwiſe the fabric would have fallen ſhort of its intended height. On theſe principles therefore he proceeded, and raiſed the lofty edifice we now ſee.

The lower diviſion of the building is adorned with a range of double pilaſters, with their entablatures of the Corinthian order; and as many of the Compoſite, or Roman order, ornament the upper.

The ſpaces between the arches of the windows, and the architrave of the lower order, are filled with great variety of curious enrichments; as are thoſe likewiſe above.

On the weſt front is erected a moſt magnificent portico, graced with two ſtately turrets and a pediment, enriched with ſculpture.

The columns of this portico are doubled; two columns are brought nearer together to make greater intercolumns alternately, and to give a proper ſpace to three doors; the two ſide doors for daily uſe, and the middle for ſolemnities: the columns are widened to make a free and commodious paſſage to each, which is gracefully done by placing the pillars alternately wide and cloſe.

The entrance to the north and ſouth is likewiſe by two magnificent porticos.

The eaſt end is beautified by a noble piece of carving, in honour of king William III.

Over all is a dome, terminated by a lantern, ball, and croſs.

The pilaſters of the outſide are doubled, which ſerve as buttreſſes, and give ſpace to large windows between; they alſo adjuſt the arcades within and regulate the roof.

This cathedral is built in form of a croſs. The dimenſions from eaſt to weſt, within the walls, are five hundred feet; from north to ſouth, within the doors of the porticos, two hundred and twenty-three feet; the breadth, at the entrance, one hundred feet; its circuit, two thouſand two hundred and ninety-two feet; its height, within, one hundred and ten feet feet; to the upper gallery, two hundred and ſixty-ſix feet; to the top of the croſs, ſixty-four feet; from the level of the ground to the top, four hundred and forty feet; the diameter of the dome is one hundred and eight feet, of the ball, ſix feet; the diameter of the columns of the porticos, four feet; their height, forty-eight feet. To the top of the weſt pediment, under the figure of St. Paul, is one hundred and twenty feet. The height of the towers, at the weſt front, is two hundred and eighty feet. The length of the minute-hand, on the dial, eight feet; of the hour-hand, five feet five inches; of the hour-figures, two feet ſeven inches.

The whole cathedral ſtands on two acres, ſixteen perches, twenty-three yards, and one foot of ground.

This vaſt fabric is ſurrounded with about two thouſand five hundred ſtrong iron palliſadoes, and in the area of the grand weſt front, on a pedeſtal, ſtands a ſtatue of queen Anne: the figures on the baſe repreſent Britannia, with her ſpear; Gallia with a crown on her lap; Hibernia, with her harp; and America, with her bow: the workmanſhip of the ingenious Mr. Hill, who was chiefly employed in all the decorations. By this gentleman were performed thoſe fine ſtatues and carvings that add ſuch ſpirit and beauty to the whole: the lively repreſentation of St. Paul's converſion, carved in relief on the pediment of the principal front: the majeſtic figure of St. Paul, on the apex of the pediment, with St. Peter on his right, and St. James on his left; the four evangeliſts, with their proper emblems, on the front of the towers. St. Matthew is diſtinguiſhed by an angel, St. Mark by a lion, St. Luke by an ox, and St. John by an eagle. On the pediment, over the north portico, the royal arms with the regalia, ſupported by angels, with the ſtatues of five of the apoſtles. On the pediment over the ſouth portico, a phœnix riſing out of the flames, with the word RESURGAM underneath it: This device, perhaps, had its origin from the following incident: Sir Chriſtopher having fixed upon the place for the center of the great dome, a labourer was ordered to bring him a flat ſtone from among the rubbiſh, to leave as a mark of direction to the maſons; the firſt the fellow came at happened to be a grave ſtone, with nothing remaining of the inſcription but the word RESURGAM: which was remarked by the architect as a favourable omen. On this ſide of the building are five ſtatues, which take their ſituation from that of St. Andrew on the apex of the pediment juſt mentioned.

The higheſt or laſt ſtone, on the top of the lantern, was laid by Chriſtopher Wren, the ſurveyor's ſon, in the reign of queen Anne, 1710, in the preſence of Mr. Strong, the principal maſon, and others chiefly employed in the execution of the work.

Thus in thirty-five years was this mighty fabrick, lofty enough to be ſeen at ſea eaſtward and at Windſor weſtward, begun and finiſhed by one architect, one principal maſon, and under one biſhop of London, Dr. Henry Compton.

Within this cathedral are three iſles. The vault is hemiſpherical, conſiſting of twenty-four cupolas, cut off ſemicircular, with ſegments to join to the great arches one way, and the other way way they are cut acroſs with eliptical cylinders, to let in the upper lights of the nave; but in the iſles the leſſer cupolas are cut both ways in ſemi-circular ſections, and altogether make a graceful geometrical form, diſtinguiſhed with circular wreaths, which is the horizontal ſection of the cupola: the arches and wreaths are of ſtone, carved; the ſpandrels between are of found brick, inveſted with ſtucco of cockle-ſhell lime, which becomes as hard as Portland-ſtone; and which, having large planes between the ſtone ribs, are capable of further ornaments of painting, if required. Beſides theſe twenty-four cupolas, there is a half-cupola at the eaſt, and the great cupola of one hundred and eight feet diameter, in the middle of the croſſing of the great iſles; it is extant out of the wall, and is very lightſome by the windows of the upper order, which ſtrike down the light thro' the great colonade that encircles the dome without, and ſerves for the butment of the dome, which is brick, of two bricks thick; but as it riſes every way five feet high, has a courſe of excellent brick of eighteen inches long bending through the whole thickneſs; and to make it ſtill more ſecure, it is ſurrounded with a vaſt chain of iron, ſtrongly linked together at every ten feet: this chain is let into a channel cut into the bandage of Portland-ſtone, and defended from the weather by filling the groove with lead. Over the firſt cupola is raiſed another ſtructure of a cone of bricks, ſo built as to ſupport a ſtone lantern of an elegant figure, and ending in ornaments of copper, gilt: the whole church above the vaulting being covered with a ſubſtantial oaken roof and lead, ſo this cone is covered and hid out of ſight by another cupola of timber and lead; between which and the cone are eaſy ſtairs which aſcend to the lantern: the contrivance here is aſtoniſhing. The light to theſe ſtairs is from the lantern above, and round the pedeſtal of the ſame.

The inſide of the cupola is painted and richly decorated, by that eminent Engliſh artiſt Sir James Thornhill, who in eight compartments has repreſented the principal paſſages in the hiſtory of St. Paul's life; namely, his converſion; his puniſhing Elymas the ſorcerer with blindneſs; his preaching at Athens; his curing the poor cripple at Lyſtra, and the reverence there paid him by the prieſts of Jupiter as a god; his converſion of the goaler; his preaching at Epheſus, and the burning the magic books in conſequence of the miracles he there wrought; his trial before Agrippa; his ſhipwreck on the iſland of Melita, or Malta; and his miracle of the viper.

Beſides the choir, the ſtalls of which are very beautifully carved, and the other ornaments of equal workmanſhip, there is a morning-prayer chapel, where divine ſervice is performed every day, Sundays excepted; and oppoſite it, the conſiſtory, each of which has a magnificent ſcreen of carved wainſcot, and has been greatly admired by the curious, as has the carving of the ſtately figures that adorn the organ-caſe.

In the center of the croſs-iſle, where is fixed a braſs plate, you have a full view of the cupola or dome, and of the whiſpering gallery.

The choir, the iſles on each ſide of it, and the organ, are incloſed with beautiful iron rails and gates.

The organ gallery is ſupported with Corinthian columns of blue and white marble. The choir has on each ſide thirty ſtalls, beſides the biſhop's throne on the ſouth ſide, and on the north, the Lord-mayor's. The reader's deſk is incloſed with very fine braſs rails, gilt, in which is a gilt braſs pillar, ſupporting an eagle of braſs gilt, which holds the book on its back and expanded wings. The alter-piece is adorned with four noble fluted pilaſters, painted and veined with gold, in imitation of lapis lazuli; and their capitals are double gilt. In the intercolumniations are twenty-one pannels of figured crimſon velvet.

All the floor of the church and choir to the altar rails is paved with marble; the altar is paved with porphyry, poliſhed, and laid in ſeveral geometrical figures.

This grand cathedral, thus finiſhed, is undoubtedly one of the moſt magnificent modern buildings in Europe; and we will venture to conclude, that for loftineſs and grandeur, beauty in perſpective, truth and firmneſs in building, taſte in deſign, harmony of parts, and convenience for the ſolemn celebration of divine worſhip, there neither is, nor ever was, ſo perfect a building, begun and finiſhed under the ſole direction, of one man, in the univerſe.

The colours hanging in the cathedral, over the weſtern entrance, were taken from the French at Louiſbourg in 1758. They conſiſt of an artillery-ſtandard, white and gold; one pair of Spaniſh ragged ſtaves; one pair of Swiſs enſign-colours, green and white; two pair of enſign colours blue and white; and two ſtaves without colours.

As you enter at the ſouth door, on your left hand are the ſtairs by which you aſcend the cupola, which lead to the golden gallery by five hundred and thirty-four ſteps, two hundred and ſixty of which are ſo eaſy that a child may aſcend them; but thoſe above are unpleaſant, and in ſome places exceeding dark, particularly between the brick cone and the outer caſe of the dome; but what light you have affords you an amazing proof of the architect's wonderful contrivance. From this gallery you have a fine proſpect of the river, city, and country round, which in a clear day diſcovers a pleaſing variety.

From the whiſpering gallery you have the moſt advanteous view of the fine paintings in the cupola; there is an eaſy aſcent to this gallery for perſons of note, by a moſt beautiful flight of ſtairs, not to be exceeded: here ſounds are enlarged to an amazing degree; the ſhutting of the door ſeems as loud as thunder at a diſtance; the leaſt whiſper is heard round the whole circumference, even the ticking of a watch; and one perſon ſpeaking againſt the wall, on this ſide, appears to be preſent to another on the other ſide, though the diſtance between them is no leſs than one hundred and forty-three feet.

The flooring of the library is moſt artfully inlaid without either nails or pegs, like the framing of a billiard-table; the books are neither numerous nor valuable; but the wainſcoting and caſes for their reception, want neither elegance nor convenience. There is here a fine painting of biſhop Compton, under whom the cathedral was built.

It is a miſtaken notion of many people that the model which is in the cathedral was taken from St. Peter's at Rome; for it was undoubtedly Sir Chriſtopher's own invention, laboured with much ſtudy, and, as he thought, finiſhed with good ſucceſs. This deſign, which is of the Corinthian order, like St. Peter's at Rome, the ſurveyor ſet a higher value upon than any he drew; but it was not approved of by the biſhops.

In the ſouth tower is the great bell, which weighs eighty-four hundred weight. On this bell the hammer of the great clock ſtrikes the hour; and on the leſſer bell the quarters are ſtruck.

The geometry ſtairs are compoſed of ſteps which are artfully contrived to hang, as it were, together without any viſible ſupport.

The whole expence of erecting this ſuperb edifice amounted to the ſum of ſeven hundred and thirty ſix thouſand, ſeven hundred and fifty-two pounds two ſhillings and three-pence, the principal part of which was collected by a ſmall and eaſy impoſition on ſea-coal.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Her majeſty's letter to the Lord-mayor on a rumour about bringing in the pretender. Thankſgiving for the peace Death of Queen Anne. Acceſſion of George I. with his public entry into London. Dines at Guildhall. Remarkable eclipſe of the ſun. Advice of an intended invaſion. Seditions tumults in the city occaſioned by the mug-houſes. Act of common-council for lighting the city. War declared againſt Spain. South-ſea ſcheme. Prodigious price of ſtocks. Birth of the duke of Cumberland. Secretary Townſhend's letter to the Lord-mayor concerning a conſpiracy. The city's addreſs thereon. Number of horſes within the bill of mortality. Conteſted election of Lord-mayor. Act for regulating elections.

THE city of London having been greatly injured by a number of foreigners who exerciſed ſeveral manual operations and trades by retail, in contradiction to the laws and cuſtoms of the city, the common-council, on the fourth of July, enacted, "that no perſon whatever, not being free of the city, ſhall by any colour, way, or means whatſoever, directly or indirectly, by himſelf, or any other, uſe, exerciſe, or occupy, any art, trade, myſtery, manual occupation, or handicraft whatſoever, or keep any ſhop, room or place whatſoever, by way of retail, within the ſaid city, or the liberties thereof, upon pain of forfeiting five pounds. And that what freeman ſoever does ſet any perſon that is not free on work, knowing and having notice given to him that ſuch perſon ſo by him to be ſet to work, is a foreigner, ſhall forfeit five pounds. And that the freeman, who employs a foreigner to ſell by retail, ſhall alſo forfeit for each offence the ſum of five pounds."

In the year 1712, a rumour being ſpread that the miniſtry were paving the way for the pretender's acceſſion to the crown, the trading part of the city were ſo intimidated thereat, that it put a general ſtop to all commerce. In this critical juncture her majeſty thought it neceſſary, for the ſupport of credit, and to prevent the Londoners entering into any aſſociations or meaſures that might reſtrain the miniſterial ſchemes being carried into execution, to ſend the following letter to the Lord-mayor.

"Right truſty and well-beloved, we greet "you well."

"Although an aguiſh indiſpoſition, ſucceeded "by a fit of the gout, has detained us at this "place longer than we deſigned; yet, ſince it has "pleaſed Almighty God to reſtore us to ſuch a "degree of health, that we hope to be able "ſoon to return to our uſual reſidence, we con-"tinue determined to open our parliament on "Tueſday the ſixteenth of this inſtant February, "according to the notice given by proclama-"tion.

"Thus much we have judged proper to com-"municate to you, and by you to the court of "Aldermen, and to our other loving ſubjects "of our good city of London; to the intent "that you may all in your ſeveral ſtations con-"tribute to diſcountenance, and put a ſtop to "thoſe malicious rumours, ſpread by evil diſ-"poſed perſons, to the prejudice of credit, and "the eminent hazard of the public peace and "tranquillity.

"And ſo we bid you farewell."

In the year 1713, a peace being concluded between Great-Britain and France, the ſame was proclaimed in London on the ſeventh of July; on which occaſion both houſes of parliament attended a general thankſgiving at St. Paul's, her majeſty being ill of the gout; and at night fireworks were exhibited on the Thames, and in various parts of the city and ſuburbs.

About this time the papiſts and non-jurors ſo far defended the pretender's claim to the crown as to enliſt men for his ſervice; which greatly alarming the citizens, her majeſty thought proper, to iſſue a proclamation, with a reward of five thouſand pounds, for apprehending the ſaid pretender.

This

This in ſome meaſure diſpelled the gloomy apprehenſions of the citizens, who, in a very loyal addreſs, thanked her majeſty for publiſhing the ſame.

Many irregularities and miſdemeanors having been charged on the office of coal-meters in this city, a committee was appointed to enquire into the ſame; who, on the ſixteenth of March, made their report to the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen. In which, after reciting various acts of common-council for the regulation thereof, they declare as follows: "We are therefore of opinion, "that the ſaid ancient order and method of the "coal-office ought to be obſerved and kept, and "that it is incumbent on the alderman of Bil-"lingſgate ward to ſee the ſame performed. "And that as well the maſter meters, as the ſaid "under-meters, are liable to be puniſhed, by "ſuſpenſion, removal, or otherwiſe, as this court "ſhall think fit. That the ſaid maſter meters "have no right to employ what deputies, or un-"der-meters, they pleaſe; but that it is the "right of the Lord-mayor and aldermen to allow "of the deputies or under-meters, and that no "other ought to be employed but ſuch as they "allow. That the ſaid deputies, or under-me-"ters, ought not to be diſplaced, but upon a "reaſonable cauſe, and that upon application to "the Lord-mayor and aldermen for that purpoſe: "but the alderman of the ſaid ward may ſuſpend "an under-meter, till the pleaſure of this court "is known therein. That the books of the coal-"office do concern the right of the inheritance "of this city, and ought to be uſed and inſpect-"ed by this court, as they ſhall find occaſion, "&c. That no under-meter ought to begin to "work in coal, before a Cocket of Permit has "been iſſued from the Lord-mayor's office, &c." Which report being read, it was approved of by the ſaid court, and ordered to be entered in the repertory. And it was thereupon ordered, "that "the ſaid maſter-meters do obſerve the ancient "method and uſage of ſhipping their under-me-"ters, according to their ſeniority. And that "the under-meters do not take their fellow's la-"bour out of their turns, upon pain of being "ſuſpended from their labours for ſo doing, by "the alderman or deputy of Billingſgate-ward."

In the year 1714, her majeſty being ſeized with a lethargic diſorder, languiſhed only three days, and died on the firſt of Auguſt, in the fiftieth year of her age.

On the death of queen Anne, George Lewis, elector of Hanover, was proclaimed the ſame day king of Great-Britain, &c. in the city of London with the uſual ſolemnities on that occaſion. Soon after which his majeſty arriving in England, made his public entry on the twentieth of September, acompanied by his ſon prince George. His majeſty was received at St. Margaret's-hill by the Lord-mayor and aldermen; and the recorder, in the name of the city, made a congratulatory ſpeech on his majeſty's happy arrival; after which he was conducted in the moſt ſuperb and pompous manner to St. James's, where he arrived about eight o'clock in the evening. And the city and lieutenancy ſoon after addreſſing his majeſty in form at St. James's, he was pleaſed to return this moſt gracious anſwer: "I take theſe addreſſes very kindly. I have lately been made ſenſible of what conſequence the city of London is, and therefore ſhall be ſure to take all their privileges and intereſts into my particular protection."

His majeſty having received an invitation from the city to dine at Guildhall on the approaching Lord-mayor's-day, He was graciouſſly pleaſed to accept of the ſame; at which time his majeſty, and their royal highneſſes the prince and princeſs of Wales, attended by a numerous train of nobility, went to the uſual place of ſtanding, oppoſite Bow-church, in Cheapſide; and after having beheld the pompous cavalcade, they were conducted by the ſheriffs to Guildhall, where they were ſumptuouſly entertained by the citizens, who exerted the utmoſt of their abilities to convince them of their loyalty and affection for his majeſty's perſon and government. And the Lord-mayor having the honour to preſent the firſt glaſs of wine to the king, his majeſty was pleaſed to order a patent to be paſſed for creating his lordſhip a baronet of this kingdom; and at the ſame time ordered one thouſand pounds to be paid to the ſheriffs for the relief and diſcharge of poor people impriſoned for debt.

About this time the citizens, to ſhew their abhorrence of the proceedings of the late miniſtry with reſpect to the peace concluded with France, and their warm attachment for the houſe of Hanover, drew up the following ſpirited inſtructions to their new-choſen members:

"We, the citizens of London, who have "chearfully elected you to ſerve us in parliament, "and thereby committed to your truſt the ſafety, "liberty, property, and privileges of us, and "our poſterity, think it our duty, as it is our "undoubted right, to acquaint you what we de-"ſire and expect from you, in diſcharge of the "great confidence we repoſe in you, and what "we take to be your duty as our repreſenta-"tives."

1. We deſire and expect, that you will enquire by whoſe council it was, that after God had bleſſed the arms of her late majeſty and her allies, with a train of unparallelled ſucceſſes, ſhe was prevailed upon, contrary to the grand alliance, and her repeated promiſes from the throne to both houſes, to ſend or receive managers from France to treat ſeparately of a peace, without the knowledge and conſent of our allies.

2. By whoſe advice the emperor's miniſter, the count de Gallas, was diſcharged the court, for reſenting and oppoſing thoſe ſeparate negociations, contrary not only to the grand alliance, but to the queen's particular aſſurances to his maſter.

3. By whoſe advice his majeſty's memorial, delivered by his miniſter, the baron de Bothmar, againſt thoſe clandeſtine ſeparate negociations, was not only diſregarded, but called a libel, and the ſaid miniſter affronted.

4. By whoſe advice and management her majeſty was prevailed upon, firſt, to come to a ceſſation of arms with our common enemy, and then ſo ſurprizingly to withdraw our troops from thoſe

of the allies, which was attended with ſuch diſmal circumſtances.

5. By whoſe advice and management, all that had been gained by a profuſion of blood and treaſure, in a glorious and ſucceſsful war, was thrown up, juſt as we were ſeizing the prize of our conqueſt; and a free-born people were brought within a view of ſlavery.

6. By whoſe advice and management our conſtitution was ſtruck at by creating twelve new lords at once, to carry a vote in the upper-houſe.

7. By whoſe advice it was, that the treaty with the Dutch, for ſettling a commmon barrier in the Netherlands, and making guarantees of the proteſtant ſucceſſion, was enervated, and a new treaty, which weakened both ſecurities, made in its place.

8. By whoſe advice and management we were mocked with the aſſurances of being free from the danger of the neighbouring fortreſs of Dunkirk: and whether the late miniſtry, or any of them, did agree that the French king ſhould make a new harbour at Mardyke, as part of the equivalent for demoliſhing the fortifications and harbour of Dunkirk.

9. By whoſe advice and management the beſt branches of our trade were exchanged for chimeras, and the ruin of the whole endangered, by a vile treaty of commerce with France.

10. How the expedition of Canada came to miſcarry: and by whoſe advice her majeſty, contrary to her proclamations, publiſhed in New-England, &c. for encouraging the expedition, came to allow the French to keep their intereſt in Canada, to ſell that in Newfoundland, and to ſettle on Cape-Breton, to the great detriment of our fiſhing trade, and to the manifeſt danger of all our plantations in North America.

11. By whoſe advice it was, that the confederates were refuſed to be invited to be guarantees of the proteſtant ſucceſſion, though her majeſty had promiſed it in her anſwer to the addreſs of both houſes in 1708.

12. By whoſe advice it was, that his now royal highneſs, George, prince of Wales, was denied the liberty to come and take his place in parliament, when the preſence of one of the illuſtrious family of Hanover was ſo abſolutely neceſſary to quiet the minds of the ſubjects, and to ſecure us from the juſt apprehenſions we had of danger from the pretender.

13. By whoſe advice it was that his majeſty's miniſter, baron Schutz, was diſcharged the court, becauſe he demanded a writ for the prince.

14. By whoſe advice was Sir Patrick Lawleſs, the pretender's agent or envoy, entertained at court, at the ſame time; and honourably conveyed beyond ſea ſoon after it was complained of in parliament.

15. By whoſe advice and management our holy church was in danger of being given up to popery, our civil rights to tyranny, and the way prepared for the pretender.

16. By whoſe advice it was that the jacobite clans in Scotland were armed and kept in pay, and the levies of men for the pretender in Great-Britain and Ireland, were ſo long connived at.

17. By whoſe management it was, that the public affairs of the kingdom are brought under the greateſt difficulties, as well in reſpect to our trade, and the interruption of our navigation, as of the great debts of the nation, which have been very much increaſed ſince the laſt war, as his majeſty has been graciouſly pleaſed to inform us, in his proclamation for calling a new parliament.

18. We alſo deſire and expect, that you concur in demanding an account how the money raiſed by parliament, has been expended ſince the change of the miniſtry, in 1710.

19. That you not only concur in ſuch enquiries, but alſo, in a parliamentary way, to bring ſuch to juſtice, as ſhall be found guilty of thoſe miſmanagements; this being a duty owing to ourſelves, as well as our confederates, and indiſpenſably neceſſary for retrieving the honour of the nation, and reſtoring a due confidence and harmony betwixt us and our allies.

20. That you concur in making ſuch laws as ſhall be thought neceſſary for the better ſecurity of the churches of England and Scotland, as ſeverally by the laws eſtabliſhed, and for ſuppreſſing and preventing thoſe ſeditious and groundleſs clamours of the church of England being in danger by his majeſty's adminiſtration.

21. That you concur in giving the king ſuch ſums as ſhall be thought neceſſary for enabling his majeſty to defend the nation, to ſupport and retrieve trade, and to keep the balance of Europe, which is threatened with a new war, by the intrigues of our common enemies.

On the twenty-ſecond of April 1715, there happened the greateſt eclipſe of the ſun that was, perhaps, ever ſeen either in this or any other kingdom. It begun ſix minutes and twenty-eight ſeconds after eight in the morning, and ended twenty minutes and fifteen ſeconds after ten. The ſun, for three minutes and twenty-three ſeconds, was ſo totally darkened, that the moon and ſtars appeared as clear as the brighteſt evening; and the dumb creation were ſo confuſed, that they precipitately retired to their reſpective holes, neſts, and receptacles.

His majeſty having informed the parliament of his receiving certain advices from abroad of an intended invaſion in favour of the pretender, the merchants and citizens of London addreſſed his majeſty on this occaſion with the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of their loyalty and ſupport in defence of his royal perſon and government.

This threatened invaſion, however, ſoon after turned out an open rebellion, which was fomented and brought about in Scotland by the earl of Mar, * who, on the third of September, had a meeting

* This nobleman, at the death of queen Anne, was ſecretary for Scotland, and was one of the firſt who made profeſſion of loyalty and attachment to king George I. but not meeting with the encouragement he expected, he retired in diſguſt to his own country, where, prompted by reſentment and ambition, he reſolved to make an effort in favour of the pretender.

meeting at Aboyne in Scotland, with ſeveral of the nobility and gentry of that kingdom, where they reſolved to draw together immediately what number of men they could, and to advance towards the South. Accordingly the earl of Mar cauſed the pretender's ſtandard to be ſet up the ſixth of that month, and in the orders for ſo doing, ſtiled himſelf lieutenant-general of the king's forces in Scotland. And on the ninth he publiſhed the following declaration:

" Our rightful and natural king James VIIIth, " who, by the grace of God, is now coming to " relieve us from our oppreſſions, having been " pleaſed to intruſt us with the direction of his " affairs, and the command of his forces in this " his ancient kingdom of Scotland. And ſome " of his faithful ſubjects and ſervants met at " Aboyne, viz. the lord Huntley, the lord Tul- " libardine, the earl mareſchal, the earl of South- " eſk, Glingary from the clans, Glenderule from " the earl of Broadalbine, and gentlemen of Ar- " gyleſhire, Mr. Patrick Lyon of Auchterhouſe, " the laird of Auldbair, lieutenant-general George " Hamilton, major-general Gordon, and myſelf, " having taken into our conſideration his majeſ- " ty's laſt and late orders to us, find, that as this " is now the time that he ordered us to appear " openly in arms for him; ſo it ſeems to us ab- " ſolutely neceſſary for his majeſty's ſervice, and " the relieving of our native country from all its " hardſhips, that all his faithful and loving ſub- " jects, and lovers of their country, ſhould, with " all poſſible ſpeed, put themſelves into arms.

" Theſe are, therefore, in his majeſty's name " and authority, and by virtue of the power " aforeſaid, and by the king's ſpecial order to me " thereunto, to require and impower you forth- " with to raiſe your fencible men, with their beſt " arms; and you are immediately to march them " to join me and ſome other of the king's forces " at the Invor of Braemar, on Monday next, in " order to proceed in our march, to attend the " king's ſtandard, with his other forces.

" The king intending that his forces ſhould be " paid from the time of their ſetting out, he ex- " pects, as he poſitively orders, that they be- " have themſelves civilly, and commit no plun- " dering, nor other diſorders, upon the higheſt " penalties, and his diſpleaſure, which is expect- " ed you will ſee obſerved.

" Now is the time for all good men to ſhew " their zeal for his majeſty's ſervice, whoſe cauſe " is ſo deeply concerned, and the relief of our " native country from oppreſſion, and a foreign " yoke, too heavy for us and our poſterity to " bear; and to endeavour the reſtoring, not " only of our rightful and native king, but alſo " our country to its ancient, free, and indepen- " dent conſtitution, under him, whoſe anceſtors " have reigned over us for ſo many generations.

" In ſo honourable, good, and juſt a cauſe, " we cannot doubt of the aſſiſtance, direction, " and bleſſing of almighty God, who has ſo often " reſcued the royal family of Stuart, and our " country from ſinking under oppreſſion.

" Your punctual obſervance of theſe orders is " expected: for the doing of all which, this ſhall " be to you, and all you employ in the execu- " tion of them, a ſufficient warrant.

" Given at Braemar, the ninth of September, " 1715.

MAR."

This year a very ſevere froſt began about the end of November, and continued to the ninth of February. The river Thames was frozen over ſo hard, that booths were erected thereon for the ſale of all ſorts of merchandize; and on the nineteenth of January two large oxen were roaſted whole upon the ice.

In the month of December following, a great number of the nobility and gentry, taken in the rebellion at Preſton in Lancaſhire, were brought priſoners to London, and diſperſed in the various gaols of the city, ſeveral of whom were afterwards executed as traitors.

Notwithſtanding the rebellion in Scotland was now happily ſuppreſſed, yet the diſaffected part of the three kingdoms, having made the city of London their general rendezvous, became ſo daring and deſperate, as publickly to reflect on, and diſhonour the king in the ſtreets of the city (particularly on his majeſty's birth-day, his acceſſion to the crown, and coronation). This was ſo highly reſented by the friends of the government, that many of them formed themſelves into ſocieties to prevent the like practices for the future. They divided themſelves into different bodies, and aſſembled in various parts of the city at certain alehouſes, which, from the veſſels they generally uſed, were called Mug-houſes. At each of which were provided a great number of aſhen cudgels, like quarter-ſtaves, and each party, on advice of any tumultuous proceedings in the ſtreets, immediately ſallied forth, and, as beſt ſuited their particular intereſt, either diſperſed, or ſupported the mob. The populace were ſo enraged at this, that many thouſands of them aſſembled on the fourth of July, and attacked and rifled one of the ſaid houſes in Saliſbury-court; for which five of the rioters were apprehended, and afterwards hanged oppoſite the ſaid houſe. Which puniſhment, for the preſent, effectually ſtopped theſe tumultuous proceedings.

On the eighteenth of December, the common-council paſſed an act, in which, after having repealed, annulled, and made void, all the former acts concerning the lighting of the city of London, they enacted, " That all houſekeepers, " whoſe houſe door, or gateway, does front or " lie next unto any ſtreet, lane, or public paſ- " ſage or place of the ſaid city or liberties there- " of, ſhall, in every dark night, that is, every " night between the ſecond night after each full " moon, and the ſeventh night after each new " moon, ſet or hang out one or more lights, with " ſufficient cotton wicks, that ſhall continue to " burn from ſix o'clock at night till eleven " o'clock of the ſame night, on penalty of one " ſhilling. And that, under the like penalty, " the occupiers of houſes in any court, that " faces any public place or paſſage, ſhall alter- " nately hang or ſet out ſuch a light on the out- " ſide of ſuch doors or gates as ſhall be next the " ſaid public place or paſſage. Provided the " party offending is not charged to the poor, " and whoſe houſe ſhall not be of the rent of " ten pounds per annum. Penalties to be levied " by diſtreſs and ſale of the offender's goods, by " warrant from the mayor."

In the year 1717, one James Shepherd, apprentice to a coach-maker, a lad of eighteen years of age, of high jacobitical principles, ſent a letter to one Mr. Leathes, a non-juring clergyman, propoſing a ſcheme for aſſaſſinating the king. He was immediately apprehended and brought to trial. He ſaid he had imbibed theſe principles at the ſchool of Saliſbury, and had been confirmed in them by the writings of ſeveral of the non-juring clergy. He owned the deſign of which he was accuſed, declared he had harboured it for three years paſt, nor did he think there was any ſin in carrying it into execution. He was accordingly condemned on his own confeſſion, and hanged at Tyburn.

About the ſame time, the marquis of Palcotti, an Italian nobleman, brother to the dutcheſs of Shrewſbury, underwent the ſame fate, for having, in a tranſport of paſſion, killed his own ſervant. After ſentence of death had paſſed on him, ſtrong applications were made to the king for a pardon, as well by his ſiſter the dutcheſs, as by many other perſons of the firſt diſtinction; but the common people became ſo clamorous for juſtice, that it was thought dangerous to ſave him, and he therefore ſuffered the penalties of the law.

On the eighth of June, a fire broke out in the chambers of Mr. Bonithan, in Coney-court, Gray's-inn, whoſe father, ſerjeant Bonithan, a few years before had ſhot himſelf; and this gentleman, when his chambers were in flames, firſt ſtabbed himſelf, then leaped out of his window, and died ſoon after. Four chambers were burnt down, and two others very much damaged.

On the thirteenth of December, the ſtream of the river Thames was reduced ſo low, by a violent weſterly wind, that people walked dry-ſhod through moſt of the arches, and on both ſides London-bridge.

In the year 1718, the Lord-mayor and aldermen being apprehenſive of receiving trouble from ſome deſigning men, for their neglect to ſubſcribe the declaration againſt the ſolemn league and covenant at their admiſſion into office, addreſſed his majeſty, praying that he would be graciouſly pleaſed to give ſuch directions and orders therein, as ſhould effectually quiet the minds of his petitioners, &c. To which addreſs his majeſty was graciouſly pleaſed to return the following anſwer.

" I am fully perſuaded of your duty and af- " fection to me and my government; and I take " this application kindly, as it is a mark of " your truſt and confidence in me. I ſhall be " glad, not only for your ſakes but my own, if " any defects, which may touch the rights of my " good ſubjects, are diſcovered in my time; ſince " that will furniſh me with means of giving you, " and all my people, an indiſputable proof of " my tenderneſs for their privileges, and how " unwilling I ſhall be to take advantage of their " miſtakes."

On the ſeventeenth of December, war was declared againſt Spain in the uſual places, and with the accuſtomed ſolemnities, within the cities of London and Weſtminſter.

In the year 1719, complaint having been made to the houſe of lords, that great ſums of money had been iſſued out of the chamber of London to proſecute law-ſuits on controverted elections, the lords appointed a committee to examine into the affair, who found, that, ſince the thirteenth of November 1711, the city had paid for theſe purpoſes the ſum of two thouſand, eight hundred and twenty-ſeven pounds, ten ſhillings. And that not one of the ſaid ſuits was ever determined in favour of the proſecutors. The report being read by the clerk, the houſe came to the following reſolution:

" Reſolved, by the lords ſpiritual and tempo- " ral in parliament aſſembled, that it is the opi- " nion of this houſe, that the common-councils " of London, having iſſued great ſums of money " out of the chamber of London, in maintain- " ing ſeveral ſuits of law between citizen and " citizen, relating to controverted elections, have " abuſed their truſt, and been guilty of great " partiality, and of groſs miſmanagement of " the city treaſure, and a violation of the free- " dom of elections in the city."

On the ſeventh of January, a fire broke out in the houſe of Mr. Aſtel, a merchant, in Auſtin Friars, which did conſiderable damage; but the greateſt misfortune was, Mr. Aſtel's wife and daughter, and an infant at the breaſt, with its nurſe, were all burnt to death. And a ſervant maid, who, to eſcape the flames, leaped out of a two pair of ſtairs window, received ſo much hurt, that ſhe died in a few hours after.

In the year 1720, almoſt an entire ſtagnation was put to the trade of the city of London, by a ſcheme of the South-ſea company for paying off the debts of the nation; in which they offered one thouſand pounds per annum for every hundred pounds ſubſcribed. This golden ſcheme ſo deluded the citizens, that without conſidering from whence ſuch great advantages were to ariſe, they eagerly ſcraped up every ſum they could raiſe upon their eſtates, or borrow, to make, as they called it, an inſtantaneous fortune; nay, they even went ſo far as to give two hundred pounds per cent. premium upon that ſubſcription, and eleven hundred pounds per cent. for one hundred pounds ſtock, from which ſtock fell by degrees to eighty ſix; ſo that many thouſand families, eſpecially citizens of this great metropolis, were entirely ruined. Some retaliation, however, was afterwards made by the parliament, who paſſed an act, whereby the directors were compelled to forfeit their eſtates for the relief of thoſe whom they had utterly undone by their iniquitous proceedings.

The following is a compleat and exact ballance of the eſtates of the ſub-governor, deputy-governor, &c. of the South ſea company, as delivered vered upon oath to the barons of the exchequer, together with the allowances out of each, thought proper by the grand committee of the houſe of commons to be made to each perſon reſpectively.

This iniquitous ſcheme produced ſuch miſery to traders in general, that it became unfaſhionable not to be a bankrupt; and no age can parallel the great number of ſelf-murders committed about that time.

At firſt South-ſea ſtock ſold at 86l. and afterwards roſe to 1100l. which advance upon their original fund of ten millions, made their ſtock about one hundred and ten millions; which, with the riſe of their four ſubſcriptions, made the whole about two hundred and ninety-five millions.

This amazing ſum had ſuch an effect on other ſtocks, that Bank ſtock roſe from 100l. to 260l. India from 100l. to 405l. African from 100l. to 200l. York-buildings from 10l. to 305l. Luſtring from 5l. 2s. 6d. to 105l. Engliſh copper from 5l. to 105l. Welſh copper from 4l. 2s. 6d. to 95l. Royal Exchange aſſurance from 5l. 5s. to 250l. London aſſurance from 5l. to 175l.

William, duke of Cumberland, being born on the fifteenth of April, 1721, the Lord-mayor and aldermen attended his majeſty on the occaſion, when the recorder, in their name, congratulated the king in words to the following effect:

"May it pleaſe your majeſty,

"The Lord-mayor and court of aldermen of "the city of London moſt humbly intreat your "majeſty's permiſſion to congratulate your ma-"jeſty on the birth of the young prince. Theſe "your majeſty's faithful and dutiful ſubjects, be-"ing ſenſible of their felicity under the govern-"ment of a proteſtant king, having reaſon to be "thankful for the preſervation of their religion, "their laws, and liberties, and for the many "bleſſings they enjoy from your majeſty's mild "and gracious diſpoſition, cannot but rejoice at "this increaſe of your majeſty's royal progeny, "at this addition of ſtrength to the proteſtant "intereſt, and on this agreeable proſpect of the "continuance of happineſs to them and their "poſterity. They have great ſatisfaction in the "hopes, that this young prince will inherit the "bright and virtuous qualities of his anceſtors; "they beg leave to wiſh for his health and wel-"fare, and that your majeſty may live long, and "have the comfort to ſee him flouriſh and proſ-"per, and to ſee him prove an ornament to your "majeſty's moſt illuſtrious family, and a glory "and honour to the Britiſh nation."

To which his majeſty was pleaſed to return this moſt gracious anſwer:

"The zeal and affection you have upon all "occaſions ſhewn to my perſon and government, "leave me no room to doubt of your joy at this "happy increaſe of my family.

"I cannot omit taking this opportunity of aſ-"ſuring you, that I am truly concerned at the "calamity brought upon you by the wicked ma-"nagement of affairs in the South-ſea company. "I have, however, this comfort, that the reproach "of any part of this misfortune cannot, with "the leaſt juſtice, be imputed to me. Nothing "will give me more eaſe and ſatisfaction, than "the ſeeing you delivered from your preſent ſuf-"ferings, your trade revived, and public credit "re-eſtabliſhed."

About this time, the plague raging violently at Marſeilles in France, the parliament, fearful it ſhould approach this kingdom, paſſed an act for performing quarantine; wherein it was enacted, that every infected place ſhould be incloſed and ſhut up by a line or trench, in order to cut off all communication; and that all perſons endeavouring to eſcape from the ſaid infected place, without having regularly performed quarantine, ſhould ſuffer death as felons convict, without benefit of clergy.

The citizens of London apprehending that not only their rights and privileges, but likewiſe that the trade and proſperity of the city were greatly affected by this act; the Lord-mayor, aldermen, common-council, and merchants, petitioned the houſe of lords againſt three clauſes in the ſaid act, then under their lordſhips conſideration. After ſome debates, the queſtion being put that the ſaid petition be received, it paſſed in the negative by a majority of ſixty-three againſt twenty-two voices; when ſeventeen of the latter entered their proteſt for the following reaſons:

1. Becauſe the liberty of petitioning the king (much more that of petitioning either houſe of parliament) is the birth-right of the free people of this realm, claimed by them, and confirmed to them, ſoon after the revolution, in an act, declaring the rights and liberties of the ſubject, and and ſettling the ſucceſſion of the crown: and whenever any remarkable check hath been given to the free exerciſe of this right, it hath always been attended with ill conſequences to the public.

2. Becauſe, the petition ſo rejected, was, in our opinion, every way proper and unexceptionable, both as to the manner of wording and preſenting it, and the matter to which it referred; nothing being more natural and reaſonable than that any corporate body ſhould, if they deſire it, be heard upon any bill, under the conſideration of parliament, whereby they judge their particular intereſts to be highly though not ſolely affected. This liberty we remember to have been granted, in a late ſeſſion, to the traders of Norwich, upon their petition touching the callicoe bill; nor are we aware that it hath ever, in like circumſtances, been refuſed to the meaneſt corporation in the kingdom: but, if it had, we humbly conceive that, in this caſe, a diſtinction might have been made in favour of the city of London; which, being the center of credit, of the trade and monied intereſt of the kingdom, and the place where the plague, ſhould we be viſited by it, is moſt likely firſt to appear, and having alſo remarkably ſuffered by means of the late fatal South-ſea ſcheme, was, we think, in a particular manner entitled to apply for relief againſt ſome clauſes in the quarantine act, and deſerved to have been treated, on that occaſion, with more indulgence and tenderneſs.

3. Becauſe the rejecting the ſaid petition tends, we conceive, to diſcountenance all petitions, for the future, in caſes of a public and general concern; and by that means to deprive the legiſlature of proper lights, which they might otherwiſe receive; it being no ways probable, that ſubjects or ſocieties of leſs conſideration will venture to repreſent their ſenſe, in caſes of like nature, after the city of London have been thus refuſed to be heard.

4 Becauſe, as the receiving this petition could have had no ill conſequences, as we conceive, nor have given any great interruption to the buſineſs of parliament, ſo the rejecting it may, we think, widen the unhappy differences that have ariſen, increaſe the diſaffection to the government, which hath already too much prevailed in this kingdom.

5. Becauſe the arguments uſed on the debate, ſeem to us not to be of ſufficient force; for we cannot conceive, that, becauſe the ſaid act of quarantine is a general act, therefore no particular community or city, who think they may, in a diſtinguiſhing manner, be prejudiced by it, have a right to be heard in relation to it, and that at a time when it is under the conſideration of parliament. Nor can we be of opinion, that a petition agreed on by the Lord-mayor, aldermen and citizens of London, in common-council aſſembled, and preſented, not even by the numbers allowed by law, but by a lord of this houſe, can poſſibly be a prelude, or example, towards introducing tumultuous petitions; much leſs can we ſee why it ought the rather to be rejected becauſe it came from ſo great a body as the city of London; on the contrary, we apprehend that an univerſal grievance, which may be occaſioned by any general act, muſt be repreſented to the legiſlature by particular perſons or bodies corporate, or elſe it cannot be repreſented at all; that the rejecting ſuch petitions, and the not receiving of them, is the way to occaſion diſorders and tumults; and that the more conſiderable the body is, the more regard ſhould be had to any applications they make; eſpecially for matters wherein not only the rights, privileges, and immunities, but alſo their trade, ſafety and proſperity, are, as the petition avers, highly concerned.

Notwithſtanding the petition was rejected, yet a bill was ſoon after brought in, and paſſed both houſes for reverſing the clauſes that affected the city of London.

In the year 1722 advices being received of a moſt treacherous conſpiracy carried on againſt the government in favour of the pretender, the lord Townſhend, by command of his majeſty, ſent the following letter to the Lord-mayor of London:

" My lord,

" His majeſty, having nothing more at heart " than the peace and ſafety of his good city of " London, the protection of its inhabitants, and " the ſupport of public credit, has commanded " me to acquaint your lordſhip, that he has re- " ceived repeated and unqueſtionable advices, " that ſeveral of his ſubjects, forgetting the alle- " giance they owe to his majeſty, as well as the " natural love they ought to bear to their coun- " try, have entered into a wicked conſpiracy, in " concert with traitors abroad, for raiſing a re- " bellion in this kingdom in favour of a popiſh " pretender, with a traiterous deſign to over- " throw our excellent conſtitution both in church " and ſtate, and to ſubject a proteſtant free peo- " ple to tyranny and ſuperſtition; but I am " perſuaded that it will be a great ſatisfaction to " your lordſhip and the city to find, that, at " the ſame time I am ordered to inform you of " this deſign, I am likewiſe commanded by his " majeſty to let you know, that he is firmly " aſſured, that the authors of it neither are nor " will be ſupported, nor even countenanced, by " any foreign power. And as his majeſty has " had timely notice of their wicked machina- " tions, and has made the proper diſpoſitions " for defeating them, has no reaſon to doubt " but, by the continuance of the bleſſing of " almighty God, and the ready aſſiſtance of his " faithful ſubjects, this effort of the malice " of his enemies will be turned to their own con- " fuſion.

" His majeſty makes no doubt but your lord- " ſhip, purſuant to the truſt repoſed in you, will, " in conjunction with the other magiſtrates of his

" his good city of London, exert, with the ut-
" moſt care and vigilance, your authority at ſo
" important a conjuncture, for the preſervation
" of the public peace, and the ſecurity of the " city."

On the receipt of this letter, the Lord-mayor and aldermen immediately drew up an addreſs to his majeſty, which they next day preſented in the following words:

" Moſt gracious ſovereign,

" Your majeſty having been graciouſly pleaſed
" to ſignify to the Lord-mayor, how much you
" have at heart the peace and ſafety of your city
" of London, the protection of its inhabitants,
" and the ſupport of public credit; and that your
" majeſty has unqueſtionable advices of a wicked
" conſpiracy, entered into by ſome of your ma-
" jeſty's ſubjects, in concert with traitors abroad,
" for raiſing a rebellion in this kingdom, in fa" vour of a popiſh pretender to your majeſty's
" crown.

" We, the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen
" of this city, moſt humbly intreat your majeſty's
" permiſſion to make this our immediate approach
" to your royal preſence, that we may return our " moſt humble and unfeigned thanks for this in-
" ſtance of your majeſty's tender and indulgent
" regard to your faithful and dutiful ſubj cts of " this city, and that we may have leave to give " your majeſty aſſurances of our ſteady and un-
" alterable affection and zeal for your royal perſon
" and government, and for the continuance of the " proteſtant ſucceſſion in your royal family,

" And it is an unſpeakable ſatisfaction to us,
" that we can at the ſame time congratulate your
" majeſty on the happy ſucceſs of thoſe negotia" tions, which have procured aſſurances that theſe
" wicked and traiterous purpoſes will not be " ſupported or countenanced by any foreign " power.

" When we reflect on the many bleſſings which " Britons enjoy under the protection of a prince,
" who makes the laws of this land his rule for
" the government of his people, when we conſider
" that neither the civil nor religious rights of your
" majeſty's ſubjects have met with the leaſt in-
" ſtance of violation ſince your majeſty's happy
" acceſſion to the throne of theſe realms, when
" we recollect your majeſty's royal clemency and " benevolence (ſince the laſt rebellion) to num" bers of thoſe who had offended in the higheſt
" degree againſt their king and the laws of their " country, we cannot but expreſs the utmoſt ab-
" horrence of thoſe vile and deteſtable perſons,
" who ſhall again conſpire and attempt to bring " a free and happy people under the yoke of " tyranny and ſuperſtition, and to involve this " nation in a ſtate of blood, miſery, and utmoſt
" confuſion.

" And as theſe muſt be the unavoidable con-
" ſequences attending any enterprize to alter our " preſent happy eſtabliſhment, and to introduce " a popiſh one; as Engliſhmen that value our li" berties, as honeſt men that have ſworn allegiance
" to your majeſty, and who have abjured and re-
" nounced the pretender, and as real friends to
" our excellent conſtitution in church and ſtate,
" with a proteſtant prince at the head of it, we " beg leave, in the moſt ſolemn manner, to de" clare to your majeſty, that, as we are bound
" in gratitude, we will exert ourſelves in our ſe-
" veral ſtations, with the utmoſt care and vigi-
" lance, for the preſervation of the public peace
" and tranquillity, and for the reſtoring of public
" credit, and that we will uſe our ſincere and " hearty endeavours for the firm ſupport of your " majeſty upon the throne, and for the making
" your reign eaſy and happy.

" And we doubt not, but, by the bleſſing of " almighty God upon the wiſdom and conduct of " your majeſty, and the vigilance of your coun" cils, and the ready and chearful aſſiſtance of " your majeſty's faithful ſubjects, your majeſty
" will entirely defeat and fruſtrate the malice and " efforts of all your enemies, their aiders and
" abettors, and that their wicked machinations
" will be turned to their own confuſion."

To this his majeſty was moſt graciouſly pleaſed to return the following anſwer:

" Your affectionate and cordial aſſurances
" upon this important occaſion, of an un-
" ſhaken zeal and fidelity to my perſon and " government, give me the greateſt ſatisfaction.
" Your intereſt and mine are and ever muſt
" be inſeparable; and I doubt not but that,
" with the bleſſing of God, the precautions I " have taken, and your firm adherence to our
" juſt cauſe, will ſoon convince our enemies,
" that their wicked deſigns can end in nothing
" but their own confuſion. You may depend " upon my conſtant care and utmoſt endeavours
" to ſupport the public credit, to protect the " privileges and properties of this great and opu-
" lent city, and to maintain the religion, laws
" and liberties of this kingdom."

On the twenty-ſecond of May an order was made by the privy-council for the ſeveral lieute-nancies within the bills of mortality to return an exact account of the number of horſes within their reſpective juriſdictions; when the ſum total, (excluſive of any mention being made in thoſe of Southwark, or any other part on that ſide the river) amounted to no more than ſeventeen thouſand ſix hundred and one.

Diſputes perpetually ariſing between the citizens about building party-walls and water-ſpouts to their houſes, the parliament, to adjuſt theſe contentions, enacted, That if any perſon refuſed or neglected to build his ſhare of a party-wall, after due notice given him, his next neighbour may build it for him, and oblige the perſon ſo neglecting it to pay the charges of rebuilding it. And that the water falling from the tops of houſes, balconies and pent-houſes, ſhall be conveyed into channels or kennels, by pipes in the front, or ſides of the houſes, on pain of forfeiting twenty pounds.

In the year 1725, many citizens of London, being greatly agitated by a bill then depending in the houſe of commons for regulating elections within the ſaid city, petitioned the houſe, ſetting forth the reſpective grievances under which they laboured, and praying, " That for promoting " the welfare, for preſerving the liberties, the " peace and tranquillity of the ſaid city, and for " ſettling elections on a juſt and laſting founda- " tion, the houſe would take the premiſes into " conſideration, and give the petitioners ſuch re- " lief as they ſhould think moſt expedient."

In conſequence of this application to parliament, a bill was brought in, " For regulating " elections in the city of London; and for pre- " ſerving the peace, good order, and government " of the ſaid city."

This bill, however, created great diſturbances among the citizens, and notwithſtanding it was ſtrongly oppoſed in the houſe of commons, yet it paſſed in the following form:

" Whereas of late years great controverſies and " diſſentions have ariſen in the city of London at " the elections of citizens to ſerve in parliament, " and of mayors, aldermen, ſheriffs, and other of- " ficers of the ſaid city; and many evil-minded " perſons, having no right of voting, have un- " lawfully intruded themſelves into the aſſemblies " of the citizens, and preſumed to give their votes " at ſuch elections, in manifeſt violation of the " rights and privileges of the citizens, and of the " freedom of their elections, and to the diſturb- " ance of the public peace: and whereas great " numbers of wealthy perſons, not free of the " ſaid city, do inhabit, and carry on the trade of " merchandize, and other employments within " the ſaid city, and refuſe or decline to become " freemen of the ſame, by reaſon of an ancient " cuſtom within the ſaid city, reſtraining the free- " men of the ſame from diſpoſing of their perſo- " nal eſtates by their laſt wills and teſtaments: " and whereas great diſſentions have ariſen be- " tween the aldermen and commons of the com- " mon-council of London, in or concerning the " making or paſſing of acts, orders, or ordi- " dinances in common-council, which, if not " timely ſettled and determined, may occaſion " great obſtructions of the public buſineſs and " concerns of the ſaid city, and create many ex- " penſive controverſies and ſuits at law, and be " attended with other dangerous conſequences. " Now to the intent that ſuitable remedies may " be provided for preſerving the privileges of " the city of London, and the freedom of elec- " tions therein, and for ſettling the right of ſuch " elections, and putting a ſtop to the aforeſaid " controverſies and diſſentions, and the ill conſe- " ſequences of the ſame, and that a conſtant ſup- " ply may be had of able officers, capable of " ſupporting the dignity of, and maintaining " good order and government within that ancient, " populous, and loyal city, which is of the " greateſt conſequence to the whole kingdom; " be it enacted by the king's moſt excellent ma- " jeſty, by and with the advice and conſent of " the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and com- " mons, in this preſent parliament aſſembled, " and by the authority of the ſame, That at all " times, from and after the firſt day of June, in " the year of our lord 1725, upon every elec- " tion of a citizen or citizens to ſerve for the " ſaid city of London, in parliament, and upon " all elections of mayors, ſheriffs, chamberlains, " bridge-maſters, auditors of chamberlains and " bridge-maſters accounts, and all and every " other officer and officers to be choſen in and " for the ſaid city by the liverymen thereof, and " upon all elections of aldermen and common- " council-men, choſen at the reſpective ward- " motes of the ſaid city, the preſiding officer or " officers at ſuch elections ſhall, in caſe a poll be " demanded by any of the candidates, or any " two or more of the electors, appoint a conve- " nient number of clerks to take the ſame; " which clerks ſhall take the ſaid poll in the pre- " ſence of the preſiding officer or officers, and be " ſworn by ſuch officer or officers truly and in- " differently to take the ſame; and to ſet down " the name of each voter, and his place of reſi- " dence or abode, and for whom he ſhall poll; " and to poll no perſon, who ſhall not be ſworn; " or being a quaker, ſhall not affirm according to " the direction of this act: and every perſon, be- " fore he is admitted to poll at any election of any " citizen or citizens to ſerve in parliament, or of " any officer or officers uſually choſen by the " liverymen of the ſaid city, as aforeſaid, ſhall " take the oath herein after mentioned, or being " one of the people called quakers, ſhall ſolemn- " ly affirm the effect thereof."

That every voter for an alderman ſhall ſwear, " That he is a freeman of London, and an houſe- " holder in the ward of ——, and has not polled " at this election.

" That if a poll be demanded, the preſiding " officer or officers at ſuch election ſhall begin " ſuch poll the day the ſame ſhall be demanded, " or the next day following at furtheſt, unleſs the " ſame ſhall happen on a Sunday, and then on the " next day after, and ſhall duly and orderly pro- " ceed thereon, from day to day, Sundays except- " ed, until ſuch poll be finiſhed, and ſhall finiſh " the poll at elections by the liverymen, within " ſeven days, excluſive of Sundays; and the poll " at the wardmote, within three days, excluſive " of Sundays, after the commencing the ſame re- " ſpectively, and ſhall, upon adjourning the poll " on each day, at all and every the elections afore- " ſaid, ſeal up the poll-books with the ſeals, and " in the preſence of ſuch of the reſpective candi- " dates, or perſons deputed by them, as ſhall de- " ſire the ſame; and the ſaid poll-books ſhall not " be opened again, but at the time and place of " meeting, in purſuance of ſuch adjournment: " and after the ſaid poll is finiſhed, the ſaid poll- " books being ſealed, as aforeſaid, ſhall, within " two days after, be publickly opened at the place " of election, and be duly and truly caſt up; and " within two days after ſuch caſting up, the " numbers of the votes or polls for each candi- " date ſhall be truly, fairly, and publicly de- " clared to the electors, at the place of election, " by the officer or officers preſiding at ſuch elec- " tion; and if a ſcrutiny ſhall, upon ſuch decla- " ration made, be lawfully demanded, the ſame " ſhall be granted and proceeded upon, and the " reſpective candidates ſhall immediately nominate

" deemed and taken to be a perſon paying of
" ſcot." With a proviſo that partners in trade may vote, each paying ten pounds a year rent: and two inhabiting the ſame houſe, each paying ſcot and ten pounds per annum rent. With an exemption of all perſons, who are diſcharged from paying ſcot and bearing any lot by act of parliament, charter or writ of privilege.

It was further enacted, " That no perſon or " perſons whatſoever, ſhall have any right or
" title to vote at any election of a citizen or citi" zens to ſerve in parliament for the ſaid city, or
" of any mayor, or other officer or officers to be " choſen by the liverymen thereof, who have " not been upon the livery by the ſpace of twelve
" kalendar months before ſuch election, and who
" ſhall not have paid their reſpective livery-fines,
" or, who having paid the ſame, ſhall have re" ceived ſuch fines back again in part or in all,
" or ſhall have had any allowance in reſpect
" thereof; and no perſon or perſons whatſoever
" ſhall have any right to vote at any election of " a citizen or citizens to ſerve in parliament, or
" of any mayor, alderman, or other officer or " officers of or for the ſaid city, or any the wards,
" or precincts thereof who have at any time,
" within the ſpace of two years next before ſuch
" election or elections, requeſted to be, and ac" cordingly have been diſcharged from paying to
" the rates and taxes, to which the citizens of " London, inhabiting therein, are or ſhall be " liable, as aforeſaid, or any of them; or have,
" within the time aforeſaid, had or received any
" alms whatſoever; and the vote of every ſuch
" perſon ſhall be void.

" And

" And that no act, order, or ordinance what-
" ſoever, ſhall be made or paſſed in the common-" council of the ſaid city, without the aſſent of " the mayor and aldermen preſent at ſuch com" mon-council, or the major part of them, nor " without the aſſent of the commons preſent at " ſuch common-council, or the major part of " them.

" Provided always, that nothing in this act
" contained, ſhall extend, or be conſtrued to ex" tend, to any election, nomination or appoint" ment in common-council, of any common-
" ſerjeant, town-clerk, judges of the ſheriffs-
" court, coroner, common-cryer, commiſſioners of " ſewers, garbler, and the governor and aſſiſtants
" of London of the new plantation of Ulſter in " Ireland; but that the election, nomination, or " appointment, of all or any of the ſaid officers,
" ſhall and may be made by the mayor, alder-
" men and commons, in common-council aſſem-
" bled, or the major part of them."

This act then proceeds with a clauſe to enable freemen to diſpoſe of their perſonal eſtates, alledging, " that to the intent that perſons of wealth
" and ability, who exerciſe the buſineſs of mer-
" chandize, and other laudable employments,
" within the ſaid city, may not be diſcouraged
" from becoming free of the ſame, by reaſon of " the cuſtom reſtraining the citizens and freemen
" thereof from diſpoſing of their perſonal eſtates
" by their laſt wills and teſtaments; be it further
" enacted, by the authority aforeſaid, that it ſhall
" and may be lawful to and for all and every " perſon and perſons, who ſhall, at any time
" from and after the firſt day of June, 1725, be " made, or become free of the ſaid city, and alſo
" to and for all and every perſon and perſons,
" who are already free of the ſaid city, and on
" the ſaid firſt day of June, 1725, ſhall be un" married, and not have iſſue by any former " marriage, to give, deviſe, will, and diſpoſe of " his and their perſonal eſtate and eſtates, to ſuch
" perſon and perſons, and to ſuch uſe and uſes,
" as he or they ſhall think fit; any cuſtom or
" uſage of or in the ſaid city, or any by-law or
" ordinance, made or obſerved, within the ſame,
" to the contrary thereof, in any wiſe notwith-
" ſtanding."

It was alſo enacted, by another clauſe added to this bill, (for the alteration of a freeman's oath) " That there ſhall be omitted and left out of the " oath of a freeman of the ſaid city, the words
" following, that is to ſay, [ye ſhall know no
" foreigner to buy or ſell any merchandize with " any other foreigner within the ſaid city, or the " franchiſe thereof: but ye ſhall warn the cham-
" berlain thereof, or ſome miniſter of the cham" ber:] and alſo theſe words following, that is " to ſay, [ye ſhall implead or ſue no freeman
" out of the city, whilſt ye may have right and
" law within the ſame city]: and after theſe
" words, [ye ſhall take no apprentice] the " words immediately following ſhall alſo be omit-
" ted, that is to ſay, [but if he be free-born,
" that is to ſay, no bondſman's ſon, nor the child
" of an alien,] and for [no] theſe words [for any]
" ſhall be inſerted in the ſaid oath."

As ſoon as the citizens knew the contents of this bill, and that it was ſent up to the houſe of lords for their determination, a great number of freemen petitioned the houſe againſt it in the following manner:

" That your petitioners waited with much pa" tience and contentment of mind, (as very well
" became them) whilſt the bill lately depending
" in the honourable houſe of commons, intituled,
" (an act for regulating elections in the city of " London, and for maintaining the peace, good " order, and government of the ſame city,) was
" there forming.

" That they were fully perſuaded that the ſame
" at laſt would be there ſo finiſhed, as fully to
" anſwer the title thereof, and the good inten-
" tions which that honourable houſe always bears
" towards the citizens of London; but notwith-
" ſtanding, your petitioners, with great concern
" of mind, humbly crave leave to repreſent to " your lordſhips, that the ſaid bill now tranſmit-
" ted thence to your lordſhips, in the form it
" now ſtands, will not only, as your petitioners
" apprehend, highly affect the rights and privi-
" leges of the freemen in particular, but the laud-
" able and ancient government and cuſtoms of " the city in general, in many inſtances, ſome of " which, with perfect duty, ſubmiſſion, and re-
" ſignation, we beg leave to lay before your lord-
" ſhips.

" For that the ſaid bill takes away from great " numbers of the freemen (other than paupers
" and nonjurors) the undoubted rights which
" they before had of voting in their corporate
" elections, without any crime or fault in them
" aſſigned.

" For that it deſtroys the former qualification
" of a voter in wardmote elections, and hath
" ſubſtituted a new, complicated, and uncertain
" one, in the room of it, and which, as your " petitioners apprehend, may be productive of " various controverſies and diſputes.

" For that the ſaid bill, in effect, leaves all the " remaining votes of the city at the mercy of the " preſiding officer, who may ſtill declare as he " may be inclined, without granting a copy of " the poll ſcrutinized, or giving any account
" what votes he allows or diſallows, notwith-
" ſtanding this bill; whence the remedy either
" for the injured candidate or voter, becomes " exceeding difficult, if not wholly impracti-
" cable.

" For that the bill, in a manner, aboliſhes the " ancient and laudable cuſtom of diſtribution of
" freemen's perſonal eſtates, ſo agreeable to na" tural equity, and ſo wiſely adapted to the proſ-
" perity of a trading city, without juſt occaſion,
" and upon ſuggeſtions not well grounded, as we " humbly apprehend.

" Laſtly, For that by the ſame bill as your " petitioners humbly apprehend, the commoners
" in common-council, who are two hundred and " thirty-four in number, and though they are
" all unanimous, may nevertheleſs be reſtrained
" from applying to his majeſty, or either houſe
" of parliament, upon any occaſion, how neceſ-

" ſary

" ſary ſoever; from iſſuing out of the chamber " ſo much as one farthing, upon any occaſion, " how juſt ſoever; or ſeal any city leaſe, though " upon terms ever ſo advantageous; or come to " any reſolution whatſoever, and how reaſonable " ſoever, without the conſent of the mayor and " aldermen, or the majority of them, though " they ſhould be no more than three of them " there preſent: and this, as it is ſaid, by the " ancient conſtitution of the city; and yet, which " is very extraordinary, the ſame bill lays no " reſtraint upon the power, which the Lord-" mayor and aldermen exerciſe themſelves over " the public purſe and the ſeal, which is now " become very great and extenſive: if ſuch hath " been the ancient conſtitution of the city, your " petitioners humbly beg leave to ſay, that the " ſame hath been ſo ancient, that few or no foot-" ſteps thereof have remained to this day; and " that in the memories of the oldeſt of us, the " ſame hath never ſo much as been claimed or " mentioned by the mayor and aldermen, except " twice only; firſt in the year 1674, and now " again very lately, and both times relinquiſhed " as ſoon as mentioned: and yet we find by " experience, that the Lord-mayor and al-" dermen are never wanting to aſſert the moſt " remote pretenſions to all their rights and pri-" vileges.

" From ſuch alterations and innovations, your " petitioners have too juſt reaſon to apprehend, " that the good fruit and effect intended by this " bill is not to be expected from it in the form " it now ſtands, and that the controverſies and " diſſentions of the city will not thereby be leſ-" ſened but increaſed.

" Wherefore your petitioners humbly intreat " your lordſhips to take the premiſes into your " tender conſideration; to aſcertain the qualifi-" cations of the ſeveral voters in our elections; " the manner of our elections; to put a check " upon the behaviour of the preſiding officers; " and to eſtabliſh the good government and an-" cient cuſtom of the city, in ſuch manner, as " to your lordſhip's profound wiſdom ſhall ſeem " juſt and reaſonable, and may be compatible " with the rights, privileges, and freedom of the " ſaid city: and that your petitioners may be " heard by their council, or otherwiſe, what they " have humbly to offer againſt ſuch parts of the " ſaid bill, as relate to the matters aforeſaid, in " ſuch manner as your lordſhips ſhall think " fit."

After the petition was read, it was propoſed to aſk the opinions of the judges, " whether this " bill does repeal any of the preſcriptions, privi-" leges, cuſtoms and liberties of the ſaid city of " London, reſtored to them, or preſerved by the " act paſſed in the ſecond year of king William " and queen Mary, for reverſing the judgment " in a quo warranto againſt the city of London, " and for reſtoring the ſaid city to its ancient " rights and privileges.

Various debates ariſing thereupon the queſtion was put, " whether the judges ſhall deliver " their opinions upon the ſaid propoſed queſtion?" It was reſolved in the negative. On which the lords for the queſtion entered their proteſt as follows:

Diſſentient'.

1. Becauſe it being enacted and declared, by the act mentioned in the queſtion, that the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London, ſhall for ever hereafter remain, continue, and be preſcribed to be a body corporate in re facto & nomine, by the name of mayor and commonalty, and citizens of the city of London, and ſhall, as by law they ought, peaceably enjoy all and every their rights, gifts, charters, grants, liberties, privileges, franchiſes, cuſtoms, uſages, conſtitutions, preſcriptions, immunities, markets, duties, tolls, lands, tenements, eſtates, and hereditaments whatſoever, which they had, or had a right or intereſt in, or to, at the time of giving the ſaid judgment: and we being apprehenſive that the alterations made in this bill, in the conſtitution of the common-council, and other ancient rights, franchiſes, and preſcriptions of the city, may utterly aboliſh the ancient legal title of the city to their rights, franchiſes, preſcriptions, and conſtitutions, in the particulars contained in the ſaid bill, and may, in conſequence thereof, work a total change of the whole ancient conſtitution of the corporation of the ſaid city, or greatly confound or prejudice the ſame, which has ſtood for ſo many ages, upon the foundation of its ancient title, rights, and preſcription, confirmed by many grants, made by his majeſty's royal progenitors, and by many acts of parliament, all which were reſtored ſo ſoon after the happy and glorious revolution, and which have been peaceably enjoyed to the preſent time. We are of opinion that the ſolution of the ſaid queſtion by the judges, muſt have tended greatly to the neceſſary information of the houſe, and to their better judgment upon a bill of ſo great importance, as well as to the ſatisfaction and quiet of the citizens of London, who, ſo far as we can collect from the petitioners againſt the bill, are greatly alarmed at the conſequence thereof: and we are of opinion, that it was the more neceſſary, and more conſiſtent with the wiſdom of this houſe, to be informed of the law by the judges upon the queſtion propoſed, becauſe we don't find in this bill, any ſaving or confirmation of any of the antient titles, rights, preſcriptions, privileges or franchiſes of the ſaid city reſtored to them by the former law.

2. We think the queſtion ought to have been propoſed to the judges, the rather becauſe the opinions of ſeveral counſels were admitted to be read at the bar of the committee of the whole houſe, in favour of the bill.

Briſtol,

When it was reſolved in the affirmative that the ſaid bill with the amendment ſhould paſs, the following proteſt was entered:

Diſſentient'.
Lechmere, Warrington.

1. Becauſe we apprehend, that the penalty of two hundred pounds upon the officer preſiding at wardmote elections, as well at elections even for members of parliament, is ſo ſmall, that it may be conſtrued into an indemnification, and be looked upon rather as an encouragement than a reſtraint, by a wealthy, partial, and arbitrary officer: at leaſt, we are of opinion, that ſuch a one will not be ſufficiently deterred by it from returning ſuch candidates as he likes, rather than ſuch as the city chooſes; and if ever that melancholy caſe ſhall happen, we fear, neither the candidates nor voters will be able to find an effectual method of doing juſtice for ſo flagrant an injury, either to themſelves or to the nation.

2. Becauſe we cannot but think, from the evidence given at the bar, that this bill will take away from many citizens their right of voting in wardmote elections, by giving an excluſion to all thoſe who inhabit houſes under ten pounds a year, even though they pay pariſh duties, or thirty ſhillings in lieu of them, which we conceive an unjuſtifiable hardſhip upon thoſe who may have long enjoyed that right, and have had no crime objected to them, much leſs proved, as we think it ought to be, before they can juſtly be deprived of it.

3. Becauſe by this bill no act is to paſs in common-council, for the future, except what relates to the nomination of ſome few officers, without the aſſent of the major part of the mayor and aldermen, preſent in ſuch common council, which we conceive will give too great an addition of power to the mayor and aldermen, who have already many and large prerogatives inconteſtably allowed them by the commonalty of the city; and though the council for the bill inſiſted, that the mayor and aldermen had anciently that right, which this bill eſtabliſhes, yet the proof of that right appeared to us ſo remote and obſcure, that we our ownſelves were too ſhort ſighted to diſcern it; and on the other ſide it appears plain to us, that even from the time of incorporating the city to this preſent time, ſuch a claim has very ſeldom been made; and that it has never been acknowledged, and therefore we conceive if there be any foundation for ſuch right, which we are far from thinking there is, the diſpute ſhould be decided firſt in the inferior courts of juſtice, and rather determined in the houſe of lords upon an appeal, than ended by an act of parliament, which ſeems to us ſuch a method of determining controverſies of this nature, as may prove of the moſt dangerous conſequence to the rights and properties of all the ſubjects of Great Britain.

4. Becauſe the bill aboliſhes the cuſtom relating to the diſtribution of the perſonal eſtates of free citizens; which is a cuſtom not only of great antiquity, but ſeems to us to be wiſely calculated for the benefit of a trading city, and has been acquieſced under for ſo many years, without the leaſt complaint of any one free citizen, that we ever heard of; that the taking it away in this manner cannot but appear to us too raſh and precipitate; and may too, probably, in our opinion, be very detrimental to the true intereſt of this ancient, populous, loyal, and hitherto flouriſhing city, the preſervation of whoſe good order and government, the bill itſelf very juſtly and judiciouſly allows to be of the greateſt conſequence to the whole kingdom.

Diſſen'ient'.

For the foregoing reaſons, and thoſe that follow, (viz.)

1. Becauſe we are of opinion that the great alterations made by this bill in the ancient conſtitution of the common-council, and other the rights, franchiſes, and preſcriptions of the city of London, will, if paſſed into a law, entirely ſubvert and deſtroy the ancient title, which the city at this time lawfully claims, and has had hitherto; and will introduce and enact a new conſtitution upon the city hereafter, to be claimed and enjoyed, not upon the foundation of their ancient title, but of this act of parliament, which muſt, as we conceive, in all future times, whenever the city of London may have occaſion to aſſert or defend their ancient title and franchiſes, bring them under inſuperable difficulties, and may be followed with dangerous conſequences, concerning the very being and conſtitution of the corporation, many of which it is impoſſible to foreſee or enumerate.

2. We are of opinion, that the new conſtitution of the common-council enacted by this bill, whereby a negative is declared, and given to the mayor and aldermen, not only in the making of by-laws, for the government of the city, but in other acts concerning the iſſuing and diſpoſal of the treaſure of the city, and alſo of the ſeal of the city, whereby their lands and other eſtates are ſubjected to the ſaid negative, and in all other acts and powers at this time, as we conceive, belonging to the common-council, except only the appointment of ſome few officers, mentioned in the bill, is a dangerous innovation upon the city, unſupported by any evidence offered at the bar, of the ancient conſtitution, and though in late time mentioned to be claimed, yet contrary, as we conceive, to a clear, uninterrupted, and convincing proof of the exerciſe of the powers and authorities of the common-council, in all ages, to the 29th of January, 1723. And we conceive, the alteration made by the bill, in this reſpect, to be the more unwarrantable, becauſe the written evidence offered to ſupport the claim of a negative by the mayor and aldermen, was either conceived in general terms, unapplicable to that claim, and not maintained by ſubſequent practice, or was drawn from proceedings in times of trouble and confuſion.

3. We

3. We are of opinion, that the extraordinary power given by this bill to the mayor and aldermen, will reſt in them new and exorbitant authorities over all the citizens, their rights, liberties, and franchiſes of all kinds inconſiſtent with that balance of power in the city by which the ſame have been preſerved, and in the future exerciſe thereof, muſt, as we conceive, lay the foundation of conſtant and laſting diſputes, diviſions, and diſtraction in the city of London.

4. We think this bill is more dangerous, becauſe it creates a new conſtitution in ſeveral particulars contained in it, not framed upon the ancient rights, proved or pretended to, or diſputed on either ſide; but is a new model, without due regard to the antecedent rights, as claimed by either ſide; and will deprive a great number of citizens of their ancient rights and franchiſes in elections, and otherwiſe, without leaving them any opportunity of aſſerting the ſame by due courſe of law; and is a precedent of the moſt dangerous conſequence to all the cities and corporations of this kingdom.

5. We are of opinion, that the abolition of the ancient cuſtom of the city, touching the perſonal eſtates of freemen, is a dangerous innovation, tending to let in to the government of the city, perſons unexperienced and unpractiſed in the laudable and beneficial trade of the city and kingdom, and unfit for the magiſtracy of the city, and may thereby introduce improper and pernicious influences over the citizens; and we think that the ſtrength, the riches, power and ſafety of the city of London have been hitherto, in a great meaſure ſupported by this and other cuſtoms of the city, as the walls thereof; and we fear, that the decay of trade, and with that of the grandeur of the city of London, and the diminution and loſs of the great exciſes and duties ariſing from the trade of the city, on which the ſupport of his majeſty's government ſo much depends, may be the conſequence of the abolition of this ancient cuſtom and privilege of the freemen of the city of London.

6. Becauſe we are of opinion, that the petition of the many thouſand freemen of the city againſt this bill, ought to be of far greater weight, than the petition of fifteen aldermen for it, and that the confuſion which may ariſe from this bill, if paſſed into a law, may tend greatly to the future diſturbance of his majeſty's wiſe and gentle government.

Wharton, Strafford,
Coventry,

Notwithſtanding theſe debates, the bill ſoon after paſſed, in conformity to the original intent.

CHAPTER XL.

Treaty concluded between the emperor of Germany and Spain. Foundation of Guy's-hoſpital. Mutiny in Newgate. Death of George I. and acceſſion of George II. King and queen entertained at Guildhall on Lord-mayor's-day. Account of the banquet. A deſign formed to rob the queen on her return from the city. Remarkable high tide. A petition for filling up Fleet-ditch, and making a market. Scheme for a general exciſe. Marriage of the princeſs royal with the prince of Orange. Great conteſt on the election of chamberlain. Violent ſtorm of wind. Regulation of bakers. Black-friars added to the city. Act of parliament for a new method of Lighting the city, and ſettling the watch. A boy killed by the fly of a mill. King's printing-houſe burnt. Merchants petition againſt the depredations of the Spaniards.

A Treaty of peace having been concluded between the emperor of Germany and king of Spain very diſadvantageous to the rights and privileges of Great-Britain, and calculated to deſtroy the chief branches of the britiſh trade, and to favour the cauſe of the pretender, the citizens of London highly reſenting the ſame, preſented a loyal addreſs to their injured king; in which they aſſured his majeſty, "that the loyal city of London would be always "ready to ſacrifice their lives and fortunes in "defence of his royal perſon and government, "and of our excellent conſtitution, both in "church and ſtate, againſt all his enemies whatſoever."

His majeſty not only returned them his hearty thanks for this additional mark of their affection for his perſon and government, but likewiſe entertained the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, in a very ſumptuous and magnificent manner at dinner, in his palace at St. James's, accompanied by the principal miniſters of ſtate, and a great number of the nobility.

About this time Orator Henly, the ſon of a worthy divine, ſet up a new ſect under the title of an oratory. To advance which he informed the public, that on the third of July the oratory would be opened; that the fundamental authority of this inſtitution, conſidered as a church, would be the ſame with that of all the modern churches; that is, "a legal liberty of private judgment in reli-"gion, which is the very principle of the refor-"mation, the baſis of all the proteſtant intereſt, "and the moſt valuable branch of the freedom "of our conſtitution." At the ſame time, in order to prevent any diſturbance he might receive, on account of his ſeparation from the church, in which he had been ordained a prieſt, he reſolved to ſhelter himſelf under the canon of the tolera tion act; for which purpoſe he took the oaths of abjuration and allegiance, before the bench of juſtices at Hicks's-hall.

on

The place Mr. Henly adapted for his oratory was very remarkable, and befitting his novel inſtitution; being a ſort of wooden booth, built over the ſhambles in Newport market, near Leiceſter-fields, formerly uſed for a temporary meeting-houſe of a calviniſtical congregation, After which he moved near to the weſt entrance into Clare market.

Although his private fortune was greatly increaſed by money paid for admiſſion into his oratory for upwards of thirty-five years, yet he could never form an eſtabliſhed congregation; nor does it appear that his religion gained him one proſelyte; his whole ſyſtem and conduct for that time exhibiting nothing more than ſatyr, burleſque, and grimace.

This year Guy's hoſpital was built at the ſole expence of Mr. Thomas Guy, formerly a bookſeller in London, afterwards member of parliament for Tamworth, who left a benefaction of two hundred thouſand pounds for its ſupport.

In the year 1726, ſome malefactors under ſenſentence of death in the condemned hold of Newgate, having been previouſly ſupplied with arms, barrocaded the door of the ſaid hold on the morning appointed for their execution; intimation whereof being ſent to the ſheriff, he went to the priſon, and endeavoured to perſuade them to ſurrender; but they remaining obſtinate, the keepers fired in upon them from above; and after ſeveral wounds received, they ſurrendered, and were executed according to their ſentence. The ſheriff, however, was ſeized with the goal diſtemper, of which he ſoon after died.

In the year 1727, his majeſty, who had not been abroad for two years, reſolved to viſit his German dominions. Accordingly, having appointed a regency, he embarked at Greenwich on the third of June, and landing in Holland on the ſeventh, ſet out on his journey to Hanover. On the ninth he arrived in apparent good health, between ten and eleven at night, at Delden. He ſupped heartily, reſted well, and proceeded on his journey about four in the morning. Between eight and nine he ordered the coach to ſtop, and perceiving one of his hands to ſtand motionleſs, ſaid, "I cannot move this hand." Soon after his eyes began to ſtare, his mouth to be diſtorted, and his tongue to ſwell, ſo that he was deprived of the faculty of ſpeech. He was inſtantly ſeized with a fit of the palſy, and though recovered a little by opening a vein, he ſoon after became lethargic, and was conveyed in a ſtate of inſenſibility to Oſnaburg, where he expired on Sunday the eleventh of June, in his brother's palace, and was interred at Hanover among his anceſtors.

On the demiſe of king George I. his only ſon, his royal highneſs George, then prince of Wales, was proclaimed on the fifteenth of June, by the name of king George II. The proclamation was firſt made before Leiceſter houſe, where the officers of ſtate, nobility, and privy-counſellors were preſent, with the officers of arms, all being on foot; then the officers of arms being mounted on horſeback, the like was done in Leiceſter-ſquare, at Charing-croſs, within Temple-bar, at the end of Wood-ſtreet in Cheapſide, and laſtly, at the Royal Exchange, with the uſual ſolemnities. The proclamation ran thus:

"Whereas it hath pleaſed almighty God to "call to his mercy our late ſovereign lord king "George, of bleſſed memory, by whoſe deceaſe "the imperial crowns of Great Britain, France "and Ireland, are ſolely and rightfully come "to the high and mighty prince George, prince "of Wales; we, therefore, the lords ſpiritual "and temporal of this realm, being here aſſiſted "with thoſe of his late majeſty's privy-council, "with numbers of other principal gentlemen of "quality, with the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and "citizens of London, do now hereby, with one "full voice, and conſent of tongue and heart, "publiſh and proclaim, That the high and "mighty prince George, prince of Wales, is "now, by the death of our late ſovereign, of "happy memory, become our only lawful and "rightful liege lord George the ſecond, by the "grace of God, king of Great-Britain, France "and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. to "whom we do acknowledge all faith and con-"ſtant obedience, with all hearty and humble "affection, beſeeching God, by whom kings and "queens do reign, to bleſs the royal king George "the ſecond with long and happy years to reign "over us. Given at the court at Leiceſter-houſe, "this fourteenth day of June, 1727.

"God ſave the king."

Two days after, the city of London addreſſed his majeſty and the queen in a moſt loyal and affectionate manner. And on the ſixth of October following, they invited their majeſties, his royal highneſs the duke, and the three eldeſt princeſſes to dinner at Guildhall, on the approaching Lord-mayor's day; which their majeſties graciouſly accepting, a committee of eight aldermen and ſixteen commoners were appointed to ſuper-intend the entertainment to be provided for the occaſion. On the appointed day, their majeſties, with the duke and princeſſes, attended by the great officers of ſtate, with a numerous train of the nobility, and all the foreign miniſters, came into the city, and in the uſual place appointed for the purpoſe, beheld the pompous cavalcade; after which they were conducted to Guildhall, where, on entering the council chamber, the recorder, in the name of the citizens, complimented his majeſty in the following ſpeech:

May it pleaſe your majeſty,

"The Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons "of this city beg leave to offer their moſt hum-"ble acknowledgements for this great honour to "the city by the preſence of your majeſty, your "royal conſort, the princeſs royal and his royal "highneſs. Their joy is inexpreſſible, to behold "their ſovereign condeſcending to accept their "good will and affections, and, in the moſt en-

"gaging

" gaging manner, vouchſafing here to receive their " homage and duty.

" This day will ever be remembered by them " with the higheſt ſatisfaction. This happy day " which gave birth to their moſt gracious king, " who is pleaſed thus to honour them in the en- " joyment of all their rights and privileges. A " prince who takes pleaſure in promoting their " happineſs; and who thinks it gives the trueſt " luſtre to his crown, to preſerve the religion, " the laws, and liberties of his people. Fortu- " nate is their preſent condition, and delightful " is their proſpect, while they have in view your " majeſty, their moſt gracious and juſtly ad- " mired queen, and the illuſtrious branches of " your royal family.

" Permit, Sir, theſe your majeſty's moſt faith- " ful ſubjects, to take this opportunity of aſſur- " ing your majeſty of their unalterable attach- " ment to your royal perſon, and of the warmeſt " zeal for the ſupport of your government; the " beſt, the only ſecurity of our excellent conſti- " tution in church and ſtate, and of every thing " which is dear and valuable to Engliſhmen. " Gratitude and intereſt make theſe the unani- " mous ſentiments of this your majeſty's moſt " loyal, and moſt dutiful city of London."

Their majeſties and the princeſſes then proceeded to the huſtings, where they were moſt ſumptuouſly entertained; after which they were graciouſly pleaſed to honour the ball with their preſence till eleven o'clock in the evening. And his majeſty ordered the ſum of one thouſand pounds to be paid to the ſheriffs, for the relief and diſcharge of poor inſolvent debtors.

As the citizens of London exerted their utmoſt abilities to make this royal entertainment as ſplendid as poſſible, it may not be unentertaining to our readers to give a particular account of it as recorded in the entertainment book in the chamber of London.

Fifteen tables were placed for the accommodation of the illuſtrious company; at the firſt of which, on the huſtings, ſat their majeſties, the princeſſes, and the ladies of the bedchamber, which, with the other tables, were ſeverally ſerved with the number of diſhes as follows:

The cities of London and Weſtminſter had been greatly peſtered for a conſiderable time paſt with a great number of ſtreet robbers; and ſo audacious were they become in their villanies, that they formed a ſcheme of robbing the queen in St. Paul's church-yard, as ſhe returned privately from ſupper in the city, to St. James's palace. This ſcheme, however, was fruſtrated by their being buſily employed in robbing Sir Gilbert Heathcote, an alderman of London, as he was returning in his chariot from the houſe of commons; during which time her majeſty luckily eſcaped them in her coach.

This circumſtance greatly alarming both the court and city, letters were immediately ſent to all the magiſtrates, enjoining them to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to ſuppreſs ſuch flagitious villanies; and many of them being apprehended and executed, theſe diabolical proceedings were ſoon after entirely eradicated.

On the 31ſt. of December, 1732, the river Thames roſe with ſuch a high tide, that it overflowed Wapping, Tooley-ſtreet, and many other places, and did incredible damage by filling cellars and warehouſes, and ſpoiling great quantities of different merchandize.

The ſame year an epidemical diſtemper, which was a cold attended with a fever, raged ſo violently in the city of London, eſpecially among the more advanced people, that not one in ſix eſcaped its fury: and the bill of mortality in one week, was increaſed four times its uſual number.

On the twenty-ſixth of February 1732-3, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council preſented a petition to parliament, praying that a bill might be brought in to empower them to fill up that part of Fleet-ditch, lying between Holbourn bridge and Fleet-bridge, and to convert the ground to ſuch purpoſes as they might think moſt convenient and proper. In conſequence of this petition a bill was ſoon after brought in and paſſed; by virtue of which the premiſes were arched over, and the ſite converted into a market, which was opened on the thirtieth of September in the year 1737.

This market has two rows of ſhops of a great length, from north to ſouth, with a handſome walk between; into which light is thrown by windows placed along the top; and in the centre is a neat lanthorn, with a clock; the whole of which part is paved with rag-ſtones. On the ſouth end the fruiterers ſtands are made in the form of piazzas, erected on each ſide, and theſe have proper conveniences to depoſit their remaining ſtock: and at the north-end is a ſpacious opening for gardeners, and dealers in vegetables.

The fee-ſimple of the ground and ditch, by this act, is veſted in the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London, for ever, with a proviſo, that ſufficient drains ſhall be made in and through the ſaid channel or ditch, and that no houſes or ſheds exceeding fifteen feet in height ſhall be erected thereon.

In the year 1733 the nation was greatly alarmed with an attempt made by the miniſtry to introduce a general exciſe, under pretence of eaſing the people of various taxes, and promoting the intereſt of the fair-trader. It was ſtrongly oppoſed by the independent members of the houſe, who repreſented it as a meaſure that would in the end ſo enrich the crown, as to render the aſſiſtance of parliament entirely uſeleſs, which could produce no other conſequence than that of enſlaving the whole nation.

When Sir Robert Walpole, the projector, moved for the bill in the houſe of commons, Sir John Barnard and Mr. Aldermen Perry, two of the city members, oppoſed it with their utmoſt abilities; and the fourteenth of March being appointed for the houſe to reſolve themſelves into a committee to conſider of the moſt proper methods for the better ſecurity and improvement of the duties and revenues already charged upon and payable from tobacco and wines, the common-council aſſembled on the occaſion, earneſtly requeſted, by written inſtructions, the city members to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to defeat the ſaid pernicious deſign; alledging, that any extenſion of the exciſe laws to commodities not yet exciſed, muſt be very prejudicial to trade, as it would tend to diminiſh the conſumption of commodities, ſubject the fair-trader to exciſe officers and laws, from which there is no appeal; and that an extenſion of ſuch laws would encreaſe the number and power of officers, which would be inconſiſtent with thoſe principles of liberty on which our happy conſtitution is founded; and would farther deprive the ſubjects of England of thoſe valuable privileges, which have hitherto diſtinguiſhed them from other nations.

Notwithſtanding the diſcouragements Sir Robert Walpole met with, yet he perſevered in bringing his ſcheme into parliament with all the power he was maſter of, both of elocution, influence, and artifice. But Sir John Barnard and Mr. alderman Perry ſupported their arguments ſo vehemently, aſſiſted by other great men, friends of their king and country, that Sir Robert, findin the ſcheme likely to prove abortive, had recourſe to that miniſterial reſort of depending upon numbers under direction. And when the queſtion was put on Sir Robert's motion, the houſe divided.

For the exciſe, with teller	266
Againſt the exciſe, with teller	205

This ſucceſs of the miniſter did not diſcourage the opponents to his arbitrary meaſures; for when the report thereof was made to the houſe on the ſixteenth of March, Sir John Barnard renewed the attack in a moſt elaborate and pathetic ſpeech conſiſtently adapted to the principles and inſtructions of that great city which he had the honour to repreſent in parliament.

This ſpeech of Sir John Barnard was followed by Sir Thomas Aſton, who obſerved, that it was his misfortune to know too much of the influence that the officers of the cuſtoms and exciſe had at elections; for at his own election, there were many of the voters ſo free and open as to tell him, that they would vote for him rather than any other, but that thoſe officers had threatened to ruin them if they did; and others told him, that they had promiſes either for themſelves or for their ſons to be made officers in the cuſtoms or exciſe, exciſe, by his antagoniſt, and as their bread depended upon getting thoſe promiſes fulfilled, which they could not expect if they did not vote againſt him, therefore they hoped he would excuſe them. "Thus, Sirs, ſays he, I know the evil of "this illegal influence by experience, and there- "fore I ſhall always be againſt any meaſure that "may tend to increaſe it, as this ſcheme moſt "evidently will; for I hope I ſhall always diſdain "to owe the honour of repreſenting my country "in parliament, to any adminiſtration whatever; "I hope I ſhall always depend upon the free votes "of my fellow-ſubjects, and, for that reaſon I "muſt be againſt what I think will deſtroy that "freedom, upon which only I am always to de- "pend."

Notwithſtanding the ſolidity of theſe arguments, yet ſo powerful was miniſterial influence, that, on a diviſion, two hundred and forty-nine againſt one hundred and eighty-nine agreed that a bill ſhould be brought in purſuant to the reſolution on the ſaid motion. The bill was brought into the houſe on the fourth of April, when every means were uſed to expedite it, and every art practiſed to prevent the contents of it being known among the people: and when a motion was made for printing a ſufficient number of copies for the uſe of the members, as is uſual, it was carried in the negative by a majority of ſixteen voices.

The citizens were ſo alarmed at theſe illegal proceedings of the houſe, that Sir John Barber, the Lord-mayor, ſummoned a common-council to deliberate on the moſt effectual meaſures to prevent paſſing the ſaid bill; on which occaſion his lordſhip opened the court with the following ſpeech:

"Gentlemen,

"There is a bill depending in the houſe "of commons (a copy of which I have procured) "for laying an inland duty on tobacco; which du- "ty it is univerſally agreed, will prove extremely "detrimental to the trade and commerce of this "great city, as well as to that of the whole na- "tion. And as the high ſtation I have the ho- "nour to be in, obliges me to be watchful over "every thing that may affect the intereſt of my "fellow-citizens, I ſhould think myſelf wanting "in my duty, if I neglected to call you together "on this extraordinary occaſion, that you might "have an opportunity to deliberate on an affair of "ſo much importance, wherein our liberty and "property are ſo much concerned."

His lordſhip then laid the bill before the common-council, who reſolving to petition the houſe againſt it, the ſame was immediately drawn up, and ordered to be preſented to the houſe on the ſixteenth of April. In which petition the citizens of London, after delivering their ſentiments on the bill depending in that houſe, and expreſſing the bad apprehenſions they conceived of its effects, conclude thus: "Therefore your peti- "tioners moſt humbly pray that this honourable "houſe will be pleaſed to hear them by their "counſel againſt the ſaid bill."

This petition occaſioned the exciſe ſcheme to be again brought upon the carpet in that honourable houſe. The citizens of London have always enjoyed one privilege ſuperior to any other body whatever; which is, that any petition from them is preſented to the houſe by their ſheriffs, and is brought up by the clerk of the houſe, and read at the table, without aſking leave of the houſe for that purpoſe; whereas all other petitions muſt be preſented by a member of the houſe, and cannot be by him brought up, or read at the table by the clerk, till leave be firſt aſked of and granted by the houſe. Accordingly this petition was brought up and read at the table; after which Sir John Barnard got up, and ſhewed how much the city and citizens of London, as well as all the other trading part of the nation, were to be affected by the bill for altering the method of raiſing the duties payable upon tobacco, and what juſt reaſons they had to inſiſt upon being heard by their counſel againſt it; and concluded with a motion for granting them leave to be heard by their counſel if they thought proper.

It was inſiſted on, in oppoſition to this motion, that it had always been the practice of that houſe never to receive any petitions, and much leſs to admit counſel to be heard againſt any bill for impoſing taxes upon the ſubject; for if any ſuch thing were to be admitted of, it would be impoſſible ever to paſs any ſuch bill, becauſe that there would be ſo many different petitions preſented againſt it by thoſe who were to be ſubject thereto, that it would be impoſſible to hear counſel ſeparately upon every ſuch petition within the uſual time of the continuance of one ſeſſion of parliament; and that, in refuſing to admit counſel to be heard, there could be no inconvenience, becauſe every man, and every body of men had their repreſentatives in that houſe, who certainly would repreſent their caſe to the houſe, if any particular hardſhip was to be put upon them by any bill then before the houſe.

The reply made to this was, that the houſe had never pretended to any general cuſtom of refuſing petitions, except againſt thoſe bills which were called money-bills, that was to ſay, ſuch bills as were brought in for raiſing money for the current ſervice of the year; and that, even as to them, there were many precedents where the houſe had admitted the parties, whom they thought to have a real intereſt therein, to be heard by their counſel againſt the paſſing of ſuch bills; that the admitting of counſel even in ſuch caſes could never prevent the paſſing of ſuch bills, becauſe the houſe could always order all parties petitioning to be heard at one time, and could give ſuch directions, that it could never take up many days to hear every thing that could be objected by every one of the parties petitioning; that though every part of the nation had their repreſentatives in that houſe, yet it was well known, that ſpeaking in public was a talent that every man was not endowed with, from whence it might happen, that the particular perſons, or part of the nation, which was then to be aggrieved by what was paſſing in the houſe, might not have any ſuch members as were proper to lay their caſe fully and clearly before the houſe; and that therefore, even as to money-money-bills, it was proper to admit parties to be heard againſt them, when it appeared that they were very particularly intereſted therein. But as to the caſe then before them, there was not the leaſt pretence for refuſing the deſire of the petition, becauſe the bill againſt which it was preſented was no money-bill; it was granted by the advocates for the bill: it was even inſiſted on, as the greateſt argument for it, that there were no new duties to be impoſed; it was a bill only for altering the method of collecting the taxes already impoſed, and therefore it could never be pretended that there was any practice or cuſtom of the houſe for refuſing to admit parties intereſted to be heard againſt ſuch a bill; that, if there had been ſuch a cuſtom introduced, it ought not to be obſerved, eſpecially when ſuch a conſiderable body as the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council of the city of London, come with an humble petition to be heard againſt a bill, which they thought would not only be injurious to them in particular, but deſtructive to the trade and commerce of the nation in general.

In the courſe of this debate many precedents were brought by Mr. Sandys, Mr. Gybbon, and Mr. Bootle, where the houſe had received petitions, and admitted counſel to be heard againſt money-bills; and there were likewiſe precedents brought by Sir William Yonge and Mr. Wollaſton, where the ſame had been refuſed, the reading of which took up a conſiderable part of the day.

The principal ſpeakers for granting the deſire of the petition were,

Sir John Barnard, Samuel Sandy's, Eſq; Philip Gybbon, Eſq; Thomas Bootle, Eſq; William Pulteney, Eſq; Sir William Wyndham, Walter Plummer, Eſq; George Heathcoate, Eſq; Thomas Wyndham, Eſq;

The principal ſpeakers againſt granting the deſire of the petition were,

Mr. Chancellor of the exchequer, Horatio Walpole, Eſq; Thomas Winnington, Eſq; Mr. Solicitor-general, Mr. Attorney-general, Sir William Yonge, Hon. Henry Pelham.

On the queſtion being put, for allowing the petitioners to be heard by their counſel againſt the bill, there was a diviſion, and the queſtion was carried in the negative two hundred and fourteen againſt one hundred and ninety-ſeven.

Notwithſtanding this, the powerful oppoſition of the city which was ſupported by many different counties, ſoon convinced Sir Robert of the impoſſibility of carrying his point without endangering the peace of the nation, and his own ſafety. In conſequence of which the bill, inſtead of being read a ſecond time on the eleventh of the following month, was, upon a motion made by the chancellor of the exchequer, deferred till the twelfth of June, a day exceeding the time of cloſing the ſeſſions; ſo that the paſſing of this bill become impracticable, and Sir Robert Walpole's ſcheme, by the firm and ſteady interpoſition of the citizens, proved entirely abortive.

On the twelfth of April complaint was made to the houſe by ſeveral members, who had voted in favour of the ſcheme, that a tumultuous crowd of people had been aſſembled together the preceeding night, and ſeveral days during the ſeſſion, in the court of requeſts, and other avenues to that houſe; and that they themſelves, and ſeveral other members of the houſe, had been, in their return from the houſe, menaced, inſulted, and aſſaulted by a tumultuous crowd of people in the paſſages to the houſe; whereupon it was reſolved and declared, firſt, that the aſſaulting, inſulting, or menacing any member of that houſe, in his coming to, or going from the houſe, or upon account of his behaviour in parliament, was an high infringement of the privilege of that houſe, a moſt outrageous and dangerous violation of the rights of parliament, and an high crime and miſdemeanor. Secondly, that the aſſembling and coming of any number of perſons in a riotous, tumultuous, and diſorderly manner to that houſe, in order either to hinder or promote the paſſing of any bill, or other matter depending before the houſe, was an high infringement of the privilege of that houſe, deſtructive of the freedom and conſtitution of parliament, and an high crime and miſdemeanor. Thirdly that the inciting and encouraging any number of perſons to come in a riotous, tumultuous, and diſorderly manner to that houſe, in order either to hinder, or promote the paſſing of any bill, or other matter depending before the houſe, was an high infringement of the privilege of that houſe, deſtructive of the freedom and conſtitution of parliament, and an high crime and miſdemeanor.

It was then ordered, firſt, that the members of that houſe, who ſerved for the city of London, ſhould ſignify the ſaid reſolutions and declarations to the Lord-mayor of London, ſecond, that thoſe who ſerved for the county of Middleſex ſhould ſignify the ſame to the ſheriff of Middleſex; and thirdly thoſe who ſerved for the city of Weſtminſter ſhould ſignify the ſame to the high bailiff thereof.

On the eleventh of March 1734 the princeſs royal was given in marriage to the prince of Orange; on which occaſion the citizens of London, to teſtify their approbation of his majeſty's wiſe choice in beſtowing his eldeſt daughter on a prince of the houſe of their great deliverer king William III. preſented the following loyal and grateful addreſs:

" May it pleaſe your majeſty,

" We the Lord-mayor, aldermen and com-
" mons of the city of London, in common-" council aſſembled, moſt humbly beg leave to " congratulate your majeſty on the happy con-
" cluſion of the marriage of the princeſs royal
" with his moſt ſerene highneſs the prince of " Orange.

" Our minds preſage the greateſt glory, the " brighteſt triumphs, and the moſt diſtinguiſh-
" ed proſperity, to theſe nations, both in the " preſent and future age, from another alliance
" with that truly illuſtrious houſe, the houſe
" of Naſſau; from whence ſo many heroes have
" ſprung,

" ſprung, the ſcourgers of tyrants and the aſſer-
" tors of liberty."

" Among theſe we muſt for ever remember
" that glorious prince, king William III. who " delivered theſe kingdoms from the imminent
" dangers of popery and arbitrary power; and,
" during the courſe of his important reign, eſta-
" bliſhed the conſtitution, and ſecured our liber" ties in ſuch a manner, that he ſeems to have " left nothing more to be done than what, we " hope, was reſerved to complete the glories of " your majeſty's reign; a reign in which we juſtly
" promiſe ourſelves that nothing will be omitted,
" which may appear neceſſary for the confirming
" our ancient conſtitution, for eaſing the people
" from thoſe heavy burthens which the defence
" of their liberties induced them to impoſe on " themſelves, for encouraging the trade, and
" advancing the maritime power of this king" dom, for making us happy at home, and re-
" ſpected abroad. And, as we have a grateful
" ſenſe of the many bleſſings we enjoy under " your majeſty's auſpicious reign, we beg leave
" to aſſure your majeſty of our hearty endeavours,
" in our ſphere, to promote an affectionate zeal
" for your majeſty's perſon and government, that
" your reign may be eaſy and happy."

To which his majeſty was pleaſed to return the following moſt gracious anſwer:

" My Lord-mayor and Gentlemen,

" I return you my thanks for this dutiful and
" loyal addreſs; and am very glad that the mar" riage of my daughter with the prince of " Orange gives ſuch general ſatisfaction.

" It is a great pleaſure to me to ſee this metro" polis remember, with ſo much gratitude, the " deliverance of theſe kingdoms from popery and " ſlavery by my great predeceſſor king William.

" A juſt ſenſe of the imminent dangers that
" this nation then eſcaped, and of the ineſtimable
" bleſſings that we now enjoy, will beſt ſecure
" to my people the continuance and preſervation
" of our preſent happineſs, which it has been,
" and always ſhall be, my care to ſupport and
" maintain to the utmoſt of my power."

About this time, a great conteſt aroſe between the citizens and the miniſtry, reſpecting the election of a chamberlain. The candidates were, Mr. John Boſworth, a tobacconiſt, of Newgate-ſtreet; Mr. William Selwin, a ſilkman, in Pater-noſter-row; and Mr. John Thomas, a fiſhmonger, near the Monument; the latter of whom making no ſhew of hands in the common-hall, declined. And Mr. Boſworth being declared to have the majority of hands, a poll was demanded by the friends of Mr. Selwin. This was conducted with the greateſt dexterity and influence; and notwithſtanding both candidates were equally well reſpected by their fellow-citizens, and ſuppoſed to be equally well qualified for the diſcharge of that important truſt, yet the conteſt, for ſeven days, was the warmeſt ever known; the citizens being determined to preſerve their own principles of freedom in elections againſt any miniſterial oppoſition whatever. On the cloſe of the poll, however, the numbers appeared ſo equal that a ſcrutiny was demanded; and when the declaration was made on the fourth of May, the numbers appear as follows:

For Mr. Boſworth	3212
Mr. Selwin	3208

In conſequence of which the former was declared duly elect, and chamberlain of the city of London.

The miniſtry, however, ſo highly reſented this ſtrenuous oppoſition of the citizens to a candidate of their choice, that they conferred the office of receiver-general of the land-tax, which had generally been annexed to the chamberlainſhip, on their diſappointed friend Mr. Selwin, who had obtained the ill-will of the independent voters of the city of London, by having unadviſedly ſollicited the government, or miniſterial intereſt, to oblige all their dependents to vote for him.

On the firſt of January 1734-5, a beautiful marble ſtatue of king William III. was placed in the great hall of the bank. On the pedeſtal is a latin inſcription, the tranſlation of which runs thus:

For reſtoring efficacy to the laws,
Authority to the courts of juſtice,
Dignity to the parliament,
To all his ſubjects their religion and liberties,
And confirming theſe to poſterity
By the Succeſſion of the illuſtrious houſe of Hanover to the Britiſh throne:
To the beſt of princes, William III.
Founder of the bank,
This corporation, from a ſenſe of gratitude,
Has erected this ſtatue,
And dedicated it to his memory,
In the year of our Lord M.DCC.XXXIV.
And the firſt year of this building.

On the eighth of January this year, about eleven o'clock in the morning, a moſt violent ſtorm of wind aroſe, little inferior to that in November 1703. It blew down a great number of houſes and barns, ſtripped the churches, and tore up trees by the roots without number: but the greateſt damage was done to the ſhipping, nothing but wrecks being ſeen on every coaſt. Such heavy rains fell before and during the ſtorm, that the rivers roſe ſo high as to overflow the banks, by which a great number of cattle were drowned; and the inhabitants had no other reſource to ſave themſelves from the like fate, but by taking refuge on the tops of their houſes. The damage done to the park of Carſhalton, in Surry, only amounted to two thouſand pounds.

On the twenty-fifth of November following, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, for the better regulation of the bakers, enacted, that, excluſive of the fine, the names and places of abode of all bakers, detected and convicted of making bread under weight, ſhall be publiſhed, and that the aſſize of bread (inſtead of quartern loaves, wherein the poor were oftentimes defrauded of half a farthing) be penny, two-penny, and three-penny loaves, and to be marked accordingly: the weight of which to be as follows:

The penny loaf (fine) 8 ounces 7 drams.
Wheaten 12 ounces 10 drams.
Houſhold 16 ounces 4 drams.
And all other in proportion.

In the year 1735, the inhabitants of the precinct of Black Friars claiming a privilege of exemption from the juriſdiction of the city of London, in right of the ancient monaſtery being diſſolved there by king Henry VIII. occaſioned the Lord-mayor and aldermen to aſcertain their right thereto, which they did by a trial in the court of King's-bench, on the tenth of July; wherein John Boſworth, Eſq; chamberlain of London, was plaintiff, and Daniel Watſon, ſhalloon and drugget-ſeller, defendant. The action was brought againſt the latter for opening ſhop in Black-friars, and retailing his goods there without being a freeman of the city. The counſel for the plaintiff alledged, that Black-friars actually belonged to the city of London when it was a monaſtery, and before trades were ever occupied there; to prove which they produced ſeveral ancient records, viz. a charter of king Edward I. and a record, 2 Richard II. calling it the Friary of London; and another 21 Hen. VIII. mentioning a parliament held at the Friars-preachers of the city of London, Nov. 3, 1530, and other records of this kind: they likewiſe cited a parallel caſe to this, 15 Car. I. when an action was brought againſt one Philpot, a ſhoemaker of Black-friars, for opening a ſhop, and vending ſhoes there, without being free of the city: and after a fair trial by an equal and indifferent jury of the county of Hertford, a verdict was given for the plaintiff, with five ſhillings damage. In conſequence of this deciſion, Black-friars became a precinct of the ward of Farringdon within, and ſends two members to repreſent it in the common-council of this city.

The following year, Frederick, prince of Wales, father to his preſent majeſty king George III. was married to the princeſs Saxa-Gotha; on which occaſion the Lord-mayor and aldermen preſented the moſt dutiful and loyal addreſſes to the king, queen, and their royal highneſſes, in which they expreſſed the greateſt zeal and concern for the proſperity and ſupport of his majeſty's family and government, and their joyful ſentiments on the ſolemnization of the ſaid nuptials.

The city of London being at this time greatly peſtered with ſtreet-robbers and houſe-breakers, owing to the inſufficiency of lights in the night, the Lord-mayor and common-council, to prevent the like enormous crimes for the future, and to enable them to light the ſtreets in a more effectual manner, applied to parliament; who enacted, That the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of London, be empowered to erect a ſufficient number of ſuch ſort of glaſs lamps as they ſhall judge proper, to be put in ſuch places of the city and liberty as they ſhall think fit, to be lighted and kept burning, from the ſetting to the riſing of the ſun throughout the year: and in order to defray the expences of maintaining and repairing the ſame, the following rates and aſſeſſments are to be laid yearly on the inhabitants of the ſeveral wards: every houſe under 10l. per annum, charged to the poor, to pay 7s. From 10l. to 20l. per annum, 12s. From 20l. to 30l. per annum, 14s. From 30l. to 40l. per annum, 16s. From 50l. and upwards, 20s. per annum at moſt. It was likewiſe further enacted, that all pariſh churches, cemeteries, chapels, meeting-houſes, ſchools, markets, warehouſes, and other public edifices, (except hoſpitals) together with pieces of void ground and ſpacious places, ſhould be ſeverally taxed and aſſeſſed in due proportion by the alderman, deputy, and common-council men of the reſpective wards: the dean and chapter of St. Paul's to pay for the fence round the cathedral, if not lighted at their own expence; all public ſtructures by the church and chapel wardens, and chief officers, maſters, wardens or governors belonging thereto; and Moorfields, and other void and ſpacious places by the chamberlain of London. All perſons who think themſelves aggrieved by the aſſeſſment have a right to appeal to the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen for redreſs, whoſe deciſion ſhall be concluſive. The rates to be collected half-yearly, without any expence, and to be paid in ſuch manner into the chamber of London, that no collector ſhall at any time have in his poſſeſſion, for the ſpace of ten days, the ſum of fifty pounds, and all embezzlements to be made good by a reaſſeſſment of the ward in which it ſhall happen.

By this act, and many others ſince paſſed for the better lighting ſtreets, pariſhes and roads, it is computed that the whole number of public and private lamps now, within the bills of mortality, cannot amount to leſs than fifteen thouſand.

The uſe of ſpirituous liquors was at this time become ſo general among the inferior ſort of people, and ſo deſtructive to the morals of the populace, that the parliament, in order to prevent its evil conſequences, enacted, That after the twenty-ninth of September, 1736, no perſon whatſoever ſhould ſell any ſort of ſpirituous liquors in a leſs quantity than two gallons, without taking a licence for ſuch purpoſe; for which every retailer was not only annually to pay the ſum of fifty pounds, but likewiſe twenty ſhillings duty for every gallon ſold after that manner. And every perſon who ſhall ſell ſuch liquors without qualifying himſelf as aforeſaid, is to forfeit for every ſuch offence, the ſum of one hundred pounds. And, to prevent all perſons from hawking and vending of ſpirituous liquors, both by land and water, every offender to forfeit the ſum of ten pounds. And in caſe the party offending is incapable of paying the penalty, he, ſhe, or they are to be committed to hard labour in the houſe of correction, for the ſpace of two months.

On the ſeventeenth of December, the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen preſented the freedom of the city of London to his royal highneſs the prince of Wales, who was graciouſly pleaſed to accept the ſame from the hands of the chamberlain.

On the ſecond of March, a petition of the maſter and wardens of the company of Bakers, in the city of London, on behalf of themſelves, and

and the reſt of the bakers within the bills of mortality, was preſented to the houſe, and read, ſetting forth, "That the meal-weighers, who were "officers appointed to bring in the prices of "wheat to the magiſtrates, in order to affix the "aſſize of bread within the city of London, made "their cockets or returns of the prices of three "different kinds of wheat, as ſold at the market "of Bear-key only; from which three prices of "wheat the aſſize of the three ſorts of bread, "diſtinguiſhed by the names of white, wheaten, "and houſhold, was always aſcertained: and that "the beſt kind of wheat at Bear-key was gene-"rally ſold in parcels with wheat of inferior qua-"lity at one common price; ſo that the meal-"weighers were not able to diſtinguiſh the true "and real price of the beſt wheat: and that the "firſt ſort of bread in the aſſize-table, diſtinguiſhed "by the name of white bread, being that kind "of bread commonly called French rolls, was "of late years greatly improved; and in making "ſuch white bread the petitioners uſed only the "fineſt part of the flour, produced from the "choiceſt kind of wheat, collected not from "Bear-key only, but from all the adjacent mar-"kets; and even ſuch ſelected wheat afforded "but a very ſmall quantity of that ſort of flour, "which was alſo uſed in making the fineſt kind "of paſte: and that although the fineſt ſort of "wheat, mentioned in the cockets of the meal-"weighers, was not of a quality fine enough to "make the firſt ſort of bread, called white bread, "yet the aſſize of ſuch white bread was fixed "from the price of the firſt ſort of wheat in-"ſerted in thoſe cockets; and that the ſecond "ſort of bread in the aſſize-table, diſtinguiſhed "by the name of wheaten bread, which was the "beſt kind of large bread wherewith the fami-"lies within the city of London and bills of "mortality were daily ſerved, was made entirely "of the firſt ſort of wheat mentioned in the "cockets of the meal-weighers; and the ſecond "ſort of wheat contained in thoſe cockets was "not of a ſufficient goodneſs to make ſuch "wheaten bread; nevertheleſs the aſſize of that "wheaten bread was aſcertained according to the "price of that ſecond ſort of wheat, as returned "by the meal-weighers: and that the petitioners "apprehended, that the aſſize of wheaten bread "ought to be ſettled according to the aſſize of "the firſt ſort of wheat mentioned in the cock-"ets of the meal-weighers, being the very grain "of which the wheaten bread was made; and "that the aſſize of the white bread ought to be "advanced in proportion: and that, although "the expences, attending the trade and buſineſs "of the petitioners were very greatly increaſed "ſince the making of the table of aſſize, yet they "had had no allowance in reſpect to ſuch increaſe "of expences: and that by theſe means much "the greateſt number of the petitioners were re-"duced to very low circumſtances; and the moſt "conſiderable among them, notwithſtanding all "their pains, application, and frugality, found "their ſubſtance daily diminiſhing: and therefore "praying the houſe to give leave, that a bill "might be brought in for explaining and amend-"ing the laws then in being for regulating the "price and aſſize of bread, or to give ſuch other "relief to the petitioners, in the premiſes, as to "the houſe ſhould ſeem meet."

This petition was referred to the conſideration of a committee, who, making a favourable report, a bill was ordered to be brought in for giving a proper relief to the petitioners, which was accordingly ſoon after done, and paſſed both houſes.

About this time the citizens of London, not having ſufficient authority for the eſtabliſhing, ordering or well-governing of the city watch, applied to parliament to enable them to regulate the ſame. For which purpoſe they enacted, that the common-council of London ſhall, from year to year, be impowered to appoint ſuch a number of beadles and watchmen for the ſeveral wards of the city, and liberties thereof, as they ſhall judge neceſſary; to order the arming of them, to appoint the time they are to watch, to aſcertain their wages, and to appoint the number of conſtables that ſhall attend in each of the ſaid wards: the inhabitants to be aſſeſſed by the aldermen and common-council in each ward; and that the ſaid rate be paid quarterly. That any perſon neglecting or refuſing to pay the ſame when demanded, ſhall be diſqualified from voting at elections within the city of London: and that houſes let into tenements, and occupied by three or more tenants, ſhall be aſſeſſed on the owners of ſuch houſes, but paid by ſome one or more of the tenants. That the mayor, commonalty and citizens, may impoſe any reaſonable tax upon tenants and occupiers, and upon owners of houſes, &c. where there is no preſent occupier; to be levied by diſtreſs; and to order ſuch places before houſes, ſhops, &c. untenanted to be well and ſufficiently paved and amended as often as need ſhall be, to be paid for by the owner, under pain of diſtreſs.

In the year 1738, on the ſeventh of January, a young lad, thirteen years of age, ſervant to Mr. Snowden, a brewer, at Fleet-ditch, going up a ladder, fell backwards under a mill where the malt was grinding, when one of the flyers ripped his body entirely open, and killed him on the ſpot.

On the fourteenth of the ſame month the king's printing-houſe in Black-friars was burnt down by an accidental fire which began in the kitchen of Mr. Baſket, the patentee. The flames communicated themſelves with ſuch rapidity, that the family in the dwelling houſe eſcaped with the utmoſt difficulty. The deſtruction made by this fire, in printing materials and ſtock in trade was computed at leaſt to twenty-thouſand pounds. And

On the twenty-fifth a fire broke out in Duke's-place, which conſumed upwards of twenty houſes beſides the meeting-houſe at the corner of Bury-ſtreet.

The merchants of London finding themſelves ſtill greatly oppreſſed by the Spaniſh depredations on our American trade and navigation, preſented a petition to the houſe of commons on the third of March; in which they ſet forth the ſeveral applications that had been made to parliament liament againſt the Spaniſh depredations; and complaining, that, notwithſtanding his majeſty's moſt gracious endeavours, they had not only continued the ſame ever ſince the treaty of Seville, but had laſt year carried them to a greater height than ever; and therefore praying relief, and to be heard by themſelves and counſel.

This petition was preſented by Mr. Alderman Perry, who opened it with an elaborate ſpeech that did him the higheſt honour. After which he moved for leave to bring it up; which being granted, and the petition read, he then moved that it might be referred to the conſideration of a committee of the whole houſe; which being likewiſe agreed to, he moved for an inſtruction to the ſaid committee, that they do admit the ſaid petitioners to be heard, if they think fit, by themſelves and counſel, before the ſaid committe.

Mr. Speaker oppoſed this laſt motion by obſerving, that it never was the method of that houſe to admit parties to be heard by themſelves and counſel, but only by themſelves or counſel. In reply to this, Sir John Barnard ſaid, that as this petition was founded on facts, he ſhould be ſorry to ſee the deſign of it defeated by a ſcrupulous adherence to any points of form whatever; and that he humbly thought it would be a hardſhip on the petitioners to deny them a requeſt of ſo little importance as the preſent, meerly becauſe it interfered with a matter of form.

The ſpeaker, however, inſiſting, before he put the queſtion, to take the ſenſe of the houſe with regard to the terms in which he was to put it upon the preſent motion, Mr. alderman Wilmot roſe, and ſpoke as follows:

" Sir,

" I think the petitioners ought to have liberty " to be heard, not only by themſelves and coun- " ſel, but if it were poſſible that we could indulge " them in other advantages we ought to do it. " To talk of working upon paſſions.—Can any " man's paſſions be wound up to a greater height; " can any man's indignation be more raiſed, " than every free-born Engliſhman's muſt be " when he reads a letter which I received this " morning, and which I have now in my hand? " this letter, Sir, gives an account that ſeventy of " our brave ſailors are now in chains in Spain. " Our countrymen in chains! and ſlaves to Spa- " niards! Is not this enough, Sir, to fire the " coldeſt? Is not this enough, Sir, to rouſe all " the vengeance of a national reſentment? and " ſhall we, Sir, ſit here debating about words " and forms, while the ſufferings of our country- " men call out loudly for redreſs?"

Though this had not its wiſhed-for effect, yet on Tueſday the ſixteenth of March, the merchants, agreable to appointment, attended to make good their allegations; which they accompliſhed after the examination of witneſſes for ſeveral days. This being done, Sir William Pultney got up, and ſpoke vehemently in defence of the merchants, againſt the cruelties of the Spaniards. And after ſtrongly enforcing every part of the petition, he concluded thus: " We aſſemble in " this houſe, in order to receive the petitions, and " hear the complaints of injured ſubjects; but " we are not to receive and hear only, we are " likewiſe in duty bound to provide a remedy for " the grievances they juſtly complain of, and to " take the moſt effectual meaſures for that purpoſe. " We have twice already come to general reſo- " lutions upon this ſubject: we have twice already " found that ſuch general reſolutions have pro- " duced no effect; therefore it would be unpar- " donable in us to proceed no further upon the " preſent occaſion. Perhaps ſome gentlemen may " think, we ought now to go much farther than " I have taken the liberty to propoſe; but I can- " not think any gentleman will oppoſe our going " thus far; for the leaſt we can do, is to aſſert " thoſe national rights, which ſeem of late to " have been neglected; becauſe, after ſuch a ſo- " lemn and public declaration of our rights, I " hope no miniſter will hereafter dare to give up " any of them by treaty, or to allow them to be " any longer incroached on and violated, under " the pretence of a negociation."

Sir Robert Walpole, deſirous at all events of preventing a rupture with Spain, roſe up, and ſpoke many things by way of alleviation; in which after ſetting forth the hazards of ſuch a war to the merchants trading to Spain, Italy and Turkey, he concluded as follows:

" Having thus, Sir, laid my thoughts before " you, upon the matter now under our conſi- " deration, and having given you my reaſons for " not approving of all the propoſitions, the ho- " nourable gentleman has told us he is about to " make, I ſhall now beg leave to offer an amend- " ment to his motion, which is, that the firſt part " of his motion ſhould ſtand as it is in theſe " words: that it is the natural and undoubted " right of Britiſh ſubjects to ſail with their ſhips " on any part of the ſeas of America, to and " from any part of his majeſty's dominions. So " far I entirely agree with him; but, in my " opinion, all that he has propoſed to follow after " theſe words, ought to be left out; and inſtead " thereof, I propoſe, that theſe words or reſo- " lutions ought to be inſerted, That the freedom " of navigation and commerce, which the ſub- " jects of Great-Britain have an undoubted right " to by the law of nations, and which is not the " leaſt reſtrained by virtue of any of the treaties " ſubſiſting between the crowns of Great-Britain " and Spain, has been greatly interrupted by the " Spaniards, under pretences altogether ground- " leſs and unjuſt. That before and ſince the exe- " cution of the treaty of Seville, and the de- " claration made by the crown of Spain purſuant " thereunto, for the ſatisfaction and ſecurity of " the commerce of Great-Britain, many unjuſt " ſeizures and captures have been made, and " great depredations committed by the Spaniards, " which have been attended with many inſtances " of unheard-of cruelty and barbarity. That " the frequent applications made to the court of " Spain, for procuring juſtice and ſatisfaction to " his majeſty's injured ſubjects, for bringing the " offenders to condign puniſhment and for pre-

ON the twenty-fourth of May 1738 her royal highneſs the princeſs of Wales was delivered of a prince at Norfolk-houſe, in St. James's-ſquare, who, on the twenty-firſt of June following, was chriſtened by the name of George William Frederick; and is at this time our moſt gracious ſovereign king George III. The ceremony of baptiſm was performed by the biſhop of Oxford; and the godfathers were the king of Sweden and the duke of Saxa-gotha; the godmother was the queen of Pruſſia; all which were repreſented by proxy. On this occaſion the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council, in a cavalcade of eighty-four coaches, excluſive of the Lord-mayor's, waited on the prince and princeſs of Wales at Norfolk-houſe with the moſt ſalutary congratulations on this royal birth.

On the ſecond of Auguſt this year, the populace were greatly alarmed at the ſight of two large birds which were perched on the top of St. Paul's-cathedral. They ſat very quietly, the one on the croſs, the other on the pine apple, till a man went up to the gallery, and fired a gun at them, which occaſioned them to fly away. In conſequence of the great number of people aſſembled to view theſe birds, the following ſcheme was formed, in order to ſupply the neceſſities of the ſtate, which required a fleet of ſhips to be immediately manned. The preſs-gangs placed a live turkey on the top of the Monument, which in a ſhort time occaſioning a great number of idle people to aſſemble, they had the opportunity of ſelecting ſuch a number of men as anſwered the purpoſes of their intended project.

About this time the town was greatly entertained by a moſt uncommon creature brought from Carolina. It was a female, whoſe height was about four feet, and in every part formed like a woman, except the head, which nearly reſembled an ape. She walked upright, ſat down to her food, which was chiefly vegetables, and fed herſelf as a human creature. She expreſſed great reſpect for a boy who was on board the ſhip with her, and ſeemed very unhappy at his abſence. It was ſuppoſed to be the female of the creature which the Angolans call Chimpanze, or the Mockman.

On the thirteenth of September this year, the pile was driven for the foundation of Weſtminſter-bridge; and on the twenty-ninth of January 1738-9, the firſt ſtone was laid by the earl of Pembroke. This bridge, after having been eleven years and nine months building, was opened about twelve o'clock at night on the ſeventeenth of November, 1750. And as it is univerſally allowed, by the judges of architecture, to be one of the grandeſt in the world, we ſhall be more particular in giving an account of it.

Deſcription of WESTMINSTER-BRIDGE.

THIS bridge is built in a neat and elegant taſte, and with ſuch ſimplicity and grandeur, that whether viewed from the water, or by the paſſenger who walks over it, it fills the mind with an agreeable ſurprize. The ſemi-octangular towers, which from the receſſes of the foot-way, the manner of placing the lamps, and the height of the baluſtrade, are at once, the moſt beautiful, and, in every other reſpect, the beſt contrived.

It is forty-four feet wide; a commodious foot way is allowed for paſſengers, about ſeven feet broad on each ſide, raiſed above the road, allowed for carriages, and paved with broad Moor ſtones, while the ſpace left between them is ſufficient to admit three carriages, and two horſes, to go a-breaſt, without the leaſt danger.

Its extent from wharf to wharf is 1223 feet, which is above 300 feet wider than the ſame river at London-bridge.

The free water-way under the arches of this bridge is 870 feet, which is more than four times as much as the free water-way left between the ſterlings of London-bridge; which, together with the gentleneſs of the ſtream, are the chief reaſons why no ſenſible fall of water can ever ſtop, or in the leaſt endanger the ſmalleſt boats, in their paſſage through the arches.

It conſiſts of 14 piers, 13 large, and two ſmall arches, all ſemi circular, and two abutments.

The length of every pier is about 70 feet, from point to point; and each end is terminated with a ſaliant right angle againſt either ſtream.

The two middle piers are each 17 feet wide at the ſpringing of the arches, and contain 3000 cubic Feet, or near 200 tons of ſolid ſtone; and the others decreaſe in breadth equally on each ſide, by one foot; ſo that the two next to the largeſt are each ſixteen feet wide; and ſo on to the two leaſt of each ſide which are twelve feet wide at the ſpringing of the arches.

Each of theſe piers are four feet wider at their foundation than at top, and each of them is laid on a ſtrong bed of timber, of the ſame ſhape as the pier, about 80 feet long, 28 feet wide, and two feet thick.

The value of 40,000 pounds is computed to be always under water, in ſtone, and other materials. And here it may not be improper to obſerve, that the caiſſon, on which the firſt pier was ſunk, contained 150 loads of timber: for it is a precaution uſed in moſt heavy buildings, to lay their foundations on planks, or beds of timber, which (if found when laid, and always kept wet) will not only remain ſound, but grow harder by time.

The depths or heights of every pier are different, but none of them have their foundations laid at a leſs depth than five feet under the bed of the river, and none at a greater depth than fourteen feet under the ſaid bed. This difference is occaſioned by the nature and poſition of the ground; for though the foundations of all the piers and abutments are laid in a hard bed of gravel (which by boring was found to grow harder, the deeper it was bored into) yet this bed of gravel lies much lower, and is more difficult to come at on the Surry ſide than on the Weſtminſter ſide.

All the piers are built the ſame on the inſide as on the outſide, of ſolid Portland block ſtones, none leſs than one ton, or twenty hundred weight, unleſs here and there a ſmall one, called a cloſer, placed between four other large ſtones; but moſt of them are two or three tons weight, and ſeveral of four or five tons. All the ſtones are ſet in (and their joints fitted) with a cement called dutch tarris, and they are beſides faſtened with iron cramps, run in with lead, and ſo placed, that none of thoſe cramps can be ſeen, or ever affected by the water.

All the arches of Weſtminſter-bridge are ſemicircular, that form being one of the ſtrongeſt and the beſt adapted for diſpatch in building.

They all ſpring from about two feet above low-water mark, and from no higher; which renders the bridge much ſtronger than if the arches ſprang from taller piers, beſides the ſaving a great quantity of materials and workmanſhip.

The middle arch is ſeventy-ſix feet wide, and the others decreaſe in width equally on each ſide by four feet; ſo that the two next to the middle arch are ſeventy-two feet wide, and ſo on, to the leaſt of the two arches, which are each 52 feet wide. As to the two ſmall ones, cloſe in ſhore to the abutments, they are each about 25 feet wide.

The ſoffiet of every arch is turned and built quite through, the ſame as the fronts, with large Portland blocks, over which is built, bounded in by the Portland, another arch of Purbeck ſtone, four or five times thicker on the reins than over the key; ſo calculated and built, that by the help of this ſecondary arch, together with the incumbent load of materials, all the parts of every arch are in equilibrio; ſo that each arch can ſtand ſingle, without affecting or being affected, by any of the other arches.

Moreover, between every two arches a drain is managed to carry off the water and filth, which in time, might penetrate, and accumulate in thoſe places, to the great detriment of the arches. Some bridges have been ruined for want of this precaution, which ſhould be obſerved in all conſiderable ſtone or brick bridges; and yet it has been generally if not always omitted.

Juſt above and below each abutment there are large and commodious flights of Moor ſtone ſteps, for the ſhipping and landing of goods and paſſengers.

All the piers are laid at a conſiderable depth under the bed of the river, in a hard bed of gravel, which never requires piling; it being, after rock, the beſt ſort of foundation; whereas the uſual method of building ſtone or brick bridges over large tide-rivers, is to build them upon ſtilts; that is, driving piles in the bed of the river, ſhowing their heads at low-water mark, and often above; then laying ſome planks, to erect the piers thereon. Such are the foundations of London and Rocheſter bridges, and of many others in Great-Britain as well as abroad.

The materials of Weſtminſter-bridge, are the beſt four kinds of ſtone (for the ſeveral uſes to which they are employed) that are; and they are all not only durable, but ſome of the heavieſt in England, ſome kinds of marble only excepted. And the ſize and diſpoſition of thoſe materials are ſuch, that there is no falſe bearing, or ſo much as a falſe joint, in the whole bridge; ſo that every part is fully and properly ſupported; and whatever ought to be made of one ſtone, is not made of ſeveral ſmall ones, as is but too common in other buildings.

Inſtead of chalk, ſmall, ſtones or rubbiſh, with which the inſides of moſt buildings are filled, the piers are entirely built with ſolid blocks of Portland, and ſecured as we have explained before; and in building the arches, ſeveral precautions have been uſed, as have been ſcarcely ever before obſerved, ſuch as building them quite through with the ſame ſorts of large ſtones as in the fronts, thus deſtroying their lateral preſſures by a proper diſpoſition of the materials, in, between, and over thoſe arches.

Nothing

Nothing is more common in the conſtruction of bridges, than for ſome of the piers to ſink, or at leaſt ſo far give way, as to occaſion the neceſſity of rebuilding them, even before the fabric is paſſable: this has been the caſe of one of the piers of Weſtminſter-bridge, which, by ſinking, damaged the arch to which it belonged ſo much, that the commiſſioners thought fit to have it pulled down; when, by laying 12,000 Tons of cannon and leaden weights on the lower part of the pier, the foundation was ſettled and ſet to rights, in ſuch a manner as to render it completely ſecure from all accidents of the like kind for the future. This misfortune happened in 1747, when this noble ſtructure was almoſt compleated, and prevented its being finiſhed till the tenth of November 1750; when the laſt ſtone was laid by Thomas Lediard, eſq; in the preſence of ſeveral of the commiſſioners; and, on the ſeventeenth, about twelve at night, it was opened by a proceſſion of ſeveral gentlemen of that city, the chief artificers of the work, and a crowd of ſpectators, preceded by trumpets, kettle-drums, &c. and guns firing during the ceremony.

As to the time that has been employed in erecting this magnificent bridge, it is ſufficient to obſerve, that the ballaſt-men having dug the foundation of the firſt pier to the depth of five feet under the bed of the river, levelled it, and kept it level, by a proper incloſure of ſtrong piles, and the caiſſon being brought over to the place where it was to be ſunk, on the 29th of January, 1738-9, the firſt ſtone of the weſtern pier was laid by the Right Hon. the earl of Pembroke; ſo that the erecting this noble ſtructure was compleated in eleven years and nine months; a very ſhort period, conſidering the vaſtneſs of the undertaking, the prodigious quantity of ſtone made uſe of, hewn out of the quarry, and brought by ſea; the interruptions of winter, the damage frequently done by the ice to the piling and ſcaffolding, and the unavoidable interruption occaſioned twice a day by the tide, which, for two years together, reduced the time of labour to only five hours a day.

The charge of building this bridge, from the beginning to the finiſhing, and for procuring the ſeveral conveniencies requiſite thereto, amounted to the ſum of 389,500l. whereof 197,500l. was raiſed by three ſucceſſive lotteries, and the remainder, being 192,000l. was granted by parliament.

A guard, conſiſting of twelve watchmen, is appointed for the ſecurity of the paſſage over this bridge; they are to be upon duty at the cloſe of every day, till the opening of it the next morning.

In the year 1739, the citizens of London finding themſelves greatly injured by the miniſtry, who had, during the receſs of parliament, contrived and ſigned a convention between the two courts of London and Madrid, thought it expedient to exert their accuſtomed ſpirit of liberty, and to petition the houſe of lords againſt the ſaid convention. For which purpoſe a court of common-council was immediately called, and a petition drawn up which was approved of, and preſented to the houſe by his grace the duke of Bedford, who introduced the ſame in words to the following effect:

" My lords,

" I have in my hand a petition from a very " great body of men, no leſs a body, my lords, " than the citizens of London. The importance " of this juncture called upon them to aſſemble " and deliberate upon the moſt proper means of " preventing the effects of the convention, which " they apprehend to be ruinous, not only to " them, but the whole kingdom, from taking " place. Encouraged, my lords, by their for- " mer experience of your lordſhips great indul- " gence, they reſolved to proceed in the moſt " dutiful manner, by petitioning your lordſhips " to take the reaſons they are ready to offer " againſt the convention into your mature deli- " beration."

The purport of the petition itſelf was as follows: " That the citizens of London are too " deeply intereſted in whatever affects the trade " of this nation, not to expreſs the utmoſt anxiety " for the welfare of that only ſource of our riches; " and it is with a concern the petitioners are una- " ble to expreſs, that they perceive the trade to " his majeſty's American colonies ſtill continues " expoſed to the inſults of the Spaniards, who, " under unwarrantable and injurious pretences, " continue to ſtop, ſearch, and make prize of " Britiſh veſſels navigating the American ſeas, " in manifeſt violation of the treaties ſubſiſting " between the two crowns; and that the peti- " tioners apprehend, that the trade from theſe " his majeſty's kingdoms to his American colo- " nies is of the utmoſt importance, and almoſt " the only profitable trade this nation now enjoys " unrivalled by others; and that the petitioners " were induced to hope, from his majeſty's " known goodneſs and paternal care of his ſub- " jects, ſupported by the vigorous reſolutions of " both houſes of parliament, and the equipment " of a very powerful fleet, that his majeſty's " trading ſubjects in the ſeas of America, as well " as in all other parts of the ocean, would not " only have received a full ſatisfaction for all " their loſſes, occaſioned by the Spaniſh depreda- " tions, but alſo an undoubted ſecurity for their " navigation and commerce in time to come; " and that reaſonable and adequate reparation " would likewiſe have been obtained for the bar- " barities and inhuman cruelty exerciſed by that " nation on the Engliſh ſeamen, who have had " the unhappineſs of falling into their mercileſs " hands; and expreſſing their great concern and " ſurprize to find, by the convention lately conclud- " ed between his majeſty and the king of Spain, " that the Spaniards are ſo far from giving up " their, as the petitioners apprehend, unjuſt pre- " tenſions of a right to viſit and ſearch our ſhips " in the open ſeas of America, that this preten- " ſion of theirs is, amongſt others, referred to " the future regulation and deciſion of pleni- " potentiaries appointed on each ſide, whereby " the petitioners apprehend it is in ſome degree

On the tenth of September, about ſeven o'clock in the evening, there fell a moſt violent ſtorm of thunder and lightening, accompanied with very heavy rain, which continued till near twelve at night. Various were the debates in the houſe of lords in conſequence of this petition; and notwithſtand- the merchants minutely proved all their allega- tions, and were ſtrongly ſupported by many noble lords, yet it was at laſt carried in favour of the convention by a majority of twenty-four voices. And the miniſtry procured an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty from the houſe of commons alſo, for procuring the ſaid convention. This, how- ever, prognoſticated Sir Robert Walpole's decay of power in that houſe; for, upon the diviſion, he had no more than two hundred and ſixty-two contents, againſt two hundred and thirty-five non- contents, with ſixty-one abſentees; and among theſe two hundred and ſixty-two, were two hun- dred and thirty-four placemen, whoſe employ- ments amounted to the value of two hundred and twelve thouſand, nine hundred and fifty-ſix pounds, thirteen ſhillings and four-pence. It was in conſequence of this that Sir Robert took the liberty of calling the citizens ſturdy beggars; and in order to propagate a mean opinion of them, and to leſſen them in the eſteem of the members of both houſes, he procured printed liſts of the common-council, with the addition of their ſe- veral trades, or companies, to inſinuate that they were an inſignificant or contemptible body of tradeſmen and mechanics.

The citizens, however, took every meaſure to ſhew their abhorrence of the miniſter's colluſion with the court of Spain; and being thoroughly convinced that Sir George Champion, knt. who was the alderman next the chair, and member for Ayleſbury, had voted for the convention, they, on the twenty-ninth of September, the day of election, rejected him from the high office of Lord-mayor, and for ever looked on him with the greateſt contempt.

On the tenth of September, about ſeven o'clock in the evening, there fell a moſt violent ſtorm of thunder and lightening, accompanied with very heavy rain, which continued till near twelve at night. Though the thunder was not very vio- lent, yet the flaſhes of lightening were as quick, and at the ſame time as ſtrong as perhaps were ever known in this part of the world. This tem- peſtuous night, among many other things, was the deſtruction of a large aviary of ſparrows, which had for many years reſted themſelves in a grove of high trees adjoining to Mile-end turn- pike. Such numbers of them were killed by the lightening, that the next morning the ground was covered with their dead bodies.

The ſtatue of king Edward VI. in braſs, left by Charles Ivy, eſq; late treaſurer, was, on the twenty-ſecond, fixed on a marble pedeſtal in the middle ſquare of St. Thomas's hoſpital in South- wark.

The day of election for Lord-mayor being ar- rived, the livery paid no regard to the ſeniority of Sir George Champion. They returned Sir John Salter and Sir Robert Godſchall: but a poll being demanded by the friends of Sir George, the ſame was continued for about a quarter of an hour; when, finding the livery were determined to oppoſe him, it was thrown up, and the num- bers, on inſpection, appeared as follows:

Sir John Salter	95
Sir Robert Godſchall	90
Sir George Champion	21

In conſequence of which Sir John Salter, knt. was declared, in the common-hall, Lord-mayor for the year enſuing.

The nation grew more and more clamorous againſt the miniſtry, and repeated their addreſſes, ſo ſtrenuouſly to the houſe of commons for a vi- gorous war with Spain, that his majeſty reſolved to comply with their requeſt. Accordingly, on the twenty-ſecond of October the officers of arms, with the ſerjeants at arms and trumpeters, mounted their horſes in the ſtable-yard, St. James's, and proceeding thence to the palace-gate, garter prin- cipal king of arms read his majeſty's declaration of war, and Norroy king of arms proclaimed it aloud; which being done, a proceſſion was made to Charing croſs in the following manner:

Deſcription of the MANSION-HOUSE.

THIS edifice is very ſubſtantially built of Portland ſtone, and has a portico of ſix lofty fluted columns of the Corinthian order in the front; the ſame order being continued in pilaſters both under the pediment, and on each ſide. The baſement ſtory is very maſſy and built in ruſtic. In the centre of this ſtory is the door which leads to the kitchens, cellars, and other offices; and on each ſide riſes a flight of ſteps of very conſiderable extent, leading up to the portico, in the middle of which is the door that leads to the apartments and offices where buſineſs is tranſacted. The ſtone baluſtrade of the ſtairs is continued along the front of the portico, and the columns, which are wrought in the proportions of Palladio, ſupport a large angular pediment, adorned with a very noble piece in bas relief, repreſenting the dignity and opulence of the city of London. Beneath this portico are two ſeries of windows, which extend along the whole front, and above theſe is an attic ſtory with ſquare windows crowned with a baluſtrade. The building is an oblong, and its depth is the long ſide; it has an area in the middle, and the fartheſt end is an Egyptian-hall, which is the length of the front, very high and deſigned for public entertainments. Near the ends at each ſide is a window of extraordinary height, placed between coupled Corinthian pilaſters, and extending to the top of the attic ſtory.

The inſide apartments and offices are moſt elegantly furniſhed; and the bas relief over the grand pediment is finely deſigned, and as beautifully executed by Mr. Taylor. The principal figure on which repreſents the genius of the city of London in the dreſs of the goddeſs Cybele, cloathed with the imperial robe, alluding to her being the capital of this kingdom, with a crown of turrets on her head; in her right hand holding the prætorian wand, and leaning with her left on the city arms. She is placed between two pillars

* * Before the building of this noble edifice, it was cuſtomary for the chief magiſtrate of the city to hold his mayoralty at one or other of the halls belonging to the twelve principal companies. This, however, being attended with great inconveniencies, it was thought proper, for the honour of the city, and the more regular diſcharge of that high office, to erect a houſe, as the Manſion for the Lord-mayor for the time being. This being determined by the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council, ſeveral places were propoſed, as the end of Pater-noſter-row, fronting Cheapſide, Moorfields, and Stocks-market, and the latter was choſen from its being ſituated nearly in the centre of the city, and in the heart of buſineſs. Stocks-market was therefore removed to Fleet-ditch, and the earth dug up for laying the foundation, when the ground was found ſo full of ſprings, that it became neceſſary to erect the building on piles. This great work was finiſhed in 1753, and Sir Criſp Gaſcoigne was the firſt Lord-mayor who reſided in it.

or columns, to expreſs the ſtability of her condition; and, on her right hand, ſtands a naked boy, with the faſces and axe in one hand, and the ſword, with the cap of liberty upon it, in the other; to ſhew, that authority and juſtice are the true ſupports of liberty; and that while the former were exerted with vigour, the latter will continue in a ſtate of youth. At her feet lies faction, as it were in agony, with ſnakes twining round his head; intimating, that the exact government of this city, not only preſerves herſelf, but retorts juſt puniſhment on ſuch as envy her happy condition. In the group farther to the right, the chief figure repreſents an ancient River-god, his head crowned with flags and ruſhes, his beard long, a rudder in his right hand, and his left arm leaning on an urn, which pours forth a copious ſtream; the ſwan at his feet ſhews this to be the Thames; the ſhip behind, and the anchor and cable below him, very emphatically expreſs the mighty tribute of riches paid by the commerce of this river to the city, to which it belongs. On the left hand there appears the figure of a beautiful woman in an humble poſture, preſenting an ornament of pearls with one hand, and pouring out a mixed variety of riches from a cornucopia or horn of plenty, with the other; ſignifying, that abundance which flows from the union of domeſtic induſtry and foreign trade. Behind her is a ſtork, and two naked boys, playing with each other, and holding the neck of the ſtork; to ſignify that piety, brotherly love, and mutual affection, produce and ſecure that vaſt ſtock of wealth, of various kinds, which appears near them in bales, bags, and hogſheads; ſo that every thing in this piece is not barely beautiful and ornamental, but, at the ſame time, inſtructively expreſſive of the happy condition of that great city, for the reſidence of whoſe chief magiſtrate this noble building was erected.

The whole expence of building the Manſion-houſe, (including the ſum of 3900l. paid for purchaſing houſes to be pulled down) amounted to 42638l. 18s. 8d.

In the reign of queen Anne ſeveral eminent merchants, filled with compaſſion for the many innocent children who were daily expoſed to miſery and deſtruction, propoſed to erect an hoſpital for the reception of ſuch infants, as either the misfortunes or inhumanity of their parents ſhould leave deſtitute of other ſupport; and to employ them in ſuch a manner as to render them fit for the moſt laborious offices, and the loweſt ſtations. With theſe laudable views, they propoſed a ſubſcription, and ſollicited a charter; but from the ill-grounded prejudices of ſome weak people, who ſuggeſted that ſuch an undertaking would encourage perſons in vice, by making too eaſy a proviſion for their illegitimate children, all their ſollicitations proved ineffectual.

Although this was ſuſpended, yet it did not entirely defeat this laudable deſign: ſome of theſe worthy perſons left large benefactions for the uſe of ſuch an hoſpital as ſoon as it ſhould be erected; which coming to the ears of Mr. Thomas Coram, a commander of a ſhip in the merchants ſervice, he left the ſea to ſollicit a charter for the eſtabliſhment of this charity, and with unwearied aſſiduity ſpent all the remainder of his life in promoting this noble deſign.

Previous to his preſenting any petition to the king, his firſt ſtep was to procure a recommendation of his deſign from ſome perſons of quality and diſtinction. This he purſued with ſuch unbounded diligence, that in a ſhort time he procured the following memorial, ſigned by the ladies whoſe names are underwritten:

" Whereas, among the many excellent deſigns " and inſtitutions of charity which this nation, " and eſpecially the city of London, has hitherto " encouraged and eſtabliſhed, no expedient has " yet been found out for preventing the frequent " murders of poor miſerable infants at their birth, " or for ſuppreſſing the inhuman cuſtom of ex- " poſing new-born infants to periſh in the ſtreets, " or the putting out ſuch unhappy foundlings to " wicked and barbarous nurſes, who, undertak- " ing to bring them up for a ſmall and trifling " ſum of money, do often ſuffer them to ſtarve " for want of due ſuſtenance or care, or, if " permitted to live, either turn them into the " ſtreets to beg or ſteal, or hire them out to looſe " perſons, by whom they are trained up in that " infamous way of living, and ſometimes are " blinded or maimed, and diſtorted in their " limbs, in order to move pity and compaſ- " ſion, and thereby become fitter inſtruments of " gain to thoſe vile, mercileſs wretches.

" For a beginning to redreſs ſo deplorable a " grievance, and to prevent as well the effuſion " of ſo much innocent blood, as the fatal conſe- " quences of that idleneſs, beggary, or ſtealing, " in which ſuch poor foundlings are generally " bred up, and to enable them, by an early and " effectual care of their education, to become " uſeful members of the commonwealth; we, " whoſe names are underwritten, being deeply " touched with compaſſion for the ſufferings and " lamentable condition of ſuch poor, abandoned, " helpleſs infants, as well as the enormous a- " buſes and miſchiefs to which they are expoſed; " and in order to ſupply the government plenti- " fully with uſeful hands on many occaſions; " and for the better producing good and faithful " ſervants from amongſt the poor and miſerable " caſt-off children or foundlings, now a peſt to " the public, and a chargeable nuiſance within " the bills of mortality; and for ſettling a yearly " income for their maintenance and proper edu- " cation, till they come to a fit age for ſervice; " are deſirous to encourage, and willing to con- " tribute towards erecting an hoſpital for infants " whom their parents are not able to maintain, " and having no right to any pariſh; which we " conceive will not only prevent many horrid " murders, cruelties and other miſchiefs, and be " greatly beneficial to the public, but will alſo " be acceptable to God Almighty, as being the " only remedy of ſuch great evils, which have " been ſo long neglected, though always com- " plained of; provided due and proper care be " taken for ſetting on foot ſo neceſſary an eſta- " bliſhment, and a royal charter be granted by

After Mr. Coram had obtained this recommendation from the ladies, he procured another to the ſame purpoſe, ſigned by a great number of noblemen and gentlemen, both of which he annexed in his petition to the king, who not only approved of the ſame, and paſſed a licence for nominating truſtees, for erecting an hoſpital for foundlings, &c. but was moſt graciouſly pleaſed to grant his royal charter, dated the 17th of October 1739, for eſtabliſhing this hoſpital.

His grace the duke of Bedford, who was appointed firſt preſident, ſummoned the ſeveral members of the ſociety to meet him at Somerſet-houſe on the twentieth of November, when moſt of the noblemen and gentlemen mentioned in the charter being aſſembled, Thomas Coram, eſq; thanked his grace in particular and the reſt of them in general, for their protection and aſſiſtance in promoting the patent.

After this, the court, purſuant to their charter, proceeded to the election of a ſecretary; and a committee of fifteen noblemen and gentlemen were choſen to conduct the affairs of the corporation.

Books were now opened, and the governors obtained large ſubſcriptions; the work went on with great ſpirit; an act of parliament was obtained to confirm and enlarge the powers granted by his majeſty to the governors and guardians of the hoſpital. A piece of ground was purchaſed in Lamb's Conduit-fields, of the earl of Saliſbury, which his lordſhip not only ſold at a very reaſonable conſideration, but promoted the charity by a noble contribution.

The governors were ſo anxious for the commencement of this charity, that, during the building of the hoſpital, they hired a large houſe in Hatton-Garden, nurſes were provided, and it was reſolved that ſixty children ſhould be admitted; but as the funds increaſed, ſo a greater number were received in proportion.

As ſoon as one wing of the hoſpital was finiſhed, the committee ordered the children to be removed thither, and quitted the houſe in Hatton-garden. And a chapel being much wanted, and ſeveral ladies of quality expreſſing their deſire of contributing to it, a ſubſcription was opened for that purpoſe, and a neat and elegant edifice was ſoon erected.

Two years after the governors being informed of the increaſe of benefactions to this charity, of the number of the children, and the expediency of keeping the boys ſeparate from the girls, gave directions for building the other wing of the hoſpital; ſince which the whole deſign has been compleated.

Deſcription of the FOUNDLING-HOSPITAL.

THE wings of the hoſpital are directly oppoſite to each other, and are built in a plain but regular manner, of brick, with handſome piazzas. At the farther end is placed the chapel, which is joined to the wings by an arch on each ſide, and is very elegant within. Before the hoſpital is a large piece of ground, on each ſide whereof is a colonade of great length, which alſo extends towards the gates, that are double, with a maſſy pier between, ſo that coaches may paſs and repaſs at the ſame time; and on each ſide is a door to admit thoſe on foot. The large area between this outer gate and the hoſpital is adorned with graſs plats, gravel walks and lamps erected upon handſome poſts, excluſive of which there are two handſome gardens.

In the court room are placed four capital pictures, taken from ſacred hiſtory, the ſubjects of which are ſuitable to the place for which they were deſigned.

The firſt, which is painted by Mr. Hayman, is taken from Exodus ii. 8, 9. " The maid went " and called the child's mother, and Pharaoh's " daughter ſaid unto her, take this child away " and nurſe it for me, and I will give you " wages."

The following verſe is the ſubject of the next picture, done by Mr. Hogarth, viz. " And the " child grew up, and ſhe brought him to Pha- " raoh's daughter, and he became her ſon, and " ſhe called his name Moſes."

The third picture is the hiſtory of Iſhmael, painted by Mr. Highmore, the ſubject of which is taken from Gen. xxi. 17. " And the angel of the " Lord called to Hagar out of heaven, and ſaid " to her, what aileth thee, Hagar? fear not, for " God hath heard the voice of the lad where he " is."

The fourth picture is painted by Mr. Wills, and is taken from Luke xviii. 16. " Jeſus ſaid, ſuffer " little children to come unto me, and forbid " them not, for of ſuch is the kingdom of hea- " ven."

On each ſide of theſe pictures are placed ſmall drawings in circular frames of the moſt conſiderable hoſpitals in and about London, done by Mr. Haytley, Mr. Wilſon, Mr. Whale, and Mr. Gainſborough.

Over the chimney is placed a very curious baſ-relief, done by Mr. Ryſbrack, and preſented by him, repreſenting children employed in huſbandry and navigation.

The

The other ornaments of the room were given by ſeveral ingenious workmen, who had been employed in building the hoſpital, and were willing to contribute to adorn it. The ſtucco work was given by Mr. William Wilton; the marble chimney-piece by Mr. Deval; the table with its frame curiouſly carved, by Mr. John Saunderſon, and the glaſs by Mr. Hallet.

In the other rooms of the hoſpital are the pictures of ſeveral of the governors and benefactors, viz. Mr. Thomas Coram, by Mr. Hogarth; Mr. Milner and Mr. Jacobſon, by Mr. Hudſon; Dr. Mead, by Mr. Ramſey; and Mr. Emerſon, by Mr. Highmore. In the dining-room is a large and beautiful ſea-piece of the Engliſh fleet in the downs, by Mr. Monamy; and over the chimney in another room is Mr. Hogarth's original painting of the march to Finchley.

The altar-piece in the chapel, which is moſt beautifully painted, repreſents the wiſe men making their offerings to the infant Jeſus, who is held in his mother's arms. Here is likewiſe a fine organ preſented by Mr. Handel; in conſequence of whom the foundation has been enriched by a ſacred oratorio being performed ſeveral times in the year to crowded audiences.

Several very handſome ſhields done in lead were given by Mr. Ives, and placed over the charity boxes, with proper inſcriptions; and other artiſts have contributed their labours to the ornamenting of the hoſpital and chapel, for which they received the thanks of the corporation: and an inſcription is put up to inform the public, that theſe ornaments were the benefactions of the ſeveral artiſts whoſe names are wrote thereon.

Another good foundation was eſtabliſhed this year, which was the erecting a mathematical ſchool in the Grey-coat hoſpital, in the pariſh of St. Margaret, Weſtminſter, for training up boys in the art of navigation, ſo as to fit them for the ſervice of their country; many of whom, ſince the erection of this ſchool, have been put apprentice to captains in the king's ſervice.

On Chriſtmas-day a moſt ſevere froſt began, which continued, with ſome ſhort intermiſſions, near eight weeks. Its intenſeneſs and bad effects exceeded all others ever remembered. A few days after it began a very high wind aroſe, which did great damage among the ſhipping. Several ſhips loaded with corn, others with coals, &c. were ſunk by the ice; many were thrown on their anchors which made holes in them; ſome on their ſides, foul of others; ſeveral lighters and boats under the ice; and, on the whole, the river Thames preſented a more diſmal ſcene than had ever been beheld by the oldeſt man living. The damage done between the Medway and London-bridge amounted to 100,000l. beſides the number of perſons who loſt their lives. The neceſſities of the poor were ſo great, that had it not been for the extenſive collections in moſt pariſhes, and the benefactions of a great number of the gentry, they muſt have inevitably periſhed.

An act of parliament was paſſed this ſeſſions, to amend and extend the powers of the Court of Conſcience in the city of London; in which it was enacted as follows: "That it ſhall be lawful for every citizen and freeman of London, and every other perſon inhabiting within the ſaid city or liberties, and every perſon who rents or keeps any ſhop, ſhed, ſtall, or ſtand, or ſeeks a livelihood in the ſaid city or liberties, which have any debt owing to him not exceeding forty ſhillings, by any perſon inhabiting, or ſeeking a livelihood, within the ſaid city or liberties, during their reſpective inhabiting there, to cauſe ſuch debtor to be ſummoned by any of the beadles, or officers of the Court of Requeſts, by writing left at the dwelling-houſe, lodgings, ſhed, ſtall, or ſtand, or any other place of ſeeking a livelihood, of ſuch debtor, or by any other reaſonable notice, to appear before the commiſſioners of the Court of Requeſts, holden in the Guildhall of the ſaid city. And the ſaid commiſſioners, or three of them, ſhall, after ſummons, have power by this act to ſet down ſuch orders between ſuch parties as ſtand with equity and good conſcience; all ſuch orders to be regiſtered in a book, as they have been accuſtomed to be.

"If any perſon contemptuouſly affront any of the commiſſioners of the ſaid court, during the time of their ſitting, it ſhall be lawful for the commiſſioners then ſitting, or three of them, to certify under their hands and ſeals the name of the perſon ſo offending, and the nature of his offence, to the Lord-mayor of London, who ſhall ſummon ſuch perſon before him; and upon his appearance, and the fact alledged being proved upon the oath of one or more witneſſes, or in default of his appearance, ſhall puniſh the perſon ſo offending, by fine or impriſonment, or both; provided the fine do not exceed twenty ſhillings, and impriſonment be for no longer than ten days.

"Upon the non-payment of the ſaid fine, it ſhall be lawful for the Lord-mayor to iſſue a warrant for levying the ſaid fine on the goods and chattels of every offender, and to cauſe ſale to be made thereof in caſe they be not redeemed in five days; which fine, when levied, ſhall be paid over to the church-wardens or overſeers of the poor of the pariſh, wherein ſuch offender, at the time of ſuch offence, inhabits, or ſeeks a livelihood, towards the ſupport of the poor.

"The number of beadles or officers employed in the execution of the orders of the ſaid commiſſioners, may, by the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen of London, be enlarged to two or more, not exceeding four.

"The act 3 Jac. I. c. 15. and all things therein not hereby altered, ſhall continue in force, and extend to all perſons to whom this preſent act doth extend.

"If any action be brought for any thing done in purſuance of this act, or the act 3 Jac. I. c. 15. the action ſhall be brought within ſix months after the fact is committed; and ſhall be laid in the city of London: and the defendant may plead the general iſſue; and if the plaintiff become nonſuited, &c. the defendant ſhall recover double coſts."

In the year 1740 both houſes of parliament addreſſed his majeſty on the ſucceſs of admiral Vernon, who, with ſix ſhips only, had entered the port, and taken the town of Porto-Bello; and on the twenty-fifth of March a motion was made in the common-council to preſent the admiral with the freedom of the city of London, in a gold box; and to congratulate his majeſty on the occaſion: both of which being agreed to, the latter was preſented to his majeſty, by the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council, on the twenty-ſeventh of the ſame month. And,

On the tenth of May the Lord-mayor and aldermen waited on his majeſty with their compliments on the nuptials of the princeſs Mary with the prince of Heſſe; after which they addreſſed the new married princeſs on the occaſion.

In conſequence of a motion being made in the laſt ſeſſion of parliament for a place bill, the court of common-council met on the eighteenth of June, and agreed to thank their four worthy repreſentatives for their good conduct in parliament; which they did in the following manner:

"We, the Lord-mayor, aldermen and com-
"mons, of the city of London, in common-coun"cil aſſembled, return you our thanks for your "faithful and diligent attendance in parliament,
"particularly while the place bill was depending
"laſt ſeſſions; and being ſollicitous that the rights
"and liberties which this nation has hitherto en"joyed, ſhould be continued to lateſt poſterity,
"and conſidering that thoſe bleſſings can alone
"be ſecured by the independency of parliament,
"do moſt earneſtly require of you to renew your
"endeavours in procuring a proper bill for re"ducing and limiting the number of placemen
"in the houſe of commons.

"As we apprehend that your expectations laſt
"ſeſſions were in a great meaſure diſappointed,
"through the abſence of a few members from
"parliament, we cannot but entertain the ſtrong-
"eſt hopes of ſucceſs the next year, not doubt-
"ing but thoſe gentlemen, being at laſt con"vinced that a diligent attendance in the houſe
"of commons is of the utmoſt conſequence to "the nation, will not hazard a ſecond loſs of this
"ſalutary law, ſo immediately neceſſary to pre-
"ſerve the freedom of our conſtitution; to re-
"ſtore unanimity among the people, and eſta-
"bliſh that confidence in his majeſty's meaſures,
"as may effectually enable him, at this impor"tant juncture, to aſſert the honour of his crown
"and kingdom."

On the twenty-fifth of September a previous meeting of the livery was held at Vintner's-hall, to conſider of two proper perſons to be returned on Michaelmas-day at Guild-hall, to the court of aldermen, for the choice of one to be Lord-mayor.

After Mr. Glover, who was in the chair, had opened the cauſe of their meeting, it was reſolved to ſupport the nomination of Sir Robert Godſchall, knt. and George Heathcote, eſq; in the common-hall on Michaelmas-day, they being the two ſenior aldermen (except Sir George Champion) below the chair. Theſe two gentlemen were accordingly returned by the common-hall; but the court of aldermen, contrary to the uſual method, choſe Mr. Heathcote, who very politely begged to be excuſed on account of his health being greatly impaired by ſerving the office of ſheriff the foregoing year.

This occaſioned great debates; and ſtrong oppoſition was made by the friends of the negative aldermen. However, it was at laſt carried that Mr. Heathcote ſhould not be compelled to ſerve; and that he ſhould be excuſed without paying any fine.

Another common-hall was ſummoned to meet on the fourteenth of October, previous to which the livery met again at Vintner's-hall, and reſolved on the nomination of Sir Robert Godſchall and Humphry Parſons, eſq; who had lately been Lord-mayor; accordingly theſe two were unanimouſly returned by the common-hall; but the aldermen, after a debate of near three hours, were pleaſed to put by Sir Robert Godſchall again, and returned Humphry Parſons, eſq; who, at a court of common-council held on the twenty-ſecond told them, that if it was their deſire, he was willing to accept the office of Lord-mayor, for the enſuing year, let the expence be what it would. This declaration was received by the court with unanimous applauſe; and thereupon the following motion was made: "That the thanks of this "court be given to Humphry Parſons, eſq;
"Lord-mayor elect, for accepting a ſecond time
"the laborious and expenſive office of the mayor-
"alty, and thereby, in ſome meaſure reſtoring
"the peace and tranquillity of this city, which "has been greatly diſturbed by a late extraordi-
"nary and uncommon proceeding;" which queſtion, after long debates, was agreed to by a great majority: but an amendment being propoſed by ſome of the aldermen preſent, and Sir John Eyles and Sir Robert Baylis inſiſting that the opinion of the aldermen ſhould be ſeparately taken thereon, and ſeveral of the court of aldermen inſiſting upon a negative, a long debate enſued, in which their power of putting a negative on the queſtion, was diſputed with great warmth; but they ſtill inſiſting upon that power, Sir John Barnard, and the reſt of the worthy aldermen, who voted for Sir Robert Godſchall, and a very great majority of the common-council, withdrew from court, proteſting, that the aldermen had no right to vote ſeparately, or to put a negative in the forming of a queſtion. After which the aldermen and common-council returned thanks to the Lord-mayor elect, for his accepting the office a ſecond time. And

On Wedneſday the twenty-ninth the right hon. Humphry Parſons, eſq; the new Lord-mayor, was, with the uſual ſolemnity, ſworn into that high office for the year enſuing.—This gentleman was the firſt who rode in a coach drawn by ſix horſes in the proceſſion on Lord-mayor's day.

On the third of November the London Infirmary, now called the London-hoſpital, which was carried on in a little houſe adjoining to Upper Moor-fields, was removed and opened in a more commodious ſituation in Preſcot-ſtreet, Godman's-fields.

On the eleventh of the ſame month, a court of common-council was held at Guildhall, when a motion was made and the queſtion put, "That "the court of aldermen have the power of put-"ting a negative upon the framing of a queſ-"tion," which paſſed in the negative; and it likewiſe paſſed the ſame in the court of aldermen, by a majority of ten to four. Another motion was then made, and the queſtion put, "that the "court of aldermen have not the power of put-"ting a negative upon the framing of a queſ-"tion," which paſſed in the affirmative; and the ſame paſſed in the affirmative, by a majority of eleven to four, in the court of aldermen.

The day following, being the birth-day of admiral Vernon, the citizens of London, to expreſs the ſenſe they entertained of the advantages the nation might reap from a vigorous war with Spain, celebrated the ſame with the greateſt rejoicings that had been known for many years. The effigy of Don Blaſs, governor of Porto Bello, was burnt in many places; and at Chancery-lane end was erected a pageant, repreſenting a Spaniard on his knees, offering his ſword to admiral Vernon. A view of Porto Bello, and the ſhips and warlike implements. Over the admiral's head was written, Veni, vidi, vici, and under him theſe words, Semper viret.

On the nineteenth a meeting of the livery was held at Vintner's-hall, to conſider of proper perſons to repreſent the city in the enſuing parliament; and a letter was produced from Sir John Barnard, in which he deſired to be excuſed all further attendance in parliament, on account of his ill ſtate of health. This plea, however, had no effect on the livery, who, unwilling to loſe ſo worthy a member, put him in nomination, together with Mr. alderman Parſons, Sir Robert Godſchall, and Mr. alderman Heathcote. Death, however, ſoon after fruſtrated their deſigns, by taking off alderman Parſons, their Lord-mayor, who died on the twenty-firſt of March, in the ſixty-fifth year of his age. In conſequence of which, the next day (being Sunday) a court of aldermen was held at Guildhall, when the queſtion was put, Whether precepts ſhould be iſſued for a new election, which was carried accordingly. And on Monday the twenty-third, a court of huſtings was held at Guildhall, by virtue of a precept from the Locum Tenens and court of aldermen, for the election of a Lord-mayor for the reſidue of the year; when the common-hall almoſt unanimouſly returned Sir Robert Godſchall and Sir John Barnard to the court of aldermen, who, in oppoſition to the livery, once more rejected Sir Robert, and elected Sir John Barnard, who, in a moſt geenteel ſpeech, informed them he was not obliged by the laws of the city to ſerve that high office more than once; after which, deſiring to be excuſed, it was readily granted. They then proceeded to a new election; when the livery returned Sir Robert Godſchall and Daniel Lambert, eſq; and the aldermen elected the latter by a majority of thirteen to ten. Accordingly that ſame evening at nine o'clock, alderman Lambert was accepted by the lord-chancellor with the uſual ceremonies; and next day went in great ſtate to the Tower, attended by the twelve companies, where, on a booth erected for that purpoſe without the gate, he was ſworn in by the right honourable the lord Cornwallis, conſtable of the Tower, according to ancient cuſtom when the barons of the exchequer are out of town. The laſt Lord-mayor that had been ſworn on Tower-hill was Sir Thomas Bloodworth, in the year 1665, when the courts of law were held at Oxford on account of the dreadful plague in London.

The election of an alderman for Broad-ſtreet ward was ſoon after attended with great trouble and expence. The candidates were Charles Ewer, eſq; and Mr. Eggleton. On the cloſe of the poll a ſcrutiny was demanded, and the numbers appearing to be exactly equal, the Lord-mayor held a wardmote at Draper's hall for a new election; at which Charles Ewer, eſq; meeting with no oppoſition, was declared duly elected. In conſequence of this Mr. Eggleton petitioned the court of aldermen, ſetting forth his right to the ſaid election. On the day following, a rule was made in the court of King's-bench, to ſhew cauſe why a mandamus ſhould not be granted to ſwear in Mr. Eggleton alderman of Bread-ſtreet ward; and on the twenty eighth the court of aldermen, by conſent of both parties, returned that neither party was duly elected. So that the determination of the election muſt be tried in the court of King's-bench, which was accordingly done in the Michaelmas term following, in favour of Charles Ewer, eſq; who was accordingly ſworn in.

On the twelfth of May 1741, the poll ended at Guildhall for members of parliament for the city of London; when the liſt at Vintner's-hall carried it by a great majority; the numbers ſtanding thus:

For the Rt. Hon. Daniel Lambert, eſq;		Lord-mayor	3217

It having been found, on the great increaſe of inhabitants of this city, that it was neceſſary for the better government thereof, and the more eaſy bringing delinquents to puniſhment, to increaſe the juſtices of peace within the city of London, and its liberties, his majeſty, for that purpoſe was pleaſed to grant the following charter:

"George the ſecond, by the grace of God, "of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland, king, "defender of the faith, &c. To all to whom "theſe preſents ſhall come, greeting. " Witneſs John archbiſhop of Canterbury, " and other guardians and juſtices of the " kingdom, at Weſtminſter, the 25th day " of Auguſt, in the fifteenth year of our " reign.

About eleven o'clock in the forenoon, on the eighth of September, the wind due ſouth, a prodigious hurricane aroſe, which did conſiderable damage to the ſhips and craft in the river Thames; it uncovered houſes, threw down chimnies, and tore up trees by the roots. But the moſt conſiderable damage was done in the countries.

About this time the city of London, and places adjacent were viſited with an epedemic fever, which carried off great numbers for ſeveral months together. The cauſe of it was ſuppoſed to ariſe from the heat of the weather, which occaſioned a coagulation of the blood, or a ſtagnation thereof in the capillary arteries.

The removal of Sir Robert Walpole producing a great change in the miniſtry, the city of London, in common-council aſſembled, on the tenth of February, preſented the following inſtructions to their repreſentatives in parliamen .

To the right hon. Sir Robert Godſchall, knt. Lord-mayor, Sir John Barnard, knt. Mr. alderman Lambert, and Mr. alderman Heathcote.

" This court doth take this public occaſion to " acknowledge their grateful ſenſe of your vigi- " lant and faithful conduct in parliament, which " hath already contributed to the production of " many good effects.

" As they have now reaſon to hope for a change " of meaſures as well as of men, they deſire you " will ſtrenuouſly promote all thoſe ſalutary laws " as are or ſhall be propoſed in the houſe of com- " mons, ſuch as the place-bill, a penſion-bill and " the repeal of the ſeptennial act, in order to re- " ſtore the ancient freedom of our conſtitution, " and ſecure it againſt all future attempts either " of open or ſecret corruption, or of any undue " influence whatſoever.

" And more particularly they recommend that " you will perſiſt, with unwearied diligence, to " make the earlieſt and ſtricteſt enquiry into the " cauſes of all paſt miſmanagements, and exert " your utmoſt endeavours to prevent the like for " the future.

" And they further expect, that you will ex- " tend ſuch enquiry to all perſons who, in their " reſpective employments, have contributed to " the complicated evils, which have ſo long op- " preſſed and diſhonoured this nation.

" And they congratulate themſelves and the " whole kingdom that, from the virtue and ſpirit " of the preſent parliament, every odious name " of diſtinction will ſoon be loſt among us, and " that from this happy period they may date their " entire abolition of parties, of which the moſt " pernicious uſe has hitherto been made, to the " imminent danger of our liberties.

" For now they may reaſonably expect, that " thoſe who wiſh the real and ſolid ſupport of his " majeſty and his royal family; and are qualified " by their virtues and abilities, may have it in " their power to ſerve both their king and country; " and that no diſtinction will remain but of thoſe " who are friends or enemies to the conſtitution; " of thoſe who would maintain the freedom " and independency of parliament, and of thoſe " who would ſubject it to corrupt and miniſterial " influence."

At a general meeting of the independant electors of the city and liberty of Weſtminſter, held on the ſeventeenth of February at the Fountain tavern in the Strand, it was unanimouſly agreed that the following repreſentation be delivered to the right hon. lord viſcount Percival, and Charles Edwin, eſq; their repreſentatives in parliament:

" We, the burgeſſes and inhabitants of the " city and liberty of Weſtminſter, cannot avoid " taking the firſt opportunity of paying our moſt " grateful acknowledgments for your faithful be- " haviour during this ſhort, but important period " of parliament; and though we have no reaſon " to doubt your ſteady perſeverance, yet we can- " not think it altogether improper to acquaint " you with our ſentiments on the preſent criſis " of affairs;—a criſis which we apprehend muſt " determine the fate of us and our poſterity, and " render this kingdom either a glory or ſcoff " among the nations.

" We have beheld, with the deepeſt concern, " ſuch meaſures purſued for many years paſt, as " have manifeſtly tended to diſgrace the name, " betray the intereſts, ruin the trade, weaken " the liberties, and depreſs the courage of the " Britiſh nation. It is now with the moſt ſenſible " pleaſure we behold the agreeable proſpect of " being delivered from the fatal effects of ſuch " meaſures, by the virtue of a truly Britiſh par- " liament, and the removal of thoſe perſons who, " ſupported by the influence of corruption (that

" canker

" canker of our conſtitution) have two long wan-
" toned in the abuſe of power, and mocked the " calamities of an almoſt deſpairing people.

" But as the melancholy experience of paſt
" times evinces, that the removal of the perſon
" of a miniſter from the helm, is inſufficient for
" ſecuring the intereſts and liberties of a people,
" while his creatures, his maxims, and his views,
" are entailed upon the government; we there" fore hope you will moſt ſtrenuouſly oppoſe
" them, and endeavour to procure us ſuch a con-
" ſtitutional ſecurity, as may prevent this king" dom from ſuffering by the like errors or iniqui-
" ties for the future.

" As the ſtricteſt enquiry only can ſatisfy, ſo
" nothing but the moſt rigorous juſtice ought to " avenge an injured people; it is therefore we
" earneſtly intreat you to make a diligent ſcrutiny
" into the authors of thoſe grievances we have ſo
" long groaned under, and not ſuffer impunity
" to be the lot of the oppreſſor: juſtice is a duty
" you owe to poſterity, as examples are moſt
" likely to prevent future evils. Should the diſ-
" turber of the public be permitted the enjoy-
" ment of private tranquillity, or his influence
" remain in thoſe counſels from which his perſon
" is removed, we conceive that ſuch an event at " this juncture muſt give a fatal encouragement,
" or rather ſanction to a wanton and wicked ex-
" erciſe of power in all ſucceeding miniſters.
" Lenity to ſuch an one would be cruelty to the " nation; and the calling to a ſevere account the " inſtruments of pernicious meaſures, however
" unavailing to procure us reparation for what is
" paſt, may have the happy effect of henceforth
" preventing the like violations of the conſtitu-
" tion, the like profuſion of public treaſure at " home, and the like proſtitution of the public
" faith and honour abroad.

" We zealouſly recommend to your endea-
" vours the extirpating thoſe party diſtinctions,
" which, though their foundation have long
" ceaſed to exiſt, were yet ſo induſtriouſly fo-
" mented among us, in order to ſerve the miſ-
" chievous purpoſes of a miniſterial tyranny, and
" in oppoſition to the real and permanent intereſts
" of the preſent royal family. The common in-
" tereſt, it is hoped, has now united all parties
" and perſuaſions, and every man will be regarded " only as he prefers the welfare and liberties of " his country to any private dependence or venal
" conſideration whatever."

The merchants and traders of the city of London, finding themſelves greatly oppreſſed by the Spaniſh privateers, owing to the bad conduct of the admiralty in not granting them proper convoys and cruizers to protect their ſhips, preſented a petition to both houſes of parliament on the 20th of January, in which they ſet forth, " that the pe-
" titioners, with the utmoſt concern, have found
" themſelves under the neceſſity of repreſenting
" to the houſe that the navigation and commerce
" of theſe kingdoms have been continually ex-
" poſed to the growing inſolence of the Spaniſh
" privateers, from the commencement of this
" juſt and neceſſary war; that during its whole
" progreſs and continuance, notwithſtanding the " repeated applications of the ſuffering merchants
" for protection and redreſs, their loſſes and miſ-
" fortunes have conſiderably increaſed of late,
" to the impoveriſhing of many of his majeſty's
" ſubjects, the great detriment of trade in ge" neral, the diminution of his majeſty's revenue,
" and the diſhonour of the nation; that upwards
" of three hundred ſhips and veſſels have been " taken, (the greateſt part of them in or near the " Britiſh channel and ſoundings) and carried into
" St. Sebaſtian, and other adjacent ports; by " which numbers of his majeſty's moſt uſeful
" ſubjects have been reduced to want and im-
" priſonment, or, compelled by inhuman treat" ment, and deſpairing of a cartel for the ex" change of priſoners, have liſted in the ſervice
" of Spain; that the petitioners apprehend, that " moſt of theſe misfortunes might have been " prevented, conſidering the weakneſs of our " enemy at ſea, had a few of his majeſty's ſhips
" of war been properly ſtationed, and the com" manders kept ſtrictly to their duty; a neglect,
" which appears the more ſurprizing, as there
" was a precedent of an act of parliament in
" 1707, expreſsly made for thoſe purpoſes, in" titled, An act for the better ſecuring the trade of " this kingdom, by cruizers and convoys: that
" by means of this neglect, and the many va" luable prizes the Spaniards have made, they " have been encouraged and enabled to fit out
" ſuch numbers of privateers from St. Sebaſtian
" and Bilboa, excluſive of other ports, as to ren-
" der the navigation to and from theſe kingdoms
" every day more and more dangerous; and that " the preſent great and unexpected power of the " enemy, in the Mediterranean gives the peti" tioners reaſon to apprehend, that their trade is
" become extremely precarious in thoſe parts;
" that there have been various neglects and de" lays in the appointment and ſending out of con-
" voys; and that out of thoſe few, which have " been granted, ſome of the commanders have " paid ſo little regard to the ſhips under their " care, that they have deſerted them at ſea, and " left them as a prey to the enemy: and praying
" leave further to repreſent, that the navigation
" to and from ſeveral of his majeſty's colonies has " often been much expoſed to the enemy, and " that many ſhips have been taken in the Ame" rican ſeas by their privateers, principally owing,
" as the petitioners preſume, to a want of a ſuf-
" ficient number of ſhips, or of proper care in
" ſome of his majeſty's commanders, ſtationed
" in thoſe parts; that many ſhips have been " brought into danger by the arbitrary impreſſing
" of their ableſt hands out of the homeward bound
" ſhips before they had made the land, or ar" rived to a place of ſafety; and out of the out-
" ward-bound ſhips, in the proſecution of their " voyages; and praying leave to aſſure the houſe,
" that they do not complain of ſuch captures as
" are the unavoidable conſequence of a war, but
" of ſuch only as have been occaſioned by a want
" of due care for the protection of trade, which " has, during the whole war, laboured under an " apparent neglect and diſregard; nor ſhall they " ever be induced, either by their paſt misfor-
" tunes or future apprehenſions, ſo far to forget

" their duty to his majeſty and the legiſlature, as " once to repine or murmur at the preſent war " with Spain, which his majeſty and theſe king- " doms are ſo neceſſarily engaged in, and upon " the vigorous proſecution of which the intereſt " of the Britiſh trade and the freedom of naviga- " tion ſo evidently depend; and praying the " houſe to take the premiſes into their conſidera- " tion, that ſuch proviſion may be made for the " future protection of the trade and Navigation " of theſe kingdoms as the houſe ſhall think fit; " and that the petitioners may be heard by them- " ſelves or council thereupon."

This petition was cloſely followed by another of the ſame tendency from the city of London, which was preſented by the ſheriffs on the twenty-ſixth of the ſame month; ſetting forth, " that, " at a time when a feeble enemy holds our naval " power in deriſion, and the conduct and diſtri- " bution of our ſhips of war are the ſubject of " univerſal cenſure, to remain unconcerned and " ſilent, would ill become the repreſentative body " of this great metropolis, which ſo ſenſibly " ſhares in every public misfortune; that the peti- " tioners therefore beg leave humbly to repreſent " to the houſe, that it is with the utmoſt grief " they have ſeen the navigation and commerce of " theſe kingdoms ſo conſtantly interrupted, on " our own coaſts, and almoſt in ſight of our " late powerful naval armaments, by the priva- " teers of Spain, to the ruin of our trade, the " enriching of the enemy, and the diſgrace of " the Britiſh name; that the loſſes hereby " ſuſtained, the manner in which applications " for redreſs have been often evaded, and other " numerous inſtances of negligence and diſre- " gard of the commercial intereſt of theſe king- " doms, (whilſt a neighbouring nation is every " day converting theſe errors to their own ad- " vantage) have given the petitioners the moſt " dreadful apprehenſions, leſt our trade, the " foundation of our wealth and power, and which " has formerly enabled us to maintain the liber- " ties of Europe, ſhould be transferred into the " hands of our potent and dangerous rival; that " the petitioners cannot but obſerve with concern, " that thoſe ſhips of war, which they might rea- " ſonably have expected would have been em- " ployed in protecting our trade, have not " contributed either thereto, or to the intereſt " or honour of the nation: and that the peti- " tioners have ſeen a powerful and well provided " fleet remaining inactive in our own ports, or " more inglorioufly putting to ſea, without the " appearance of any enterprize in view, or even " the poſſibility of meeting an enemy worthy of " its attention, whilſt our trading veſſels have " been daily expoſed in the Britiſh channel and " ſoundings to the privateers of a place ſo incon- " ſiderable as St. Sebaſtian's. And that, not- " withſtanding theſe various ſubjects of com- " plaint, the petitioners beg the houſe to believe, " that they do not hereby intend to ſignify the " leaſt deſire of peace with Spain, until his ma- " jeſty ſhall, by a vigorous proſecution of the " war, have obtained from the enemy an ample " acknowledgment of his people's juſt rights, " and the poſſeſſion of ſuch a pledge as may ef- " fectually ſecure the freedom of navigation to " our lateſt poſterity: and therefore intreating " the houſe to take the calamitous ſtate of trade, " occaſioned by the grievances complained of, " into their conſideration: and that the houſe " would be pleaſed to make ſuch a proviſion, for " the future ſecurity of the navigation and com- " merce of theſe kingdoms, as they ſhall think " fit.

In conſequence of theſe petitions, the Lord-mayor and Sir John Barnard were ordered to prepare and bring in a bill for protecting and ſecuring the trade and navigation of this kingdom in times of war. The citizens and merchants were ſo elated at this order of the houſe, that they teſtified the ſame by the moſt public rejoicings.

On the twenty ſixth of June 1742, Sir Robert Godſchall, Lord-mayor of the city of London, died of a violent fever. He was ſucceeded as mayor by George Heathcote, eſq; and as member of parliament, by William Calvert, eſq;

At a court of common-council held the twenty-firſt of October, the following inſtructions were drawn up, approved of, and ordered to be preſented to the city repreſentatives in parliament.

To the right hon. George Heathcote, eſq; Lord-mayor, Sir John Barnard, knt. and alderman, Mr. alderman Lambert, and Mr. alderman Calvert.

" In the preſent unhappy conjuncture, when " the domeſtic enemies of theſe kingdoms are " flattering themſelves, that, by the late aſtoniſh- " ing example of unpuniſhed treachery, and " corruption, the nation muſt be driven to deſ- " pair, and abandon all thoughts of any future " efforts for the ſupport and ſecurity of the pub- " lic liberty; We, the Lord-mayor, aldermen and " commons of the city of London, in common- " council aſſembled, think it our indiſpenſible " duty to declare, in this moſt ſolemn manner, " that as we were fully ſenſible how advantage- " ouſly this nation has hitherto been diſtinguiſh- " ed, by its freedom, from the reſt of mankind, " we will not, by ſupineneſs, reſign our claim to " ſo invaluable a bleſſing; but that we will ſtill " perſevere, with the ſame uniform and unſhaken " reſolution, againſt the malice of our undiſ- " guiſed enemies, and the falſhood of our pre- " tended friends, whoſe ſhameful union and con- " federacy againſt their country, at the ſame " time that they ſerve to increaſe our apprehen- " ſions, ſhall redouble our attention and zeal for " the defence and preſervation of all our conſti- " tutional rights. We, therefore, addreſs our- " ſelves to you, our worthy repreſentatives in " parliament, and, with the moſt grateful ac- " knowledgments of your former meritorious " conduct, take this occaſion of laying our ſen- " timents before you.

" We cannot but lament that means have been " uſed to defeat our hopes of a ſpeedy and effec- " tual reformation. We had long ſeen the great " concerns of the kingdom all perverted to the ſin- " gle purpoſe of maintaining power in one hand.

With

" With this pernicious deſign our wealth has " been exhauſted, our trade neglected, our honour
" proſtituted, and the independency of parlia" ment invaded; at length, after a continued
" ſtruggle of twenty-years, when we had reaſon
" to expect that the happy period of our deliver" ance was at hand, that each offender would " have received the chaſtiſement due to his " crimes, and ſuch regulations have been eſta-
" bliſhed as would have ſecured us from the like
" enormities in time to come, how great was our
" ſurprize to find, that ſome of thoſe, who, un" der a maſk of integrity, and by diſſembling a
" zeal for their country, had long acquired the " largeſt ſhare of its confidence, ſhould, with" out the leaſt heſitation or ſeeming remorſe,
" greedily embrace the firſt occaſion to diſgrace
" all their former conduct, and, in defiance of " the moſt ſolemn proteſtations, openly conſpire,
" with the known enemies of the public, to de-
" fraud the nation of that juſtice and ſecurity,
" which they themſelves had ſo often and ſo pe-
" remptorily declared was indiſpenſibly neceſſary
" to its preſervation and ſupport?

" Amidſt theſe melancholy conſiderations, we " have the ſatisfaction to find, that the general
" cenſure and indignation have ſo immediately
" purſued theſe betrayers of their truſt, that few
" have been miſled by their pretences; and that " they ſucceed in the public hatred thoſe they " have ſcreened, though they have not, as yet,
" ſucceeded to their power. And we may reaſon-
" ably expect a more fortunate iſſue in the ap-
" proaching ſeſſions, ſince many of thoſe crimes
" which have ſo long excited the juſt reſentment
" of the public, are now inconteſtibly evinced
" to all mankind, notwithſtanding the various " artifices put in practice to conceal and protect " them: for it cannot now be a doubt that " our troops, under the extremeſt diſtreſs in " an unhealthy climate, were defrauded, by " colluſive contracts, of their juſt pay; that the " power of an adminiſtration hath been ap" plied to corrupting of returning officers, the " purchaſing of votes, and the ſubverſion of " charters; and that immenſe ſums of that pub" lic treaſure, which was appropriated to the " ſupport of the civil government, have been " partly ſecreted, and partly converted to purpo-
" ſes injurious to the dignity of the crown, and " deſtructive of our happy conſtitution.

" We therefore moſt earneſtly entreat, that,
" at this important criſis, you will not ſuffer
" yourſelves to be amuſed with diſtant objects,
" which of late have been ſo ſpeciouſly dreſſed up
" with all the arts of fallacy and deluſion; but,
" whatever plea may be offered in behalf of our
" ſafety abroad, be perſuaded that ſecurity at " home is the firſt point which merits your con-
" ſideration; that the gratifying the reaſonable
" deſires of the people, who aſk no more than " juſtice and the re eſtabliſhment of the Britiſh
" conſtitution, can alone give weight and ſucceſs
" to his majeſty's councils and meaſures, can " alone recover the loſt confidence of our antient
" allies, and ſtrike terror into our moſt powerful
" enemies. We therefore apply to you now,
" with all the urgent ſollicitations of men fully
" convinced that their all is at ſtake, the rights " and privileges of ourſelves and poſterity, with " every valuable advantage purchaſed for us by " the blood of our anceſtors, conjuring you to
" poſtpone every other conſideration, particu" larly the ſupplies for the current ſervice of the " enſuing year, till you have renewed the ſecret
" committee of enquiry; procured an effectual
" bill to reduce and limit the number of place-
" men in the houſe of commons; reſtored the " frequency of elections, and reſtrained the abuſe
" of power in returning officers. Yet, after " theſe ſalutary proviſions, when you ſhall think
" fit to grant the ſupplies, at the ſame time have
" ſome regard to their application. A nation
" burdened with taxes, oppreſſed with debts,
" and almoſt exhauſted by one laviſh adminiſtra-
" tion, can but ill undergo a freſh profuſion of " its treaſure in the parade of numerous land
" armies, and the hire of foreign forces, without
" the appearance of any ſervice in the behalf of " his majeſty's Britiſh dominions.

" Theſe points alone can give ſafety to the " kingdom, and appeaſe the general diſcontents;
" and the vigorous proſecution of them, in con-
" currence with all true friends of the public,
" (independent of party, or of any other invi" dious diſtinction whatſoever) will inſure to
" yourſelves the laſting favour and affection of " this great metropolis."

On the twentieth of December a cauſe was tried before lord chief juſtice Willes, in which the company of weavers were plaintiffs, and Mr. Thomas Handycraft, defendant, who refuſed to be of the livery of the company, not being free of the city. It appearing, however, that every member of a company is eligible to the livery, though not free of the city, a verdict was given in favour of the plaintiffs.

Another cauſe was tried on an action brought by one Anthony Wright againſt William Ayres, the leſſee of the toll on London-bridge, who had received and inſiſted upon a preſcriptive right to receive two-pence for the paſſage of each cart laden with one ton weight, or upwards, paſſing over the bridge. After many learned arguments on both ſides, it appearing by the evidence that the uſage had been to take one-penny only for a a cart with two horſes, although laden with a ton or upwards, a verdict was given in favour of the plaintiff.

CHAP.

CHAPTER XLII.

Birth of prince William Henry. City addreſs to his majeſty on the occaſion. French invaſion intended. War declared againſt France. Combination of journeymen taylors. Proclamation for detecting ſtreet-robbers. Act of parliament for better lighting the city. Fire at Shad-Thames. Letter from the duke of Newcaſtle to the Lord-mayor concerning a rebellion. Proclamation againſt papiſts. The city guarded by the militia. Voluntary ſubſcriptions for the army. Aſſociation of lawyers. Quakers ſubſcribe to the army. A regiment of lawyers The rebels defeated. Duke of Cumberland preſented with the freedom of the city. Execution of the earl of Kilmarnock, lord Balmerino, Charles Ratcliffe, and Simon lord Lovat. Corporation for clergymens widows. Election of members of parliament. Great fire in Cornhill. Ordinances for electing ſheriffs.

ABOUT the time his majeſty returned from his German dominions, her royal highneſs the princeſs of Wales was ſafely delivered of a prince on the fourteenth of November, who was baptized by the name of William Henry; and his majeſty's daughter, the princeſs Louiſa being married about the ſame time to the prince royal of Denmark, the citizens of London in common council aſſembled, agreed to addreſs his majeſty on theſe ſeveral occaſions. Accordingly on the nineteenth, the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council waited on his majeſty at St. James's, and preſented him with the following congratulations:

" Moſt gracious ſovereign,

" We, your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal " ſubjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and com- " mons, of the city of London, in common-coun- " cil aſſembled, moſt humbly approach your " throne with hearts full of the ſincereſt wiſhes " for the honour and proſperity of your ſacred " perſon and government, and beg leave to offer " our moſt hearty congratulations upon your " ſafe return to theſe your Britiſh dominions.

" Permit us, royal Sir, at the ſame time to ex- " preſs our joy, that your happy arrival hath been " bleſſed with the ſafe delivery of her royal high- " neſs the princeſs of Wales of a prince: an au- " ſpicious omen and further pledge of our future " happineſs by the increaſe of your royal progeny, " to defend our religion, laws, and liberties, and " protect our trade and commerce, always confid- " ing that a race of princes, deſcending from " your majeſty, will be ever mindful to preſerve " theſe bleſſings to our lateſt poſterity.

" We further beg leave to congratulate your " majeſty upon the marriage of your royal daugh- " ter the princeſs Louiſa to the prince royal of " Denmark, by which alliance we have reaſon " to hope that the proteſtant intereſt in Europe " will be more firmly united.

" We ſhall ever think it our indiſpenſable du- " ty to pray, that the hearts and affections of " your loyal ſubjects may be the juſt and grateful " reward of your paternal care and protection; " that your majeſty's reign may be long and glo- " rious over a free, dutiful, and united people; " and that the ſceptre of theſe realms may always " remain in your royal family."

And on the 15th of December, the ſaid court waited on their royal higneſſes the prince and princeſs of Wales, whom they addreſſed in the following manner:

" May it pleaſe your royal highneſſes,

" We, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and com- " mon-council-men of the city of London, hum- " bly beg leave to preſent our moſt hearty con- " gratulations, upon the ſafe delivery and happy " recovery of madam, your royal highneſs, and " the increaſe of your illuſtrious family, by the " birth of another prince; an event, which muſt " greatly contribute to our happineſs, as it " ſtrengthens our preſent conſtitution, and yields " a further proſpect of its continuance in the " proteſtant ſucceſſion of his majeſty's royal " line.

" We cannot ſufficiently expreſs our joy when " we reflect on the many eminent virtues, which, " we promiſe ourſelves, will be tranſmitted from " your royal highneſſes to your poſterity; form- " ed with the ſame generous and benevolent diſ- " poſitions, for which you are ſo univerſally ad- " mired; and inſtructed by the ſame great ex- " amples to pay a dutiful obedience to his ma- " jeſty, and a tender regard for the liberties of " his ſubjects.

" Permit us likewiſe, Sir, to make uſe of this " opportunity, to return you our particular " thanks for the repeated declarations of your " attachment to the intereſts and welfare of our " city, of which you have ſo graciouſly conde- " ſcended to become a member; and with minds " truly ſenſible of the high honour of your " princely patronage and protection, we offer up " our conſtant prayers, that your royal highneſſes " may enjoy all happineſs and proſperity; and " that your deſcendants may ſucceſſively con- " tinue the bleſſings derived from you to the " lateſt poſterity."

On

On the eighteenth of February 1744, his majeſty having informed both houſes of parliament, and the Lord-mayor of London, that he had received undoubted intelligence of the pretender's eldeſt ſon intending to invade this kingdom thro' the ſupport of France, the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council, on this occaſion preſented his majeſty with the following addreſs:

" Moſt gracious ſovereign,

" We, your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal " ſubjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and com- " mons of the city of London, in common coun- " cil aſſembled, having heard, that attempts are " forming by the common diſturbers of the peace " and tranquillity of Europe, in favour of a " popiſh pretender, to interrupt that happineſs " we thankfully enjoy under your majeſty's go- " vernment, humbly beg leave to take this ear- " lieſt opportunity, to expreſs our greateſt con- " cern for, and abhorrence of this indignity in- " tended againſt your majeſty and theſe king- " doms.

" We have no reaſon to doubt, but that, by " the bleſſing of God on your majeſty's arms, " our enemies will be diſappointed in their ex- " pectations. As your majeſty's ſubjects muſt " be too ſenſible of the bleſſings of Liberty, pro- " perty, and the free exerciſe of their religion, " which they enjoy under your moſt auſpicious " reign, to exchange them for a certain arbitrary " and tyrannical government; ſo the loyalty and " unanimity of your faithful ſubjects, will greatly " tend to diſcourage theſe deſperate endeavours " to deſtroy and ſubvert our excellent conſtitu- " tion. We therefore beg leave moſt humbly to " aſſure your majeſty, of our firm and ſincereſt " attachment to your ſacred perſon and govern- " ment, and our preſent happy eſtabliſhment in " church and ſtate; and that no endeavours of " ours ſhall, even at the hazard of our lives and " fortunes, be wanting to fruſtrate theſe attempts, " to the prejudice of both, and to ſecure the laws " and liberties of this country, and the proteſ- " tant ſucceſſion in your majeſty's moſt illuſtrious " houſe, to lateſt generations."

This addreſs was ſoon followed by another from the merchants of the city of London; which runs thus:

" We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal " ſubjects, the merchants of your city of Lon- " don having obſerved, by your majeſty's moſt " gracious meſſage to your parliament, that de- " ſigns are carrying on by your majeſty's enemies, " in favour of a popiſh pretender, to diſturb the " peace and quiet of theſe your majeſty's king- " doms, think it our indiſpenſable duty, not to " omit this opportunity of expreſſing our juſt " reſentment and indignation at ſo raſh an at- " tempt.

" We have too lively a ſenſe of the happineſs " we enjoy in our religion and liberties under " your majeſty's mild and auſpicious reign, and of " the flouriſhing condition of our trade and com- " merce, even in the midſt of war, under your " paternal care and vigilance, not to give your " majeſty the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of our higheſt " gratitude for ſuch invaluable bleſſings; nor " can we doubt, but by the bleſſing of God upon " your majeſty's arms, and the unanimous ſup- " port of your faithful ſubjects, the attempts of " your faithful ſubjects, the attempts of your " enemies will recoil upon themſelves, and end " in their own confuſion.

" We therefore humbly beg leave to declare " to your majeſty our unſhaken reſolution, that " we will, on this critical conjuncture, exert our " utmoſt endeavours for the ſupport of public " credit, and at all times hazard our lives and " fortunes, in defence of your majeſty's ſacred " perſon and government, and for the ſecurity " of the proteſtant ſucceſſion in your royal fa- " mily."

Many other addreſſes were preſented on this occaſion; particularly from the lieutenancy of London, the city of Weſtminſter, Briſtol, Rocheſter, Leiceſter, Poole, the univerſity of Cambridge, and many other ports of the kingdom.

On the 25th of February a proclamation was iſſued, commanding all papiſts to depart the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and within ten miles of the ſame; for confining papiſts and reputed papiſts to their habitations; for ſeizing the arms and horſes from ſuch as refuſe to take the oaths, &c. And for putting the laws in execution againſt the inſtigators of tumultuous proceedings.

On the thirty-firſt of March his majeſty's declaration of war was proclaimed againſt France at the uſual places, and with the accuſtomed ceremonies on ſuch occaſions.

A great number of journeymen ſtay-makers and taylors having entered into a combination not to work for the wages eſtabliſhed by law, and the ſame being repreſented to his majeſty, the privy-council on the eighteenth of September, by his majeſty's command, wrote a letter to the duke of Newcaſtle, Cuſtos Rotulorum of the county of Middleſex, requiring his grace to recommend the juſtices of the peace to carry into execution the act of 7th George I. for preventing all unlawful aſſemblies and combinations. Letters to the ſame purport were ſent to the conſtable of the Tower, and to the Lord-mayor of London. In conſequence of which the juſtices met on the twenty-ſixth, and came to the following reſolutions: " that if any journeyman ſhould refuſe to work " for the wages ſettled by act of parliament, he " ſhould be committed to hard labour for two " months: and that the maſter that paid more " than the act allowed, ſhould forfeit five " pounds."

The ſtreets of the city of London were this winter ſo peſtered with the moſt daring ſtreet-robbers, that it became dangerous to thoſe whoſe buſineſs called them out after dark. And to ſuch a pitch of inſolence had they ariſen, that they went to the houſes of the peace officers, and made them beg pardon for endeavouring to apprehend them; and many, whoſe lives they had threatened, were obliged to ſecure themſelves by taking ſhelter in Bridewell.

For the immediate ſuppreſſion of theſe deſperate villains, and the preſervation of the citizens, the Lord-mayor and aldermen, on the thirteenth of October, waited on his majeſty with the following addreſs:

" Moſt gracious ſovereign,

" We, your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal " ſubjects, the court of Lord-mayor and alder- " men of the city London, having taken into " conſideration the many diſorders and robberies " which have been committed within theſe few " weeks laſt paſt, in the ſtreets of your loyal " metropolis, beg leave to approach your throne, " and humbly to repreſent to your moſt ſacred " majeſty,

" That divers confederacies of great numbers " of evil diſpoſed perſons, armed with bludgeons, " piſtols, cutlaſſes, and other dangerous weapons, " infeſt not only the private lanes and paſſages, " but likewiſe the publick ſtreets and places of " uſual concourſe, and commit moſt daring out- " rages upon the perſons of your majeſty's good " ſubjects, whoſe affairs oblige them to paſs thro' " the ſtreets, by terrifying, robbing, and wound- " them; and theſe facts are frequently at ſuch " times as we heretofore deemed hours of ſe- " curity.

" That the officers of juſtice have been re- " pulſed in the performance of their duty, ſome " of whom have been ſhot at, ſome wounded, " and others murdered, in endeavouring to diſ- " cover and apprehend the ſaid perſons; by which " means many are intimidated from duly execut- " ing their offices, and others put in manifeſt " danger of their lives.

" Theſe unhappy circumſtances do, as we ap- " prehend, tend greatly to weaken the hands " of the magiſtrates, and render the laws ineff- " fectual.

" It is to us a moſt alarming conſideration, " and matter of great grief, that theſe crimes " ſhould, in ſo ſhort a time, have grown to ſo " great a height; and we beg leave humbly to " aſſure your majeſty, that we will vigorouſly, " and with the utmoſt diligence, apply ourſelves " to reſtrain theſe violences, and detect the au- " thors of them.

" Permit us, Sir, to expreſs our hopes, that " a ſpeedy, rigorous, and exemplary execution " of the laws upon the perſons of offenders, " as they ſhall fall into the hands of juſtice, may, " under your majeſty's princely wiſdom, conduce " greatly to the ſuppreſſing thoſe enormities, by " ſtriking terror into the wicked, and prevent- " ing others from entering into ſuch evil courſes.

" We thought it our indiſpenſible duty to lay " theſe facts, and our apprehenſions upon them, " before your majeſty; not doubting but we ſhall " receive effectual ſupport, and your good ſub- " jects all poſſible ſecurity, from your majeſty's " authority and fatherly protection."

In conſequence of this addreſs his majeſty, on the ninth of January, iſſued a proclamation, promiſing a reward of one hundred pounds over and above all other rewards, to be paid by the lords of the treaſury, for the apprehenſion of any perſon or perſons found guilty of robbery or murder.

This was followed by an act of parliament obtained by the citizens for the better enlightening the city, which in the preamble ſets forth as follows: " Whereas to prevent the committing of " murders, robberies, burglaries, felonies, and " other crimes of a heinous nature, in the night " ſeaſon, in the ſtreets, lanes, paſſages, and " courts within the city of London, and the li- " berties thereof, an act of parliament was made " and paſſed in the ninth year of the reign of his " preſent majeſty, for the better enlightening the " ſtreets of the city of London: And whereas " the proviſions made by the ſaid act have been " found defective, and inſufficient to anſwer the " ſeveral ends and purpoſes thereby intended: " wherefore, and to the end the good purpoſes " intended by the ſaid act may be carried on, " and fully executed, for the ſafety and preſerva- " tion of the citizens and inhabitants of the ſaid " city, the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty " of the city of London, in common-council aſ- " ſembled, do moſt humbly beſeech your majeſty " that it may be enacted; and be it enacted by " the king's moſt excellent majeſty, by and with " the advice and conſent of the lords ſpiritual " and temporal, and commons, in this preſent " parliament aſſembled, and by the authority of " the ſame, that ſuch a convenient and ſufficient " number of glaſs lamps, of ſuch ſort and " faſhion, as the mayor, aldermen, and com- " monalty of the ſaid city, in common-council " aſſembled, ſhall think proper and requiſite, " ſhall from time to time be erected, fixed, ſet " up, and lighted, in ſuch parts and places, " within the ſaid city or liberties thereof, as to " the ſaid mayor, aldermen, and commonalty, " in common-council aſſembled, ſhall ſeem meet " and expedient."

It likewiſe enacted, that the rates for defraying the charges of erecting, maintaining, &c. the ſaid lights ſhall be ſettled by the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council, ſo as they do not exceed ſix-pence in the pound, nor fifty ſhillings on any one perſon in the whole, in any one year: with a right of appeal to the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen in caſe of being aggrieved, which appeal to be determined in ten days without fee. And it likewiſe enacts, that houſes let into tenements ſhall pay to the lamps; that the aſſeſſment ſhall be allowed the tenant by his landlord.

Another act of parliament paſſed this year for preventing the abuſes and annoyances ariſing from carts within the weekly bills of mortality. In which it was enacted, " That no perſon ſhall drive " any cart within the bills of mortality, un- " leſs the owner place upon ſome conſpicuous " part the name of the owner, and the number " of ſuch cart, in order that the driver may be " the more eaſily convicted for any diſorder.

" Every owner of ſuch cart reſiding within the " limits aforeſaid, ſhall enter his name and place " of

" of abode, with the commiſſioners for licenſing " hackney-coaches, for which entry he ſhall pay " one ſhilling and no more.

" If any perſon drive any cart within the limits " aforeſaid, not numbered and entered as before " directed, he ſhall forfeit forty ſhillings, and it " ſhall be lawful for any perſon to ſeize and de- " tain the cart, or any of the horſes, till ſuch " penalty be paid.

" It ſhall be lawful for any perſon uſing any " cart as aforeſaid, having the wheels of the " breadth of ſix inches when worn, to have the " ſame bound with ſtreaks of iron, provided " ſuch ſtreaks be of the breadth of ſix inches, " and made flat, and not ſet on with roſe-headed " nails." And by ſtat. 30 Geo. II. it was fur- ther enacted, " That the juſtices of the peace " of the city of London ſhall, at the general " ſeſſions of the peace holden for the city of " London next after the twenty-fourth of June " in every year, aſſeſs prices for the carriage of " goods taken up in the city of London, as from " the city of London to the city of Weſtminſter, " or any other place not exceeding the diſtance " of three miles from the city of London; and " make rules for governing ſuch carts. &c. and " the drivers; and compel payment for carriage " of goods by ſuch licenſed carts, &c. accord- " ing to the prices aſſeſſed, annex penalties for " breach of any ſuch rules, not exceeding five " pounds for any one offence, as to the major " part of the juſtices at ſuch ſeſſions ſhall ſeem " meet; and at any other ſuch ſeſſions of the " peace in London, alter ſuch rules, and make " new ones. All which rules ſhall, within thirty " days after, be printed and affixed in ſome pub- " lic places of the city of London, and be made " public in ſuch manner as the ſaid juſtices in " ſeſſions ſhall order.

" No perſons ſhall wilfully obſtruct the paſſing " and repaſſing in any public ſtreets, lanes, or " paſſages, within the limits beforementioned, " or ſet any empty caſks or other veſſels in any " ſuch ſtreets, &c. (except for ſuch time only as " is neceſſary for the removing thereof to or from " any place, or for the trimming thereof) or ſet " any empty cart or other carriage, in any ſuch " ſtreet, &c. except only during ſuch time as " any ſuch cart, &c. is plying for hire in the " places appointed by the perſons authorized to " appoint the ſtandings thereof, and except " during ſuch time as any ſuch cart, &c. is " waiting in any ſuch ſtreet, &c. to load and " unload goods or commodities, or to take up or " ſet down a fare; and every perſon offending " and convicted by confeſſion, or by oath of one " witneſs, before any juſtice of the peace of the " county, &c. where ſuch offence is committed, " ſhall, for every offence, forfeit any ſum not " exceeding twenty ſhillings, and not leſs than " five ſhillings, or be committed to the houſe of " correction or ſome other priſon of the county, " &c. in which the offence is committed, or the " offender apprehended, to be kept to hard la- " bour for any time not exceeding one kalendar " month, as ſuch juſtice ſhall order.

" No perſon ſhall ply for hire with any hack- " ney coach, cart, or other wheel carriage, in " Bridge-ſtreet, Parliament-ſtreet, George ſtreet, " St. Margaret-ſtreet, or Abingdon-ſtreet, in the " the city of Weſtminſter, or ſtay in any of the " ſaid ſtreets, with any wheel carriage, longer " than is reaſonable to wait to take or ſet down " his fare, or to load and unload goods; and " every perſon having the care of ſuch wheel car- " riage offending, and being convicted either by " confeſſion or by oath of one witneſs, before " any juſtice of peace for Weſtminſter, ſhall for " every offence, forfeit any ſum not exceeding " twenty ſhillings, and not leſs than five ſhillings, " or be committed to the houſe of correction in " Weſtminſter, to be kept to hard labour for " any time not exceeding one kalendar month, as " ſuch juſtice ſhall order.

" If the driver of any carriage in the cities of " London or Weſtminſter, or in any public ſtreet " or common highway within the weekly bills of " mortality, by negligence or wilful miſbehaviour " interrupt the free paſſage in any of the public " ſtreets in London or Weſtminſter, or in any " public ſtreets or common highways within the " ſaid weekly bills of mortality, every ſuch dri- " ver, being convicted either by confeſſion of, " or by oath of one witneſs, before any juſtice " of the county, &c. wherein the offence is com- " mitted, ſhall for every offence forfeit any ſum " not exceeding twenty ſhillings, or be commit- " ed to the houſe of correction, or ſome other " priſon of the county, &c. in which ſuch of- " fence is committed, or the offender apprehend- " ed, to be kept to hard labour for any time not " exceeding one kalendar month, as ſuch juſtice " ſhall order."

On the fourteenth of May 1745, a fire broke out at a ſail-makers in Shad Thames, occaſioned by a pot of tar boiling over, which not only con- ſumed the ſhop in which it began, but being cloſe to the river, communicated itſelf to the Berwick, captain Kemp, a ſhip of three hundred tons, which it burnt to the water's edge, together with ſeveral lighters; and the flames were ſo ra- pid on ſhore, that in leſs than three hours near thirty houſes were entirely deſtroyed, beſides a great number which were conſiderably damaged.

On the tenth of June Edward Gibbon, alder- man of Vintry ward, begged permiſſion of the court to reſign his gown on account of his con- ſtant reſidence in the country; which being grant- ed, he was ſucceeded in his office by Criſp Gaſ- coigne, eſq;

On the fifth of September, the Lord-mayor received a letter, in his majeſty's name, from the duke of Newcaſtle, informing him that one of the pretender's ſons had erected a ſtandard in Scotland, and that a great number of people had aſſembled together in a rebellious manner; at the ſame time recommending his lordſhip to uſe his utmoſt care and vigilance for the preſervation of peace and quietneſs throughout his juriſdiction.

On the receipt of this letter, the Lord-mayor and aldermen addreſſed his majeſty on his ſafe ar- rival from Germany, and on the conqueſt of Cape Breton; and aſſured him that they would ſupport and defend his perſon and government, even at the hazard of their lives and fortunes.

Two

Two days after a proclamation was iſſued, commanding all papiſts and reputed papiſts to depart from the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and from within ten miles of the ſame; and for confining all papiſts and reputed papiſts to their habitations; and for putting in execution the laws againſt riots and rioters.

On the tenth of September, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, attended by the ſheriff, recorder, and all the city officers, waited on his majeſty at Kenſington, and preſented him with the following addreſs:

" Moſt gracious ſovereign,

" We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal " ſubjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and com- " mons of the city of London, in common-coun- " cil aſſembled, beg leave to approach your ſa- " cred perſon, and with the ſincereſt joy to con- " gratulate your majeſty upon your ſafe and hap- " py return to theſe your Britiſh dominions.

" Permit us, moſt gracious ſovereign, at the " ſame time, with the warmeſt ſentiments of loy- " alty and affection to your majeſty, to expreſs " our grateful returns to heaven for the bleſſing " upon your majeſty's arms in the conqueſt of the " iſland and forts of Cape Breton; a place of the " greateſt conſequence to this nation, as it ſe- " cures to your majeſty's ſubjects a free and unin- " terrupted trade in America, and ptotects them " from the inſults of a dangerous and inveterate " enemy. And we entirely rely upon your royal " patronage and protection, to ſecure to theſe " kingdoms the perpetual enjoyment of this in- " valuable acquiſition.

" The raſh and daring attempts of the pro- " feſſed enemies of this nation, in favour of a " popiſh and abjured pretender, have filled the " hearts of us, your loyal citizens, with the ut- " moſt abhorrence and deteſtation. And we beg " leave to give your majeſty the moſt ſolemn aſ- " ſurances, that we will be ready upon all occa- " ſions to ſacrifice all that is dear and valuable " to us, in defence of your majeſty's royal per- " ſon and family, and in ſupport of our happy " conſtitution both in church and ſtate."

The merchants of London the day following went in a cavalcade of one hundred and forty coaches, and preſented his majeſty with a moſt dutiful and loyal addreſs on the ſame occaſion. And ſo determined were thay to ſupport the public credit, that above eleven hundred of the moſt conſiderable merchants, traders, and proprietors of the public funds ſubſcribed their names to the following agreement: " We, the underſigned " merchants. and others, being ſenſible how ne- " ceſſary the preſervation of public credit is at " this time, do hereby declare, that we will not " refuſe to receive bank notes in payment of any " ſum of money to be paid us; and we will uſe " our utmoſt endeavours to make all our pay- " ments in the ſame manner."

The citizens took all neceſſary precautions for maintaining their juſt rights, privileges and properties, in oppoſition to the attempts of the pretender and his French abettors. The militia were muſtered, and brought upon duty to guard the city gates both night and day. The moſt ſubſtantial citizens, eſpecially young gentlemen of fortune, merchants and tradeſmen, entered into ſeveral aſſociations, learned the military exerciſe, and provided themſelves with proper accoutrements and arms, in defence of their king and country. The very lawyers thought it time to exert their courage; and on the twenty-third of November they, preceded by the lord-chancellor, the chief juſtices, and maſter of the rolls, the chief baron, and the reſt of the judges, proceeded from Weſtminſter-hall in a train of near two hundred coaches, and preſented their addreſs and aſſociation in defence of his majeſty's ſacred perſon and government, and of the proteſtant ſucceſſion in his royal family; and promiſed to concur in any meaſure conducive to the great end of it, at the hazard of their lives and fortunes. This addreſs was ſigned by the lord-chancellor, the ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, the judges of the ſeveral courts, and 369 gentlemen of the law.

The quakers likewiſe raiſed a ſum of money among their own people, to purchaſe woollen waiſtcoats for the ſoldiers to wear under their cloathing when obliged to keep the field in winter; and the ſame was tranſmitted to the army in the north.

At a court of Lord-mayor and common-council held on the the third of December, it was unanimouſly agreed to ſubſcribe 1000l. out of the chamber of London, towards the relief, ſupport, and encouragement of ſuch ſoldiers, as then were, or ſhould thereafter be employed in his majeſty's ſervice during the winter ſeaſon, towards the ſuppreſſion of the then unnatural rebellion. By this and a voluntary ſubſcription paid into the chamberlain's office at Guildhall, there was raiſed a ſufficient ſtock to provide 12,000 pair of breeches, 12,000 ſhirts, 10,000 woollen caps, 10,000 pair of woollen ſtockings, 1000 blankets, 12,000 pair of woollen gloves, and 9000 pair of woollen ſpatterdaſhes, which were immediately converted to the uſe of the army.

On the ſeventh of December another proclamation was iſſued for diſcovering, apprehending, and bringing to trial all jeſuits and popiſh prieſts, who ſhould be found after the ninth of that inſtant, in the cities of London and Weſtminſter, or the borough of Southwark, or within ten miles of the ſame, with a reward of one hundred pounds to thoſe who ſhould diſcover or apprehend, any ſuch jeſuit or popiſh prieſt.

The next day a great number of lawyers met in the middle Temple-hall, and agreed to form themſelves into a regiment, under the command of lord-juſtice Willes, for the defence of the royal family, in ſuch manner as his majeſty ſhould think proper within the cities of London and Weſtminſter; to be denominated, " the aſſo- " ciated regiment of the law, for the defence of " the royal family, and the preſervation of the " conſtitution in church and ſtate." This was ſo well received by the king, that the lord-chief juſtice next day took his commiſſion as colonel of the ſaid regiment.

In

In conſequence of the great progreſs made by the rebels, who had, by forced marches, and avoiding the rout of his majeſty's forces under general Wade, advanced as far as Derby in their way to London, the diſaffected in and about the metropolis were ſo ſpirited up, that they publickly declared their ſentiments; and ſeveral treaſonable papers, called the pretender's declarations, were put under the doors of peoples houſes, and dropped on the parade in St. James's Park.

Matters at laſt came to ſuch a criſis, that a camp was ordered to be formed on Finchley Common, to cover the metropolis, and to make a ſtand in caſe of need. Accordingly, on the ninth of December a large train of artillery ſet out from the Tower, for that place, with a preſumption that his majeſty intended to repair thither in perſon, and erect his royal ſtandard for aſſembling together all his faithful ſubjects able to bear arms.

It was owing to theſe vigorous proceedings that the pretender and his rebel crew altered their opinions, and inſtead of advancing to London, determined to return into Scotland, whither they precipitately fled by the way they had come. His royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland, however, cloſely purſued, and gained a complete victory over them boyond the Spey and near Culloden, in the highlands; and on the twenty-firſt of December he, with his whole army, inveſted Carliſle, and on the thirtieth, the garriſon ſurrendered at diſcretion. The priſoners, amounting to about four hundred, were diſtributed in different goals in England, and the duke immediately returned to London, which he entered amidſt the moſt joyful acclamations of the people.

On the twenty-third of January 1746 the new common-council began the year with a petition to parliament for leave to bring in a bill to take off the negative voice of the court of aldermen; and at the ſame time they unanimouſly agreed to preſent his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland with the freedom of the city of London in a gold box. And on advice being received of the total defeat of the rebels by his royal highneſs, the Lord-mayor and aldermen, and the common-council, and the merchants, &c. of the city of London, reſpectively addreſſed his majeſty with their moſt ſincere congratulations on that happy event.

On the twenty-ninth of September, when the new Lord-mayor was elected, Sir Richard Hoare, knt. who had governed the city the preceding troubleſome year, addreſſed the livery as follows:

" Gentlemen,

" I take this opportunity before I quit my " preſent ſtation, to return you my hearty thanks " for having honoured me with ſo great a truſt, " and for your indulgence to me in the execution " of it: in which I can preſume to claim no " merit to myſelf, any further, than that my en- " deavours have been ſincere to diſcharge my " duty in ſuch a manner, as might beſt intitle me " to your eſteem. Your welfare, gentlemen, has " been my chief concern. Your approbation " will be my higheſt honour."

The rebellion being quelled, it now became abſolutely neceſſary to make ſome examples of juſtice. In conſequence of which bills of indictment for high treaſon were found by the county of Surry againſt the earls of Kilmarnock and Cromartie, and the lord Balmerino. Theſe noblemen were tried by their peers in Weſtminſter-hall, the lord chancellor preſiding as lord high ſteward on the occaſion.

Kilmarnock and Cromatie confeſſed their crime, and, in pathetic ſpeeches, recommended themſelves to his majeſty's mercy. Lord Balmerino pleaded not guilty; he denied his having been at Carliſle at the time mentioned in the indictment; but this exception was over-ruled: after this he moved a point of law in arreſt of judgment, and was allowed to be heard by his council. Being told, however, that this plea was altogether frivolous, he thought proper to acquieſe; and ſentence of death was paſſed upon him and his two aſſociates. Cromartie's life was ſpared, but the other two were beheaded on Tower-hill on the eighteenth of Auguſt.

About ſix o'clock on the morning of their execution, a thouſand of the foot-guards, a troop of life-guards, and one of horſe grenadier-guards, marched through the city to Tower-hill. They marched in upon the hill from Tower-ſtreet, and the foot threw themſelves into the form of a battledore, the round part incloſing the ſcaffold in the center, and the handle being formed by two lines, extending to the Tower-gate, with a proper ſpace between for the proceſſion to paſs. The horſe-grenadiers and horſe-guards were drawn up in the rear of the foot, with a ſpace between for the commanding officers to traverſe the lines. About nine, the ſheriffs of London (attended by their officers and the executioner) came to view the place of execution, as alſo the houſe to which the lords were to be conducted, two rooms whereof were hung with black. At ten o'clock the block was fixed upon the ſcaffold, and covered with black cloth, with which alſo the ſcaffold was hung; and ſome ſacks of ſaw-duſt were carried up to ſtrew upon it. Soon after, the two coffins were brought on the ſcaffold, covered with black cloth, with gilt nails, &c. On the earl of Kilmarnock's was a plate with this inſcription, viz. " Gulielmus Comes de Kilmar- " nock, decollat. 18 Auguſti, 1746, ætat. ſuæ " 42." And that for lord Balmerino had this inſcription on the plate, viz. " Arthurus Domi- " nus de Balmerino, decollat. 18 Auguſti 1746, " ætat ſuæ 58." In the mean time the ſheriffs went to the Tower, and, after knocking at the gate, were admitted; and the priſoners, on their giving a receipt, were delivered to them. Soon after this the proceſſion began: and when they had paſſed through the lines into the area of the circle formed by the guards, the paſſage was cloſed, and the troops of horſe drew up behind the foot. The lords were conducted into ſeparate apartments in the houſe, facing the ſteps of the ſcaffold; their friends being admitted to ſee them. The earl of Kilmarnock was attended by the reverend Mr. Foſter, the reverend Mr. Hume, the chaplain of the Tower; and another clergyman of the church of England accompanied lord Balmerino; on entering the door, hearing ſeveral of the ſpectators aſk eagerly, which is lord Balmerino? he anſwered ſmiling, I am lord Balmerino, gentlemen, at your ſervice.

After which lord Balmerino, purſuant to his requeſt, being admitted to confer with the earl, firſt thanked him for the favour, and then aſked "if his lordſhip new of any order ſigned by the "prince (meaning the pretender's ſon) to give no "quarter at the battle of Culloden?" and the earl anſwering, no; the lord Balmerino added, "nor I neither, and therefore it ſeems to be an "invention to juſtify their own murders." The earl replied, "he did not think this a fair inference, "becauſe he was informed, after he was a pri-"ſoner at Inverneſs, by ſeveral officers, that ſuch "an order, ſigned George Murray, was in the "duke's cuſtody"——"George Murray! ſaid "lord Balmerino, then they ſhould not charge it "on the prince." After this he took his leave, embracing lord Kilmarnock, with the ſame kind of noble and generous compliments as he had uſed before, "my dear lord Kilmarnock, ſaid he, I am "only ſorry that I cannot pay this reckoning "alone; once more farewel for ever!" and returned to his own room.

The earl then, with the company kneeling down joined in a prayer delivered by Mr. Foſter; after which having ſat a few moments, and taking a ſecond refreſhment of a bit of bread and a glaſs of wine, he expreſſed a deſire that lord Balmerino might go firſt to the ſcaffold; but being informed that he could not be indulged in this as his lordſhip was named firſt in the warrant, he appeared ſatisfied, ſaluted his friends, and ſaid he ſhould make no ſpeech on the ſcaffold, but deſired the miniſters to aſſiſt him in his laſt moments, and they accordingly, with other friends, proceeded with him to the ſcaffold. The multitude who had been long expecting to ſee him on ſuch an awful occaſion, on his firſt appearing on the ſcaffold dreſſed in black, with a countenance and demeanor, teſtifying great contrition, ſhewed the deepeſt ſigns of commiſeration and pity; and his lordſhip, at the ſame time, being ſtruck with ſuch a variety of dreadful objects at once, the multitude, the block, his coffin, the executioner, the inſtrument of death, turned about to Mr. Hume, and ſaid, "Hume! this is terrible;" though without changing his voice or countenance.

After repeating a ſhort prayer, concluding with a petition for his majeſty king George, and the royal family, in verification of his declaration in his ſpeech, his lordſhip embraced, and took his laſt leave of his friends. The executioner, who before had ſomething adminiſtered to keep him from fainting, was ſo affected with his lordſhip's diſtreſs, and the awfulneſs of the ſcene, that, on aſking him forgiveneſs, he burſt into tears. His lordſhip bid him take courage, giving him at the ſame time a purſe with five guineas, and telling him that he would drop his handkerchief as a ſignal for the ſtroke. He proceeded, with the help of his gentleman, to make ready for the block, by taking off his coat, and the bag from his hair, which was then tucked up under a napkin cap, but this being made up ſo wide as not to keep up his long hair; the making it leſs occaſioned a little delay; his neck being laid bare, tucking down the collar of his ſhirt and waiſtcoat, he kneeled down on a black cuſhion at the block, and drew his cap over his eyes, in doing which, as well as in putting up his hair, his hands were obſerved to ſhake; but, either to ſupport himſelf, or as a more convenient poſture for devotion, he happened to lay both hands upon the block, which the executioner obſerving, prayed his lordſhip to let them fall, leſt they ſhould be mangled or break the blow. He was then told that the neck of his waiſtcoat was in the way, upon which he roſe, and with the help of a friend took it off, and the neck being made bare to the ſhoulders, he kneeled down as before. In the mean time, when all things were ready for the execution, and the bays which hung over the rails of the ſcaffold having, by direction of the colonel of the guard, or the ſheriffs, been turned up that the people might ſee all the circumſtances of the execution; in about two minutes (the time he before fixed) after he kneeled down, his lordſhip dropping his handkerchief, the executioner at once ſevered his head from his body, except only a ſmall part of the ſkin, which was immediately divided by a a gentle ſtroke; the head was received in a piece of red bays, and, with the body, immediately put into the coffin.

While this was doing the lord Balmerino, after having ſolemnly recommended himſelf to the mercy of the Almighty, converſed chearfully with his friends, refreſhed himſelf twice with a bit of bread and a glaſs of wine, and deſired the company to drink to him, acquainting them that he had prepared a ſpeech, which he ſhould read on the ſcaffold, and therefore ſhould there ſay nothing of its contents. The under ſheriff coming into his lordſhip's apartment to let him know the ſtage was ready, he prevented him by immediately aſking if the affair was over with the lord Kilmarnock, and being anſwered, it is, he enquired how the executioner performed his office, and upon receiving the account, ſaid, it was well done; then addreſſing himſelf to the company, he ſaid, "gentlemen, I ſhall detain you no longer;" and with an eaſy unaffected chearfulneſs ſaluted his friends, and haſtened to the ſcaffold, which he mounted with ſuch compoſure of mind as aſtoniſhed the ſpectators. He then took off his coat and waiſtcoat, together with his nekcloth, and threw them on his coffin; putting on a flannel waiſtcoat, which had been provided for the purpoſe, and then taking a plaid cap out of his pocket, he put it on his head, ſaying, he died a Scotchman: after kneeling down at the block, to adjuſt his poſture, and ſhew the executioner the ſignal for the ſtroke, which was dropping his arms, he once more turned to his friends, and took his laſt farewel, and looking round on the croud, ſaid, "perhaps ſome may think my be-"haviour too bold, but remember, Sir, (ſaid he "to a gentleman who ſtood near him) that I "now declare it is the effect of confidence in "God, and a good conſcience, and I ſhould diſ-"ſemble if I ſhould ſhew any ſigns of fear."

Obſerving

Obſerving the axe in the executioner's hand, as he paſſed him, he took it from him, felt the edge, and returning it, clapped the executioner on the ſhoulder to encourage him; he tucked down the collar of his ſhirt and waiſtcoat, and ſhewed him where to ſtrike, deſiring him to do it reſolutely, for in that, ſays his lordſhip, will conſiſt your kindneſs.

He went to the ſide of the ſtage, and called up the warder, to whom he gave ſome money, aſked which was his hearſe, and ordered the man to drive near.

Immediately, without trembling or changing countenance he again knelt down at the block, and having with his arms ſtretch out, ſaid, "O "Lord reward my friends, forgive my enemies, "and receive my ſoul," he gave the ſignal by letting them fall: but his uncommon firmneſs and intrepidity, and the unexpected ſuddenneſs of the ſignal, ſo ſurprized the executioner, that though he ſtruck the part directed, the blow was not given with ſufficient ſtrength to wound him very deep; on which it ſeemed as if he made an effort to turn his head towards the executioner, and the under-jaw fell and returned very quick, like anger and gnaſhing the teeth; but it could not be otherwiſe, the part being convulſed. A ſecond blow immediately ſucceeding the firſt, rendered him, however, quite inſenſible, and a third finiſhed the work. His head was received in a piece of red bays, and with his body, put into the coffin, which, at his particular deſire, was placed on that of the late marquis of Tullibardine's in St. Peter's church in the Tower. They were both interred the ſame evening.

The earl of Kilmarnock was a nobleman of fine perſonal accompliſhments; he had been educated in revolution principles and engaged in the rebellion, partly from the deſperate ſituation of his fortune, and partly from reſentment to the government, on account of his being deprived of a penſion for which he had for ſome time enjoyed. The enemies of doctor Foſter (who attended him after condemnation) pretended that he had all along flattered his lordſhip with the hopes of a pardon, provided he kept up his ſhew of penitence to the laſt. This calumny, for it was probably no other, received ſome countenance by Kilmarnock's raiſing his head after it was laid upon the block, and looking round among the ſpectators; notwithſtanding which, he died as a man and a chriſtian.

The behaviour of Lord Balmerino, on this ſolemn occaſion, though very different from that of Kilmarnock, was far from ſuch as his enemies reported. It was well known he would have accepted of a pardon from the crown, could he have obtained it; but finding all his applications ineffectual, he prepared himſelf for death with great fortitude and reſolution. The moſt accurate obſervers could not diſcover in his eye or geſture the ſmalleſt ſymptom of concern, much leſs of fear; but he was ſo far from being inſenſible, that he was ſeen to check his natural boldneſs leſt the ſpectators ſhould think it indecent. He maintained his principles to the laſt. Kilmarnock ſeemed to be convinced of the guilt of his conduct, but Balmerino had undoubtedly acted upon principle.

On the eighth of December Charles Ratcliff, eſq; commonly called earl of Derwentwater, who had been taken in a ſhip bound to Scotland, was beheaded on Little Tower-hill, near the Minories, in conſequence of a rule of the court of King's-bench, for being concerned in the rebellion in the year 1715; ſentence of death being at that time paſſed againſt him.

As ſoon as he arrived at the ſcaffold, he aſked for the executioner, who coming to him, he took a parcel of gold out of his pocket, and gave it him, ſaying, "I am but a poor man, and there "is ten guineas for you; if I had more I would "give it you, and I deſire you to do your exe-"cution ſo as to put me to the leaſt miſery you "can." He then kneeled down before the block, and, putting his hands together, made a ſhort prayer; after which two of the warders of the Tower came to him, one of whom took off his wig, and the other put a white cap upon his head; and then the unhappy criminal roſe upon his legs, and, with their aſſiſtance, pulled off his coat and waiſtcoat. He turned about and took his leave in a reſpectful manner, of the ſheriffs, and then untied the collar of his ſhirt, which was faſtened with a black ribbon, and began to tuck the collar of his ſhirt down, but not being able to reach far enough behind, he deſired the executioner to do it for him, which he did accordingly. Then, after ſaying a ſhort prayer to himſelf, and croſſing himſelf ſeveral times, he laid his head down upon the block, and deſired the executioner to ſtrike far enough, adding theſe his laſt words, When I ſpread my hands thus, do you take my head off. Which ſignal he gave in leſs than half a minute, when one ſtroke of the axe ſevered his head, except a bit of ſkin, which was cut aſunder at two or three chops. The body then fell down upon the ſcaffold; and the executioner, ſearching his pockets, found half a guinea, a ſilver crucifix and his beads. Four undertaker's men ſtood ready with a piece of red bays to receive the head as it fell off, and the body and head were put into the coffin, and conveyed in a hearſe to the Nags-head in Gray's inn Lane, and ſoon after interred at St. Giles's in the Fields.

Thus fell this unhappy man thirty years, within three days, after his eſcape from Newgate; the principal part of which time he ſpent with the pretender in Italy. He was the youngeſt brother of James earl of Derwentwater, who was beheaded in the year 1716.

This year an hoſpital was founded for relieving poor people afflicted with the ſmall-pox, and for inoculation; and this was the firſt of the kind in Europe. It conſiſted of three houſes; one in Old-ſtreet, for preparing patients for inoculation; another in Frog-lane, Iſlington, when the diſeaſe appeared; and the third in the Lower-ſtreet Iſlington, for patients in the natural way.

On the fifth of February 1747 the bill for naturalizing foreign proteſtants, which had been ſeveral times attempted, being brought again into the houſe of commons, the city petitioned ſtrongly againſt it, which had its effect, and the bill was thrown out.

On the ninth of April Simon, lord Lovat, another Scotch nobleman concerned in the rebellion,

lion, was, purſuant to his ſentence by the houſe of lords, beheaded on Tower-hill: an account of whom with his behaviour after condemnation, we ſhall be a little particular.

When the warrant for the execution of this noble lord was notified to him, he remained uncertain as to his fate, and really ſeemed indifferent to live or die; for though he was preſſed by his friends to throw himſelf at his majeſty's feet, and petition for mercy, he abſolutely refuſed it, ſaying, "he was ſo old and infirm that his life was not "worth aſking."

Through the whole of his conduct after conviction he appeared undaunted, but preſerved his jocoſe ſatirical temper to the very laſt moment of his life. He received the notice of his death-warrant without the leaſt alteration in his countenance, thanked the gentleman who brought it for the favours he had done him, and drank a glaſs of wine to his health; after which he ſat down with him, entertained chearfully a converſation for ſome time, and drank part of a bottle of wine. Next morning being informed of the report, that an engine was to be made for his execution like that called the Maiden, provided many years ago for beheading ſtate criminals in Scotland, he commended the contrivance, for, ſays he, as my neck is very ſhort, the executioner will be puzzled to find it out with his axe; and if ſuch a machine be made, I ſuppoſe it will get the name of lord Lovat's Maiden.

On Monday the ſixth, the major of the Tower came to ſee him, and aſked him how he did. Do, ſays he, why, Sir, I am doing very well; for I am ſitting myſelf for a place where hardly any majors go, and very few lieutenant generals. Next morning he deſired one of the warders to lay a pillow upon the floor at the foot of the bed, that he might try if he could properly perform his part in the tragedy in which he was next Thurſday to be chief actor; and after having kneeled down, and placed his head upon the foot of the bed, he roſe up and ſaid, By this ſhort practice, I believe, I ſhall be able to act my part well enough.

On Wedneſday his lordſhip waked about two o'clock in the morning, and prayed moſt devoutly for ſome time; after which he went to ſleep again, and ſlept till between ſix and ſeven, when he called for the warder to dreſs him as uſual; and, during the remaining part of the day, he not only talked pertinently and ſedately with ſome gentlemen that came to ſee him, both about his own private affairs and the public affairs of the nation, but cracked his jokes merrily with the warders that attended him, the barber that ſhaved him, and almoſt every one that came near him. After eating a hearty dinner, he ſmoaked a pipe, according to cuſtom, and then ſent orders to the cook, to get ſome veal roaſted, that it might be ready to mince for his breakfaſt in the morning.

On Thurſday the ninth, being the fatal day, his lordſhip waked about three o'clock in the morning, and, as he had done the morning before, prayed in a very devout manner for ſome time. At five he got up, called for a glaſs of wine and water, as uſual, and ſet reading in his chair for two hours without ſpectacles; for notwithſtanding his great age, he had never made uſe of any, which was owing it is ſuppoſed, to his ſober and regular way of living; for though he often drank a chearful glaſs, yet he very ſeldom taſted wine without water, and never drank to great exceſs.

All this morning he behaved with his uſual gaiety, without once diſcovering the leaſt ſign of fear or uneaſineſs, as appeared by ſeveral incidents. At eight, he deſired his wig might be ſent to the barber, that he might have time to comb it out in the genteeleſt manner; and having deſired the warder to get him a purſe, to put the gold in, which he deſigned for the executioner, he added, "Let it be a good one, leſt the gentleman ſhould "refuſe it." Upon the warder's bringing two to chuſe, he did not approve much of either; however, he choſe one and ſaid, "Tho' it be none "of the beſt, it is a purſe that no man would "refuſe with ten guineas in it." Between eight and nine, he called for a plate of minced veal, eat heartily, and then having called for ſome wine and water, drank the healths of ſeveral of his friends

In the morning, Mr alderman Alſop, one of the high ſheriffs of London and Middleſex, (the other being ill) attended by the two under ſheriffs and the proper officers, with the executioner, went from the Mitre Tavern in Fenchurch-ſtreet, to the houſe hired for them on Tower-hill. At ten o'clock the block was fixed on the ſcaffold, and his lordſhip's coffin brought, which was covered with black cloth, adorned with coronets, &c. and with this inſcription on the lid, "Simon "Dominus Fraſer de Lovat, decollat. April 9, "1747, ætat. ſuæ 80."

At eleven o'clock, the high ſheriff, with his attendants, went to the Tower, where they knocked at the gate, and demanded the priſoner; and when it was notified to his lordſhip, that the ſheriff was come to demand him, he deſired the company to withdraw a little, till he put up a ſhort prayer. In a few minutes, he called them in again, and ſaid, "gentlemen, I am ready;" and after having got down one pair of ſtairs, being invited by general Williamſon to reſt himſelf a little in his apartment, his lordſhip, upon his entrance, paid his reſpects, in a very polite manner, to the ladies, then to the gentlemen, and talked as freely, and with as little ſeeming concern as if he had been come to an entertainment. After getting down the other pair of ſtairs, he was put into the governor's coach, and carried to the Tower-gate, where he was delivered to the high ſheriff attending, upon his receipt.

From the Tower-gate he was conducted into another coach to a houſe, from the upper rooms of which there was a paſſage to the ſcaffold, and the rooms were lined with black cloth, and hung with ſconces for his lordſhip's reception, which diſmal proſpect produced no alteration in his lordſhip's countenance. After delivering a paper to the ſheriffs, he told them, they might give the word of command when they pleaſed, "For, ſays "he, as I have been an officer in the army many "years, I have been accuſtomed and am ready "to obey command;" and after having ſaid a ſhort prayer on his knees, and drank a little burnt brandy brandy with bitters, he was conducted up the ſcaffold.

As his lordſhip was going up the ſteps to the ſcaffold, he looked round, and obſerving ſuch a prodigious crowd of people upon the hill, he ſaid, "He wondered there ſhould be ſuch a buſtle "about taking off an old grey head, that could "not get up three ſteps without two men to "ſupport it;" and after being upon the ſcaffold, and obſerving one of his friends very much dejected, he clapped him upon the ſhoulder, ſaying, "chear up thy heart, man; I am not afraid, "why ſhouldeſt thou?" then he gave the executioner the purſe with ten guineas in it, recommending to him, to act his part handſomely; for ſays he, "if you do not, and I am able to riſe "again, I ſhall be very angry with you;" and after examining the axe, and viewing his coffin, he ſat down in the chair provided for him, and repeated ſeveral lines from Horace and Ovid.

After which, delivering his cloaths and things to his friends, he kneeled down at the block, telling the executioner, he would ſay a ſhort prayer, and then drop his hankerchief as a ſignal for him to do his buſineſs.

Having placed himſelf too near the block, the executioner deſired his lordſhip to move a little farther back, which he did; and after having placed his head and neck properly on the block, in half a minute he dropped his handkerchief, and the executioner being now, it ſeems, become expert at his buſineſs, ſevered the head from the body at one blow, both of which were put into the coffin, and carried in a hearſe back to the Tower, where, the next day, they were interred.

His lordſhip, who had in France profeſſed himſelf a papiſt, and in Scotland was deſirous to be deemed a proteſtant, pulled off the maſk, after his dead warrant came down, and avowed himſelf a jacobite and a papiſt.

A little after ten o'clock on the morning of his execution, a large high ſcaffold, at the ſouth ſide of the hill, ſuppoſed to contain upwards of four hundred perſons, ſuddenly fell down without giving the leaſt warning: by which accident about twenty perſon's were killed on the ſpot, or died of their wounds; and many others had their limbs and bones broke, or were otherwiſe greatly maimed or wounded.

Courts of judicature were opened in Southwark, and in the north of England, for the trial of thoſe of inferior note. Out of forty-three who were condemned at London, no more than ſeventeen were executed; and in other parts of the kingdom a ſtill leſs number in proportion; but a great many of them were tranſported to America.

About this time a perpetuity paſſed the great ſeal for incorporatig the biſhopric of London, &c. into one body politic, for the relief of poor clergymen's widows and children, within the dioceſe of London, and to hold in mortmain lands of 1500l. per annum.

The thirtieth of June being appointed for the election of repreſentatives to ſerve in parliament for the city of London, a ſmart conteſt aroſe between a liſt ſet up by the corporation, and another by the merchants of London. However, Sir John Barnard, Sir William Calvert, Slingſby Bethel, and Stephen Theodore Janſſen, eſqrs; were declared to have a majority of hands; and on the cloſe of the poll carried the election by as great a majority. Theſe were ſupported by the intereſt of merchants in oppoſition to Sir Daniel Lambert and Sir Robert Ladbroke, who was ſtrongly recommended by the aldermen and common-council.

The ſixpence per chaldron on coals allowed by parliament in aid of the orphan fund, expiring at Michaelmas 1750, the court of common-council, after having agreed on the twenty-ſecond of October laſt, and paſſed a bill on the eighteenth of December, to raiſe 2000l. on the perſonal eſtates of the inhabitants, for the orphan's fund, from Midſummer 1747 to Midſummer 1748, petitioned parliament for a continuation of the ſaid duty. In conſequence of which a bill was brought into the houſe, whereby the ſaid ſixpence per chaldron on coals was continued for the further term of thirty-five years, from and after the thirtieth day of September 1750; under theſe conditions: That the ſaid city, out of the produce of the ſaid impoſition, ſhall pay 3000l. per annum to the mercer's company; and that the revenues of the city ſhall be charged with two thouſand pounds per annum, over and above the 8000l. per annum applied by the fifth and ſixth of William and Mary, for the relief of the orphans; with power to the Lord-mayor and aldermen to pay off the principal debt and intereſt, due upon the act abovementioned. Purſuant to which power the city borrowed 25000l. at the rate of three pounds ſix ſhillings per cent. And the chamberlain, by order of the common-council, dated on the 20th of June 1751, diſcharged the ſum of 21,735l. 17s. 9d. due to the orphan's fund, from the city account, and placed it to the credit of the orphan's fund in diſcharge of the ſame debt. And from this time, by act of common-council, the city has always been aſſeſſed, at Midſummer, from year to year, and paid two thouſand pounds per annum.

On the twenty-fifth of March 1748, about one o'clock in the morning, a moſt dreadful fire broke out in the houſe of one Mr. Eldridge, a peruke-maker, in Exchange-alley, Cornhill. It was at firſt ſaid to begin by the careleſſneſs of a boy placing a candle near ſome wig-boxes in the ſhop; but it afterwards appeared to be occaſioned by a girl living at a green ſtall adjoining to Mr. Eldridge, who had left a candle burning in her ſhed, while ſhe was diverting herſelf by hearing the muſic at a concert in the Swan-tavern. The flames communicated themſelves with ſuch amazing rapidity, that notwithſtanding they had the greateſt ſupply of water and engines, and the buildings in that ſituation were ſo very ſtrong, yet, before twelve o'clock at noon, upwards of one hundred houſes were entirely levelled with the ground. Mr. Eldridge, his wife, and child were burnt; and Mr. Cook, a lodger, was ſo much hurt by leaping out of a window, that he died ſoon after. The maid fortunately ſaved herſelf by leaping out of the two pair of ſtairs window; and the two apprentices eſcaped by getting over the tops of the houſes to the Swan-tavern. Notwithſtanding the utmoſt vigilance was uſed by the magiſtrates and officers to ſuppreſs this dreadful conflagration, yet the leaſt computation made of its deſtruction in effects and merchandize amounted to two hundred thouſand pounds.

Several gentlemen, bankers, and others, immediately ſet about a contribution for the relief of thoſe ſufferers who were real objects of charity, and whoſe claims amounted to 80001. On the nineteenth of April a committee was choſen at a general meeting of the contributors, who appointed alderman Janſſen, eſq; chairman; and on the thirteenth of September following they publiſhed a report of the ſums contributed, and what was paid to each claimant.

On the twenty-eighth of January following, when the ſubſcribers met at Guildhall to examine into the diſpoſal of the money collected on this occaſion, the committee reported, that there was remaining in their hands 33001. in balance of the ſaid ſubſcription; and recommended the ſaid remaining balance to be thus diſpoſed of, viz.

For the more expeditious rebuilding the houſes deſtroyed by the above fire, the court of common-council, on the twenty-ninth of March, did empower the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen to permit as many non-freemen as ſhould be found neceſſary to be employed in the execution of the ſaid work.

About eight o'clock on the following evening ſeven priſoners in Newgate for ſmuggling, on the turnkeys opening the door of their apartment, ruſhed on them with piſtols and broom-ſticks, and knocking them down, ran out of the priſon and made their eſcape. An alarm, however, being immediately ſpread, five of them were retaken in the neighbouring ſtreets, and carried back to Newgate; the other two got clear off.

At a court of common-council held the ſeventh of April, a bill paſſed for repealing all former acts, orders and ordinances of their court, touching the nomination and election of ſheriffs of the city of London and county of Middleſex; and for regulating and enforcing ſuch nominations and elections for the future: in which it was ordained, that the right of electing perſons to the office of ſheriffalty ſhall be veſted in the liverymen, and that the general election day of ſheriffs ſhall be the twenty-fourth of June, except it be Sunday, and then on the following day. That the perſon or peſons elected to the ſaid offices, ſhall take the ſame upon him or them on the vigil of St. Michael the archangel, next following the ſaid election, and hold the ſame for and during the ſpace of one whole year from thence next enſuing, and no longer, until ſome other perſons ſhall be duly elected, and ſworn into the ſame office in their ſtead. That at the general elections for ſheriffs, all the aldermen, who have not actually ſerved the ſaid office ſhall be publickly put in nomination, according to their ſeniority, before any commoner: that the Lord-mayor may, at any time, between the fourteenth day of April, and the fourteenth day of June, in every year, nominate in the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen, nine perſons free of this city, to be put in nomination for the ſaid office of ſheriffalty, to the liverymen aſſembled for the election of ſheriffs, who ſhall be put in nomination publickly for the ſaid office, before any other commoner, and in the ſame order as nominated by the Lord-mayor. That if any ſo nominated ſhall, within ſix days after notice thereof, pay 4001. to the chamberlain, and twenty marks towards the maintenance of the miniſters of the ſeveral priſons, together with the uſual fees, every ſuch perſon ſhall be exempt and diſcharged from ſerving the ſaid office, except he ſhall afterwards take upon him the office of an alderman. That any two liverymen having a right to vote at the election of ſheriffs, may publickly nominate any perſon or perſons free of the city for the ſaid office, after the aldermen, and thoſe nominated by the Lord-mayor. That no freemen ſhall be diſcharged from ſuch election or nomination for inſufficiency of wealth, unleſs he voluntarily ſwears himſelf not worth 15000l. in lands, goods, and ſeparate debts, and the ſame be atteſted upon oath by ſix other freemen of credit and reputation. That every perſon elected to the ſaid office ſhall, at the next court of Lord-may and aldermen, give 1000l. bond to the chamberlain, that he will take upon him the ſaid office on the twenty-eighth of September next following. That the perſon elected who does not give bond to ſerve, ſhall, if an alderman or commoner of the Lord-mayor's nomination, forfeit and pay 600l. but if he be neither aldermen nor one nominated by the Lord-mayor, he ſhall forfeit and pay only four hundred pounds to be recovered by action of debt, in the name of the chamberlain of London, to go and be applied to the uſe of the Lord-mayor, commonalty and citizens of London, ſubject to the orders and reſolutions of the court of common-council; except one one hundred pounds to be paid to each of the new ſheriffs out of 800l. if two fines happen to be paid, or fifty pounds to each of the ſaid ſheriffs, ſhould there be only one fine paid unto the chamberlain. That no perſon who has fined ſhall be ever after eligible, except he takes upon him the office of an alderman; neither ſhall any perſon be compelled to ſerve the ſaid office more than once.

On the fifth of May a ceſſation of arms was proclaimed at the royal exchange, and the uſual places in London and Weſtminſter. And on the evening of the fifth of Auguſt, juſt before a great ſtorm of rain, there appeared in the city of London, and parts adjacent, a prodigious multitude of locuſts; which, by a perſon who took particular notice of them, are thus deſcribed: "they "ſaid he, reſemble graſhoppers in ſome particu-

"lars;

" lars; but are different from them in others: " they are more robuſt. Their common length " is about two inches and an half, including the " head and the wings. The body is ſcaly, and " coloured like a ſalmon. The head, neck, and " part of the body are covered with a graſs cowl " or hood. The head is large, and the face " ſtreaked with brown and white. The eyes " are very bright, and of a hazel colour. The " jaws are rounded like a pair of pincers, are " blunt and open, and ſhut horizontally, and are " of a black, horny ſubſtance. The tongue is like " a ſmall French bean ſeed. Their mouths are " large, and their teeth big and ſtrong; and over " the jaws, where they meet, they let fall a thin " cover, to be contracted and folded at pleaſure " to draw in their nouriſhment. Their wings " which come from the neck, underneath are " greeniſh, though ſome are tranſparent and " brown, divided into panes by a ſmall black " line ſpotted and ſcaly like a ſalmon, The " back is green, the belly duſky, and the tail or " ſtem blackiſh at the end. They have fewer " legs than the graſshopper; and in flying they " make a buzzing with their wings like that of " the great black beetle."

At a court of common-council held the twenty-fourth of September, a committee was appointed to examine into the ſtate of the city income, to conſider in what manner it might be capable of being improved, and how to raiſe money for diſcharging the debt due to the fund for the relief of orphans.

A prodigious hurricane of wind happened on the ſecond of December, which laſted for near eight hours. It blew down two houſes entirely, unſtripped the tiling of others, and tore up trees by the roots. By the number of chimnies and ſigns which fell, many perſons who were paſſing the ſtreets were greatly wounded; and a child was killed that ſtood by the fire by the fall of bricks from a chimney. But the moſt conſiderable damage was done to the ſhipping and ſmall craft in the river.

The court of common-council, on the fifteenth, paſſed a bill for raiſing two thouſand pounds upon the perſonal eſtates of the inhabitants of the city and its liberty, towards paying the intereſts of the orphan debt, in purſuance of the power granted by an act of king William and queen Mary, intituled, " An act for the relief of or-" phans, and other creditors of the city of Lon-" don." And on the twenty-ſecond, the committee appointed for enquiring into the laws relating to hawkers and pedlars, came to a reſolution to proſecute all hawkers ſelling wares within the city, or liberties of the ſame, notwithſtanding they ſhould appear to have licenſes.

That the peace in agitation, and the arts of the miniſtry were not ſo pleaſing to the moſt diſcerning part of the people is particularly exemplified in a ſpirited letter wrote by Mr. alderman Heathcote to the Lord-mayor and aldermen, requeſting leave to reſign his gown. It was dated from Bath, on or about the tenth of January, 1748-9; and is as follows:

" My Lord-mayor,

" The general corruption of the age I have " the misfortune to live in, and the frequent de-" teſtable inſtances of apoſtacy from every prin-" ciple of honour, integrity, and public ſpirit of " many of my countrymen, both of my own " and a ſuperior rank, having fully convinced " me, that the endeavours of the few determin-" ed to live and die honeſt men, are fruitleſs " and vain, I have reſolved to ſeek that ſmall " ſhare of happineſs, which is to be acquired in " this venal country, in privacy and retirement, " where I am ſure it is only to be found; and, " therefore, I am determined to return no more " to London, unleſs my own private concerns " call me thither. I cannot think it in any reſpect " right to hold an office I ſhall never attend: " this obliges me to apply to your lordſhip and " court of aldermen for leave to reſign my gown, " and beg the court will accept of this my re-" ſignation, and that your lordſhip will be pleaſ-" ed to iſſue out a precept for the election of " ſome other Perſon to ſerve inſtead of me for " the ward of Walbrook. I moſt ſincerely wiſh " health and felicity to my brethren the alder-" men, and the moſt flouriſhing commerce, with " the full enjoyments of liberty, to the citizens " of London, to whom I am inexpreſſibly oblig-" ed for the many honours and truſts they have " repoſed in me; all which I can, with a ſafe " conſcience, ſay I have faithfully diſcharged, " without ever having once betrayed or deceived.

Remarkable impoſition on the public. Peace proclaimed. Proclamation againſt murderers and robbers. Account of the fire-works on occaſion of the peace. Great fire at Battle-bridge. Another in the Poultry. Aldermen Janſſen preſerves the conſtitution of the city of London by rejecting the aſſiſtance of the military power. Two earthquakes. Act of common-council. for licenſing foreigners. Death and funeral of Frederick prince of Wales. Election of a chamberlain. Remarkable hurricane. Priſoners attempt to eſcape out of Newgate. Act of parliament for preventing thefts and robberies.

THE year 1749 was introduced by one of the moſt extraordinary impoſitions on the public that ever brain projected, or credulity countenanced. The particulars of which cannot be unentertaining to our readers.

About the middle of January the following advertiſement appeared in the London news-papers:

" At the new theatre in the Hay-market, on " Monday next the ſixteenth inſtant, to be ſeen a " perſon who performs the moſt ſurprizing things " following, viz. Firſt, he takes a common walk- " ing cane from any of the ſpectators, and thereon " plays the muſick of every inſtrument now in " uſe, and likewiſe ſings to ſurprizing perfection. " Secondly, he preſents you with a common " wine bottle, which any of the ſpectators may " firſt examine; this bottle is placed on a table in " the middle of the ſtage, and he (without any " equivocation) goes into it in ſight of all the " the ſpectators, and ſings in it; during his ſtay " in the bottle, any perſon may handle it, and ſee " plainly that it does not exceed a common tavern " bottle. Thoſe on the ſtage, or in the boxes " may come in maſked habits (if agreeable to " them) and the performer (if deſired) will in- " form them who they are. Stage 7s. 6d. Boxes " 5s. Pit 3s. Gallery 2s. To begin at half an " hour after ſix o'clock. Tickets to be had at " the theatre. The performance continues about " two hours and a half.—

" N. B. If any gentlemen or ladies, after the " above performances (either ſingly or in com- " pany, in or out of maſk) are deſirous of ſeeing " repreſentation of any deceaſed perſon, ſuch as " huſband or wife, ſiſter or brother, or any inti- " mate friend of either ſex, (upon making a gra- " tuity to the performer) ſhall be gratified by " ſeeing and converſing with them them for ſome " minutes as if alive. Likewiſe (if deſired) " he will tell you your moſt ſecret thoughts in " your paſt life; and give you a full view of " perſons who have injured you, whether dead " or alive. For thoſe gentlemen and ladies who " are deſirous of ſeeing this laſt part, there is a " private room provided. Theſe performances " have been ſeen by moſt of the crowned heads " of Aſia Africa, and Europe and never ap- " peared publick any where but once; but will " wait of any at their houſes, and perform as " above, for five pounds each time. There will " be a proper guard to keep the houſe in due de- " corum."

In ridicule to this mad-headed advertiſement, and to open the eyes of the people, the next day produced the following:

" Lately arrived from Italy.

" Sig Capitello Jumpedo, a ſurprizing dwarf, " no taller then a common tavern tobacco-pipe; " who can perform many wonderful equilibres " on the ſlack or tight rope: likewiſe he'll tranſ- " form his body into above ten thouſand different " ſhapes and poſtures; and, after he has diverted " the ſpectators two hours and a half, he will " open his mouth wide, and jump down his " own throat. He, being the moſt wonderfuleſt " wonder of wonders as ever the world wondered " at, would be willing to join in performance " with that ſurprizing muſician on Monday next " in the Hay-market. He is to be ſpoke with at " the Black Raven in Golden-lane every day, " from ſeven to twelve, and from twelve all day " long."

The ſcheme, however, took, and the playhouſe was crowded with dukes, dutcheſſes, and the moſt principal people of diſtinction; the iſſue of which was as follows:

About ſeven o'clock the theatre was lighted, and the audience ſat a conſiderable time without even the entertainment of a ſingle fiddle. Their patience being tired out produced a chorus of cat-calls, heightened by loud vociferations and beating with ſticks. Soon after which a fellow came from behind the curtain, and, bowing, ſaid, that if the performer did not appear, the money ſhould be returned. In reply to which ſome perſon in the pit ſpoke out aloud, that if the ladies and gentlemen would give double prices, the conjuror would get into a pint bottle. After this a young gentleman in one of the boxes took a lighted candle, and threw it on the ſtage; which alarming the greateſt part of the audience, they made the beſt of their way out of the theatre, ſome loſing their cloaks and hats, and others their wigs and ſwords. The remaining party aſ-fire, the flames communicated themſelves to ſeveral wooden houſes which burnt with ſuch rapidity, that all endeavours to ſtop it proved ineffectual. What contributed to the misfortune was, the tide being then at ebb. Excluſive of the dye-houſe, a large brew-houſe, four wharfs, a cooperage, and about eighty houſes were entirely deſtroyed: many others were greatly damaged, and ſome coaſters on the ſhore had their rigging burnt. Three men and one woman loſt their lives. Upwards of 2000 quarters of malt, a large quantity of hops, and 800 buts of beer were loſt by this accident: and the whole damage was ſuppoſed to amount to 50,000l.

ſiſted

On the twenty-third of Auguſt, a melancholy accident happened at Bartholomew fair, occaſioned by the falling down of a gallery in Mr. Philip's booth, wherein were a great number of people. Two men were killed, and many others had their limbs broke, or were dangerouſly bruiſed or wounded.

On the twenty-ſeventh, between three and four in the morning, a fire broke out at Mr. Harwood's, in Grocer's-alley, near the Poultry compter, which entirely burnt that and four others. The compter and ſeveral houſes adjoining, were greatly damaged. In conſequence of the former being on fire, fifty priſoners for debt, and nine felons, were ſet at liberty. One of the felons only was retaken; and about forty of the debtors returned voluntarily to their confinement.

On the eighteenth of October, Mr. ſheriff Janſſen gave the following example of the conſtitution and ancient cuſtom of this city, and of the little neceſſity there is of calling in a military aid to aſſiſt a civil magiſtrate in the due execution of his office. Fifteen criminals being ordered for execution on that day at Tyburn, it was reported and apprehended that a reſcue would be attempt-of at leaſt two of them, named Wilſon and Penlez; (the former of whom was pardoned the day before execution) and a party of foot guards were therefore ordered to attend the ſheriff or his officers on that occaſion: but Mr. ſheriff Janſſen, for the dignity of the city and his office, mounted on horſeback, when the criminals were put into the carts at Newgate, and with no other weapon than the authority of his office, ſignified by a white wand in his hand, very civilly diſmiſſed the party of ſoldiers at Holbourn-bars; and, attended by his proper officers, prevented all diſturbance and violence, with a promiſe that the bodies of the malefactors, after execution, ſhould not be delivered to the ſurgeons. It was hoped, that the remarkable example ſet by that magiſtrate, in executing (agreeable to our conſtitution and ancient cuſtom) his office, without a military aid, would be productive of the moſt happy effects in a multitude of other inſtances, and prevent the ſoldiers from being called in to quell every trifling diſorder.

Towards the cloſe of the year there was the moſt remarkable conteſt for parliament men in the city of Weſtminſter, that was ever known. The canditates were, lord Trentham, and Sir George Vandeput ſet up by the independent electors. On the cloſe of the poll, however, it appeared, that the numbers were,

For lord Trentham	4811
For Sir George Vandeput	4654

But a ſcrutiny being demanded by Sir George and many of the electors, the ſame was allowed by the high-bailiff, who on examination thereof, declared lord Trentham to have a majority of 170, and returned him accordingly.

About this time, a grant paſſed the great ſeal, wherein his majeſty was pleaſed to re-incorporate, ſingular, all the freemen of the art of butchers of the city of London, and all others who then uſed or exerciſed, or ſhould thereafter uſe and exerciſe the art within the ſaid city, the liberties and ſuburbs thereof, or in any place within two miles from the ſaid city, by the name of the maſter, wardens, and commonalty of the art or myſtery of butchers.

This year an act was paſſed for the more eaſy and ſpeedy recovery of ſmall debts within the city and liberty of Weſtminſter, and that part of the dutchy of Lancaſter, which adjoineth thereto. By which it was enacted, That there ſhall be two hundred and thirty-two commiſſioners in the whole, to be nominated on the firſt day of May, yearly, by the inhabitants who have a right to aſſemble in veſtry, viz.

Another act was likewiſe paſſed the ſame year for the eaſy and ſpeedy recovery of ſmall debts within the Tower Hamlets. Whereby they that have a right to meet in veſtry for the choice of pariſh officers, are empowered to nominate two hundred and forty commiſſioners in the whole, viz.

By the name of the Court of Requeſts; wherein any three commiſſioners are empowered to ſet on Tueſdays and Fridays, weekly, to hear, determine, give judgment, and award execution with coſts, againſt bodies or goods, for any debts under forty ſhillings.

This year finiſhed with a remarkable cauſe tried in the Lord-mayor's court, between a club of journeymen free painters, plaintiffs, and Mr Row, citizen and maſter painter, defendant, for employing a perſon not free to work for him in the city. The defendant, pleaded, and made it appear by evidence, that from the want of free journeymen of the trade, it was not poſſible for the ſummer buſineſs of the city to be done, without the aſſiſtance of at leaſt an equal number of non freemen; and that no freeman was ever refuſed, or could ſometimes be got on any terms. To which the counſel for the plaintiffs replied with a very learned argument, upon a by-law made by the city in the reign of queen Anne. The jury went out at two o'clock in the afternoon, and returned twice without agreeing on the verdict; and being ſent out again, and continuing a long time, the court ordered them to be locked up in the room, without fire, candle, or any ſuſtenance, by an officer ſworn to obſerve the ſame, and to attend them: in which ſituation they continued till ſix o'clock next morning, when they brought in a verdict for the plaintiffs.

The maſters of the ſeveral handicraft trades finding themſelves greatly aggrieved by this verdict, petitioned the common-council for liberty to employ foreigners, under certain reſtrictions. This produced a counter-petition from the journeymen; the conſideration of which was deferred till their next meeting. And

On the 8th of February 1750 a committee of ſix aldermen and ten commoners met in the old council chamber, to hear and examine the diſputes between the ſeveral maſters and journeymen freemen; when a day was appointed, and thirty maſters, with the ſame number of journeymen were allowed to attend the ſaid committee; who, after ſeveral adjournments, made their report on the 21ſt of June, in which they ſaid they had come to the following reſolutions:

"That the matters complained of by the ſeveral petitioners require ſome regulation.

"That the preſent method of proceedings in the Mayor's-court againſt perſons employing non freemen likewiſe requires ſome regulation.

"That the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen of this city be empowered, from time to time upon application, any Tueſday, by any maſter freeman, to give leave to employ any number of non-freemen to work under him within this city and liberties thereof, and for ſuch time and under ſuch reſtrictions, as the court ſhall think neceſſary and proper; but in caſe there ſhall be any Tueſday on which the ſaid court ſhall not be held, that then the Lord-mayor for the time being, upon ſuch Tueſday, ſhall have the like power.

"That no freeman of this city ſhall be liable to the penalty inflicted by the act of common-council made and paſſed the fourth of July 1712, if it be proved that the defendant did, immediately before ſetting ſuch foreigners to work, uſe his beſt endeavours to procure a journeyman being a freeman to work with him; and could not procure any ſuch freeman being a fit and proper perſon to be employed by him in his work."

This affair was finally determined at a court of common-council held the twenty-ſecond of November following; when, after a debate of near four hours, it paſſed unanimouſly.

"That after the firſt day of December, 1750, the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen might grant a licence to a free maſter, who has uſed his beſt endeavours and cannot procure a ſufficient number of fit and able free journeymen to carry on his buſineſs, to employ ſuch number of foreigners, for or during ſuch time or times, and under ſuch reſtrictions, as to the ſaid court ſhall ſeem fit and neceſſary.

"That on any Tueſday, on which no court of Lord-mayor and aldermen ſhall be holden, the power above-mentioned, ſo as the ſame do not exceed the ſpace of ſix weeks, ſhould be veſted in the Lord-mayor for the time being.

"That no licence ſhall be granted, by virtue of this act, to any freeman to employ any foreigner, unleſs he has one apprentice at leaſt, or has had one apprentice, within twelve kalendar months next before his application for ſuch licence.

"That no freeman ſhould be enabled to employ any foreigner by virtue of this licence, until he has regiſtered the chriſtian and ſurname, and place of abode, of the ſaid foreigner, and in what buſineſs he is to be employed, with the town clerk of the city for the time being, who is to enter the ſame in a book to be kept for that purpoſe, he being paid two ſhillings and ſixpence for every licence ſo to be regiſtered: which book any freeman of this city ſhould have liberty to inſpect, gratis, every day, between twelve o'clock at noon and two in the afternoon, (Sunday's excepted:) and if any perſon regiſtered by virtue of this licence, ſhould leave his maſter's ſervice, or be diſcharged the ſame, the town clerk is, upon application, to inſert and enter in the licence and regiſter another perſon's name in the room of the perſon diſcharged, for the remaining term of the licence without any fee.

"That

ſiſted by the mob, who broke into the houſe, tore up the benches, broke to pieces the ſcenes, pulled down the boxes, and entirely diſmantled the theatre; all which they conveyed into the ſtreet, preceded by the curtain faſtened on a pole, as a flag of triumph, and converted the ſame into a large bonfire. A party of guards was ſent for, but did not arrive time enough to prevent the reſentment of the populace. No material damage enſued from this diſaſter, except a young nobleman's chin being hurt, occaſioned by his falling into the pit.

Many enemies to a book publiſhed about that time concerning the ceaſing of miracles, were greatly diſappointed by the conjuror's non-appearance in the bottle; they imagining that his jumping into it would have been the moſt convincing proof poſſible, that miracles were not yet ceaſed.

This ſtrange deluſion and diſappointment afterwards produced many ſatirical ſtrokes in the public papers: among which was the following:

" This is to inform the public,
" That, notwithſtanding the great abuſe that " has been put upon the gentry, there is now in " town a man, who, inſtead of creeping into a " quart or pint bottle, will change himſelf into a " rattle; which he hopes will pleaſe both young " and old. If this perſon meets with encourage" ment to this advertiſement, he will then ac-
" quaint the gentry, where and when he per" forms."

One very particular reaſon aſſigned why the conjuror did not go into the quart bottle was, that after ſearching all the taverns, not one quart bottle could be found.

On the twenty-ſixth of this month, a court of common-council was held at Guildhall; when, after augmenting the ſalary of the recorder from one hundred and twenty to two hundred pounds, they came to the following reſolutions: " That
" the thanks of this court be given to George
" Heathcote, eſq; for his uniform, active and " diſintereſted conduct in every ſtation of public
" truſt; for his many and great ſervices done
" this metropolis, as magiſtrate and repreſenta-
" tive in parliament; for his zeal and laudable
" endeavours to promote the trade and proſperity
" of his fellow-citizens; and for his exemplary
" public ſpirit and independence in making the " preſervation of the laws and liberties of his " country, the conſtant and invariable rule of all
" his actions."

On the ſecond of February, the heralds at arms, accompanied by the ſecond troop of horſe-guards, attended by the knight-marſhal's men, ſerjeant-trumpeter, high-bailiff of Weſtminſter, and other proper officers, met at St. James's gate, where, his majeſty having from the window of the apartments over the gate firſt ſheathed the ſword, the proclamation of peace was read with beat of kettle drums and ſound of trumpet. From St. James's, the cavalcade proceeded to Charing-croſs, where peace was proclaimed a ſecond time. From thence they proceeded to Temple-bar, where the officers of Weſtminſter retired. And, within the gate, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, recorder, and ſheriffs, performed the uſual ceremony, at their entrance into the city. Proclamation was made a third time at the end of Chancery-lane; a fourth time at the end of Wood-ſtreet in Cheapſide; and the laſt time at the Royal Exchange. It was afterwards proclaimed in all the cities and market towns in Great Britain and Ireland.

On the fifteenth, the Lord-mayor, and the reſt of the commiſſioners of the lieutenancy for the city of London, addreſſed his majeſty with congratulations on the above occaſion, and his ſafe and happy return to his Britiſh dominions. And on the twenty-firſt, the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council waited on his majeſty with another addreſs of congratulation on the ſafe delivery of her royal highneſs the princeſs of Wales, of the princeſs Louiſa Anne.

Murders and robberies were become, at this time, ſo frequent in and about the cities of London and Weſtminſter, that the next day, Febru- the third, a proclamation was iſſued, offering a reward of one hundred pounds over and above all other rewards, to be paid by the lords of the treaſury, upon the conviction of any murderer or robber in thoſe cities, or within five miles thereof. Violent riots and tumults alſo prevailed throughout the kingdom, which were evidently owing to the numbers of unprovided perſons diſcharged from the army and navy. The moſt dangerous inſurrection happened at Briſtol, where great numbers of people from Glouceſterſhire and Somerſetſhire aſſembled, cut down the turnpikes, and committed various other ourages. Many of them were well armed, and bid defiance to the magiſterial power for ſome conſiderable time; but at length ſix troops of dragoons being ſent down againſt them, they were obliged to diſperſe, and the quiet of the country was reſtored.

The great preparations made for ſolemnizing the peace being of a more extraordinary and expenſive nature than were ever exhibited in this metropolis, we ſhall be a little particular in giving an account of them. The following is a deſcription of the machine for the fire works, that were exhibited on the twenty-ſeventh of April, 1749.

THE machine was ſituated in the Green Park, 500 feet from his majeſty's library, and repreſented a magnificent Doric temple, from which extended two wings terminated by pavillions.

It was 114 feet high to the top of his majeſty's arms, and 410 feet long. The ornaments were all in relief, and it was adorned with frets, gildings, luſtres, artificial flowers, inſcriptions, ſtatues, allegorical pictures, &c.

The inſcriptions were as follow:

On the pedeſtal of Peace in the center, Pax rediviva an. MDCCXLVIII.—Peace reſtored in the year 1748. In the frieze over the center arch, Georgius II. Rex. Which appeared tranſparent during the whole performance of the fire-work.

On the left-ſide of the machine, Redintegrata Europæ pace, ſecuritate fœderum ſtabilita, commer- cio feliciter reſtituto, ſub auſpiciis opt. princ. lætatur S. P. Q. B.—To give peace to Europe, to ſecure the faith of treaties, to reſtore and enlarge commerce, is the auſpicious work of a Britiſh king, the triumph of a Britiſh people.

On the right ſide of the machine, Hinc principem bello accingit, libertati devota, fortitudo. Illinc pacificum oſtendit, ſaluti omnium, conſulens, clementia.—A prince never diſpoſed to engage in war but from a fortitude ſacred to liberty. Ever ſtudious of peace from clemency intent on the public good.

On the attic in the middle of the back front, Georgio II. Regi opt. auctori ſalutis, libertatis vindici, fundatori quietis, patri patriæ.—To the guardian of our ſafety, the aſſerter of our liberty, the eſtabliſher of our tranquillity, the moſt gracious ſovereign, and father of his people, George the ſecond.

The ſtatues which adorned it were twenty-three, viz.

On the firſt half-pace of the great ſtair-caſe on the right hand was the figure of Tame; on the left Iſis, each reclining on an urn.

In the center of the Temple, ſeated on an altar, was the goddeſs of Peace, holding an olive branch, and ſupported on the right by Neptune, and on the left by Mars. Theſe five were caſt in plaiſter of Paris.

In the front were four ſtatues, viz. Juſtice, Temperance, Fortitude, Prudence. On the right end, Religion, Conſtancy, Honour, Clemency. In the back front, Faithfulneſs, Vigilance. On the attic above the cornice in the front, Jupiter, Ceres, Diana, Apollo. In the back front, at the angles, were Mercury, Minerva.

The pictures in the front of the machine were eighteen, each painted double: They at firſt appeared as marble baſſo relievos, and after the fire-work was played off they were removed by machinery, and diſcovered pictures repreſenting the ſame ſubject in colours, which were rendered tranſparent by a great number of lampions.

The great picture over the cornice in the center of the machine was twenty-eight feet by ten. It repreſented his majeſty giving Peace to Britannia. The attendants on Peace were Plenty, Riches, Felicity, Trade, and Commerce. The attendants on Britannia were Liberty, Agriculture, and the Arts and Sciences.

On the right of this, below the entablature, was a picture of fifteen feet by eight, repreſenting the return of Neptune: he was riding on the ocean in a carr drawn by ſea-horſes: his right hand held a trident, and his left ſupported a globe: he was conducted by the genius of Peace, and attended by tritons, ſea-nymphs, &c. On the left of the central arch, was the return of Mars ſeated on a carr drawn by three lions, the arms of England, and was conducted by Fame, with an olive-branch, who proclaimed the peace.

On each ſide of theſe two laſt pictures was a feſtoon of arms and military inſtruments.

The medallion on the right hand was Britannia joining hands with France: the legend, Concordia redux. Exergue, Brit. Gall. Concord renewed. Britain, France. Below this was the figure of Liberty.

On the left was a medallion repreſenting Britannia joining hands with Spain: the legend, Salus mutua. Exergue, Brit. Hiſp. Mutual Benefit. Britain, Spain. Below this was the figure of Plenty.

At the right end were two medallions, one of Auguſtus: the other of Antoninus Pius. At the left end, two medallions, one of Veſpaſian: The other of Trajan. Underneath two Genii on each ſide a globe, one ſitting with a book in his hand, the other ſtanding, holding parchments with ſeals pendant, &c.

The exhibition began about nine in the evening, and was introduced by a grand concert of warlike inſtruments. The fire-works were opened by a royal ſalute of one hundred and one braſs ordnance, which was immediately followed by a diſplay of rockets of various ſorts, air balloons, &c. in eleven courſes the number amounting to 32,684.

After all theſe had been diſplayed, there followed a grand girandole from the top of the Temple, conſiſting of ſix thouſand rockets, headed with ſtars, rains, and ſerpents, all in one flight. Then the machine cleared of its combuſtibles, became ſo illuminated as to ſhew the emblematical figures; and the front was beautifully illuminated with a variety of deſigns, which continued burning for a conſiderable time.

The following is an abſtract of the number of pieces fired on this occaſion:

About eleven o'clock the whole building was illuminated, and continued ſo till between two and three in the morning. His majeſty and the royal family retired about twelve.

All the various parts of this great work were performed by direction of Charles Frederick, eſq; comptroller, and captain Thomas Deſaguliers, chief fire-maſter of his majeſty's royal laboratory.

On the twelfth of Auguſt about ten o'clock at night, a terrible fire broke out in Mr. Spencer's dye-houſe, near Battle-bridge, Southwark. A loft adjoining, which was full of ſtraw, catching fire

" That the court of Lord-mayor and alder-
" men have a power to revoke or call in any
" licence, though the time limited therein be not
" expired."

On the eighth of February, between twelve and one o'clock at noon, the ſhock of an earthquake was felt all over the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and parts adjacent. It was more particularly felt by the inhabitants bordering near the river Thames; and at Limehouſe, Poplar, &c. it was ſo violent, that many boats and ſhips in the river received a very conſiderable ſhock. The counſellors in the court of King's-bench and Chancery in Weſtminſter-hall were ſo alarmed, that they expected the building to fall; and in the new buildings about Groſvenor-ſquare, people ran out of their houſes, the chairs ſhaking, and the pewter rattling on the ſhelves. A ſlaughter-houſe, with a hay-loft over it, was thrown down in Southwark, a chimney in Leadenhall-ſtreet, another in Billiter-ſquare, and ſeveral chimneys and part of a houſe near Horſlydown. And

On the eighth of March, about half an hour after five o'clock in the morning, the town was again alarmed with another ſhock of an earthquake, which was generally allowed to be more violent, and of a longer continuance than that which was felt that day month. Great numbers of people were awaked from their ſleep meerly by its violence, which, however, did no other miſchief than throwing down ſeveral chimneys and damaging ſome houſes. The ſhock was ſo great in ſome parts, that the people ran from their houſes and beds almoſt naked. In the high grounds by Groſvenor-ſquare, &c. it was ſaid to have been felt more than in other parts, the braſſes and pewters of ſeveral kitchens being thrown down, and to ſome diſtance from the ſhelves on which they ſtood. In St. James's-park, and all the open places, the ground moved very perceptibly, and the noiſe ſeemed to break three times. It was obſerved about five o'clock, that there was a continual, though confuſed lightening, till within a minute or two of the ſhock being felt, which darted very low, and the flaſhes were great and ſtrong. A lady in Piccadilly, a curious collector of old china, who had piled a conſiderable quantity on ſtands, had it thrown down and broke; bells in ſeveral ſteeples were ſtruck by the chime hammers; and great ſtones fell from the new ſpire of Weſtminſter-abbey. A maid ſervant in Charter-houſe ſquare was thrown out of bed by the ſhock, and broke her arm. The dogs howled in an uncommon manner, and the water was ſo agitated, that the fiſh leaped half a yard above the ſurface.

It was felt in Eſſex, Kent and Surry, as well as in moſt parts of Middleſex; and the panic which was univerſal in the four counties, was conſiderably increaſed, by the predictions and admonitions of a fanatic ſoldier, who publickly preached up repentance, and boldly propheſied that the next ſhock (which he ſaid would happen the ſame day in the next month) would lay the cities of London and Weſtminſter in aſhes. The fanatic, however, happened to be miſtaken; but the two ſhocks which had already been felt, had brought a ſerious air upon every face. The pulpits and preſs were employed in calling a degenerate people to repentance, and in deprecating the wrath of heaven. " In after ages (ſays a modern writer) it " will ſcarcely be believed, that on the evening
" of the eighth day of April, the open fields
" that ſkirt the metropolis, were filled with an " incredible number of people, aſſembled in " chairs, in chaiſes, and coaches, as well as on " foot, who waited in the moſt fearful ſuſpence,
" until morning and the return of day diſproved
" the truth of the dreaded prophecy. Then
" their fears vaniſhed: they returned to their
" reſpective habitations in a tranſport of joy:
" they were ſoon reconciled to their abandoned
" vices, which they ſeemed to reſume with re-
" doubled affection, and once more bade defiance
" to the vengeance of heaven."

On the eighteenth of March, between five and ſix o'clock in the evening, a ſhock of an earthquake was felt at Goſport, Portſmouth, and the Iſle of Wight, which greatly alarmed and terrified the inhabitants. Several other places in Europe, particularly France and Germany, were viſited with this dreadful calamity; and the iſland of Cerigo, in the Archipelago, was almoſt deſtroyed, and above two thouſand of the inhabitants periſhed.

On the twentieth of April died Sir Samuel Pennant, Lord-mayor of London, whoſe death was occaſioned by an infectious fever which prevailed in Newgate, and was from thence communicated to the Seſſions-houſe in the Old Baily, where it was catched by a great number of perſons, and proved fatal, not to his lordſhip only, but to Sir Daniel Lambert, knight and alderman; to Sir Thomas Abney, a judge of the common-pleas; to Mr. Clark, a baron of the exchequer; to many of the lawyers that attended the ſeſſions; to a greater part of the jury, and to a large number of others who happened to be preſent.

About four o'clock in the afternoon of the twenty-fifth of June, a man ſuppoſed to be a weaver, fell from the top of the monument into the ſtreet. He pitched againſt the top of the pedeſtal, and from thence againſt one of the poſts, whereby the upper part of his ſcull was laid open, and the other parts of his body moſt terribly ſhattered.

On the 27th of June the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council waited on their royal highneſſes the prince and princeſs of Wales, with the following congratulatory addreſs on the birth of prince Frederick William:

" May it pleaſe your royal highneſſes,

" We the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and com-
" mon-council-men of the city of London, hum-
" bly beg leave to preſent our moſt ſincere and " hearty congratulations to your royal highneſſes
" on the birth of another prince, and the happy
" recovery of her royal highneſs.

" We cannot, at preſent, better ſhew our loy" alty to the king than by paying our duty to " your royal highneſſes, and expreſſing our un-
" feigned joy at this increaſe of his majeſty's fa" mily.

" We conſider every child of your royal high-
" neſſes as an additional ſecurity of the peoples
" happineſs and freedom; by your examples they " will learn the practice of every ſocial virtue, to
" be earneſt and zealous in the cauſe of liberty,
" and to maintain our religious and civil rights.
" May we never want one of your royal high-
" neſs's deſcendants to reign over a free, grate" ful, and obedient people!

To which his royal highneſs returned the following anſwer:

" My Lord and Gentlemen,

" I return you my thanks and thoſe of the " princeſs, for this very remarkable inſtance of " duty to the king, and regard to us.
" The expectations you expreſs to have of my " children are moſt agreeable to me; may they " always be a bleſſing to this nation, and main" tain the liberty, wealth, and power it ought to " have!
" The city has always ſhewed ſo much parti-
" ality to me, that they may be aſſured none of " their fellow citizens can be warmer than I " am for promoting their welfare and their
" trade."

About this time his majeſty's royal charter having paſſed the great ſeal for encouraging the Britiſh White Herring Fiſhery, and for incorporating certain perſons of great wealth and diſtinction, by the name of "the Society of the Free-" Britiſh-fiſhery," for the term of twenty-one years, his royal highneſs the prince of Wales, on the twenty-fifth of October, (eſcorted by a party of horſe-guards to Temple-bar) went in his ſtate-coach, attended by two others, in which were the lords of the bed-chamber, his footmen and watermen walking before, to Fiſhmonger's-hall in Thames-ſtreet, to receive the charter of the Britiſh herring-fiſhery company, as governor thereof. His royal highneſs was received at the door of the hall by Mr. alderman Bethel, preſident of the ſociety, Mr. alderman Janſſen, vice-preſident, admiral Vernon, general Oglethorpe, and ſuch of the ſociety as were in town; and afterwards by the maſter and court of aſſiſtants of the Fiſhmonger's company, in their gowns, who all waited on him to their parlour. His royal highneſs made a moſt gracious ſpeech, in which he expreſſed his great regard for the proſperity of the city of London. After which, the fiſhery charter being read by the clerk of the Fiſhmonger's company, his royal highneſs wiſhed all imaginable ſucceſs to this national undertaking, and declared that he had the welfare of it extremely at heart. The clerk of the company then thanked his royal highneſs for the great honour done the ſociety, and beſeeched him, in the name of the company, to accept of the freedom thereof; and his royal highneſs being graciouſly pleaſed to accept of the ſame, it was preſented to him on the twenty-fifth in a gold box of the moſt exquiſite workmanſhip.

On the eighth of November, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council waited on his majeſty at St. James's, to congratulate him on his happy return, from his German dominions and the birth of a prince; when the recorder made their compliments in the following ſpeech:

" May it pleaſe your majeſty,

" We, the Lord-mayor, aldermen and com-
" mons of the city of London in common coun" cil aſſembled, your majeſty's truly loyal and " faithful ſubjects, humbly beg leave, with moſt
" reſpectful duty to congratulate your majeſty on " your ſafe return to your Britiſh dominions, and " with joy to expreſs the ſatisfaction we derive " from your royal preſence amongſt us.
" As our zeal and affection for your royal
" houſe have the next place in our hearts to our " zeal and affection for your royal perſon, we " gladly embrace this firſt opportunity of con-
" gratulating your majeſty on the birth of another
" prince: an additional ſecurity for perpetuating
" the proteſtant ſucceſſion and the Britiſh conſti-
" tution, the greateſt bleſſings theſe kingdoms
" can enjoy.
" We want words to expreſs the grateful ſenſe
" we have of your majeſty's gracious acceptance
" of our duty, and your majeſty's repeated de" clarations of favour and protection. It ſhall be " our conſtant prayer, that your majeſty may long
" reign over a free, grateful, and obedient people;
" and that the ſceptre of theſe kingdoms may be
" ſwayed to the end of time by a race of princes
" deſcended from your majeſty, and inheritors of
" thoſe virtues which adorn your royal perſon."

To which his majeſty was pleaſed to return the following moſt gracious anſwer:

" I thank you for this very affectionate addreſs.
" My care and attention ſhall never be wanting " for the ſupport of the trade and commerce of " my ſubjects: and the city of London may al-
" ways depend upon my favour and protection."

On the 22d of December a proclamation was publiſhed by order of council, promiſing 100l. over and above all other rewards, for the diſcovering and apprehending any offender, who ſince the 20th of September, has committed, or before the 20th of December 1751 ſhall commit, any murder or robbery by violence, or make an aſſault with offenſive weapons with intent to rob, in any of the ſtreets of London, or within five miles of the city.

In the beginning of the year 1751 a cauſe was tried at Hicks's Hall betwen the tin-plate workers and one Milton, whom they indicted upon the ſtatute of Queen Elizabeth, for exerciſing their art and myſtery, not having ſerved a regular apprenticeſhip to the ſame. The verdict was given for Milton, becauſe the tin-plate workers were not incorporated till many years after the enacting that ſtatute.

At a court of common-council held the 8th of January it was unanimouſly reſolved and ordered, that the Recorder's ſalary ſhould be further augmented by the additional ſum of 280l. to the former 120l. and that the ſaid ſum ſhould be paid to Richard

Richard Adams, the then recorder of London, as long as he ſhould continue in the ſaid office, unleſs he ſhould be thereafter made a judge in any of his majeſty's courts, or accept of the office of attorney or ſolicitor-general; in which caſe the ſaid grant of 280l. ſhould ceaſe.

The ſame court likewiſe unanimouſly agreed to petition the parliament to apply ſuch remedy as might be effectual for preventing the pernicious uſe of ſpirituous liquors; and about the ſame time the grand jury for the county of Middleſex delivered ſeveral preſentments to the court of King's-bench; to which was annexed the following writing, which had been by them unanimouſly agreed to, and ſigned:

" We, the grand jury for the county of Mid-
" dleſex, beg leave, in diſcharge of the duty
" we owe to our king and country, to repreſent,
" that returns and preſentments made of public
" nuiſances by the conſtables from the ſeve-
" ral wards, by virtue of our precept to them
" directed, are become a mere matter of form;
" occaſioned partly (as ſome of them confeſſed)
" from lewd, diſorderly, and gaming houſes,
" and unlawful places of aſſembly, having been
" often preſented without effect.

" The preſent ill ſtate of this country, in re" gard to idleneſs, luxury, robberies, and other
" ſhameful, deſtructive practices, induces us to " make this repreſentation to this honourable
" court, in hopes, that if it ſhall appear proſe-
" cutions upon ſuch preſentments have not been " carried into execution from any defect of the " laws, or the extraordinary expence attending
" them, that this honourable court will be pleaſ-
" ed to repreſent it to his majeſty for his royal
" conſideration.

" We are the more ſolicitous for a ſummary
" and effectual law to ſuppreſs theſe public nui-
" ſances, as we conceive them to be the princi" pal root of the enormous and threatening vices
" of the age, which greatly endanger the pub" lic peace, and every perſon's property and
" ſafety."

On the twentieth of February, a great number of ſailors aſſembled at the Fountain tavern behind the Royal Exchange, having miſtaken the ſenſe of an advertiſement inſerted to procure a meeting to conſult agents and managers, how to obtain a few bounty bills, for which they were not proper vouchers; and imagined themſelves ſummoned to receive money, and (upon their diſappointment) that the advertiſement was publiſhed by one who had before ſummoned them, and raiſed two ſubſcriptions, they were ſo irritated as to force the agent into a coach, and carry him to the Lord-mayor: here they were adviſed to apply to the admiralty, where they went, and afterwards to juſtice Fielding, who not being at home, they returned to the Lord-mayor, who, to prevent the agent being pulled to pieces, had ſent him to Newgate. And ſome ill deſigning people having reported that their money was at Mr. Belchier's, in Lombard-ſtreet, they aſſembled before his houſe, and threatened to demoliſh it; and notwithſtanding the proclamation was read to them, and a party of ſoldiers brought to prevent miſchief, yet they would not diſperſe till one of them was ſent to Newgate.

On the twentieth of March, between ten and eleven at night died his royal highneſs Frederick prince of Wales, father to his preſent majeſty king George III. His death was occaſioned by the breaking of an impoſthume between the pericardium and diaphragm, which threw the matter contained in it upon the ſubſtance of the lungs. His royal highneſs was ſaid to have caught a cold about three weeks before in Kew-gardens, and to have encreaſed it on the twelfth by coming very warm from the houſe of lords with the windows of his chair down; ſoon after which he complained of pains which were thought to be pleuretic, and were attended with a fever. About a quarter of an hour before his death, he told doctor Wilmot who attended him, and had been up all the preceding night, that he was much better, and adviſed the doctor to go home: the princeſs remained with him, to whom he ſoon after complained of a ſudden pain, and an offenſive ſmell, and immediately threw himſelf backward and expired. And on the thirteenth of April at half an hour after one o'clock in the morning, the bowels of his royal highneſs, which, in an urn covered with crimſon velvet, were brought from Leiceſter houſe in a coach and ſix to the prince's chamber, were from thence carried to Henry the VIIth's chapel, and there interred in the vault, together with the royal corpſe, at nine o'clock the ſame evening. The proceſſion began at half an hour after eight o'clock at night; and when it arrived at the abbey-gate, the corpſe was met by the dean and prebendaries, attended by the gentlemen of the choir, and king's ſcholars, who fell into the proceſſion immediately before the officer of arms, with wax tapers in their hands, properly habited, and began the common burial ſervice (no anthem being compoſed on the occaſion) two drums beating a dead march during the ſervice. Upon entering the chapel, the royal body was placed on treſſels, the crown and cuſhion at the head, and the canopy held over, the ſupporters of the pall ſtanding by; the chief mourner and his two ſupporters ſeated in chairs at the head of the corpſe; the lords aſſiſtants, maſter of the horſe, groom of the ſtole, and lords of the bed-chamber, on both ſides; the four white ſtaff-officers at the feet, the others ſeating themſelves in the ſtalls on each ſide the chapel; the biſhop of Rocheſter, dean of Weſtminſter, then read the firſt part of the burial ſervice, after which the corpſe was carried to the vault, preceded by the white ſtaff-officers, the maſter of the horſe, chief mourner, his ſupporters and aſſiſtants, Garter king of arms going before them. When they had placed themſelves near the vault, the corpſe being laid upon a machine even with the pavement of the chapel, was by degrees let down into the vault, when the biſhop of Rocheſter went on with the ſervice; which being ended, Garter proclaimed his royal highneſs's titles.

As ſoon as the proceſſion began to move, two rockets were fired off in Old-Palace-yard, as a ſignal for the guns in the Park to fire, which were followed by thoſe of the Tower; during which which time the great bells of Weſtminſter, and that of St. Paul's, tolled, as did moſt of the pariſhes in and about London.

On his royal highneſs's coffin was a ſilver plate with a latin inſcription, ſignifying his titles and deſcent, and that he died the 20th of March 1751 aged 45.

About this time Sir John Boſworth, knight, reſigning the office of chamberlain of the city of London, on account of his ill ſtate of health, the citizens ſeemed deſirous to invite the late alderman Heathcote to ſucceed him; and gave it out that he intended to offer himſelf for that important office. As ſoon as Mr. Heathcote, who was then at Bath, heard of this report, he ſent a letter to the liverymen of London, declaring that he never had any ſuch intention, and did entirely decline offering himſelf for the chamberlainſhip. In conſequence of which there immediately appeared the following candidates: Mr. Deputy Harriſon, Mr. Richard Glover, Mr. deputy Hodges, Mr. Thomas Meakes, and Mr. deputy Pycroft. When they were put in nomination at the common-hall, the majority of hands was declared in favour of Mr. Harriſon. However, a poll was demanded by the friends of Mr. Glover, Mr. deputy Hodges, and Mr. deputy Pycroft; and on caſting up the books, the numbers appeared as follows:

For Mr. Harriſon	1938
Mr. Glover	1358
Mr. Pycroft	542
Mr. Hodges	474

There being a majority of five hundred and eighty voices for Mr. Harriſon, he was declared duly elected chamberlain of the city of London, in return for which he immediately paid his reſpects to the livery in the following ſpeech:

" Gentlemen,

" I return you my warmeſt and moſt ſincere " thanks, for the very high honour you have " done me, in electing me chamberlain of this " great and opulent city.

" So honourable a preference ſpeaks the more " favourable opinion you are pleaſed to entertain " both of my integrity and abilities: the former " of theſe my heart tells me you cannot be miſ- " taken in, how partially ſoever you may have " judged of the latter. I flatter myſelf therefore, " that by a due exertion of theſe abilities (ſuch " as they are) in a diligent and conſcientious diſ- " charge of the important truſt repoſed in me, I " ſhall be honoured with the continuance of your " favour and protection.

" Give me leave, gentlemen, once more to " thank you, and, with a heart overflowing with " gratitude, to aſſure you, that I ſhall endeavour " to act, both in my public and private capacity, " as becomes a faithful ſervant of the corpora- " tion, and a ſincere friend to every individual " member thereof."

After Mr. Harriſon had finiſhed his ſpeech, Mr. Glover, who had declined the poll, addreſſed the livery in the following moſt genteel and obliging manner:

" Gentlemen,

" After the trouble which I have had ſo large " a ſhare in giving you, by my application for " your favour to ſucceed Sir John Boſworth in " the office of chamberlain, this day ſo worthily " ſupplied, I ſhould deem myſelf inexcuſable in " quitting this place, before I rendered my " thanks to thoſe in particular who ſo generouſly " have eſpouſed my intereſt; to your new-elect- " ed chamberlain himſelf, and numbers of his " friends, whoſe expreſſions and actions have " done me peculiar honour, amidſt the warmth " of their attachment to him; to the two de- " ſerving magiſtrates who have preſided among " us with impartiality, humanity, and juſtice; " and, laſtly, to all in general, for their candour, " decency, and indulgence.

" Gentlemen, heretofore I have frequently had " occaſion of addreſſing the livery of London " in public; but at this time I find myſelf at an " unuſual loſs, being under all the difficulties " which a want of matter, deſerving your notice, " can create. Had I now your rights and privi- " leges to vindicate, had I the cauſe of your ſuf- " fering trade to defend, or were I now called " forth to recommend and enforce the parlia- " mentary ſervice of the moſt virtuous and illuſ- " trious citizen, my tongue would be free from " conſtraint, and, expatiating at large, would " endeavour to merit your attention, which now " muſt be ſolely confined to ſo narrow a ſubject " as myſelf. On thoſe occaſions, the importance " of the matter, and my known zeal to ſerve " you, however ineffectual my attempts might " prove, were always ſufficient to ſecure me the " honour of a kind reception and unmerited re- " gard.

" Your countenance, Gentlemen, firſt drew " me from the retirement of a ſtudious life; " your repeated marks of diſtinction firſt pointed " me out to that great body, the merchants of " London, who, purſuing your example, con- " deſcended to entruſt me, unequal and unwor- " thy as I was, with the moſt important cauſe, a " cauſe, where your intereſt was as nearly con- " cerned as theirs. In conſequence of that de- " ference which has ever been paid to the ſenti- " ments and choice of the citizens and traders of " London, it was impoſſible but ſome faint luſtre " muſt have glanced on one, whom, weak as he " was, they were pleaſed to appoint the inſtru- " ment on their behalf; and from theſe tranſac- " tions I accidentally acquired the ſmalleſt ſhare " of reputation, it was to you, Gentlemen of " the livery, that my gratitude aſcribes it; and " I joyfully embrace this public opportunity of " declaring, that whatever part of a public cha- " racter I may preſume to claim, I owe prima- " rily to you. To this I might add the favour, " the twenty years countenance and patronage " of one, whom a ſupreme degree of reſpect " ſhall prevent me from naming; and though " under the temptation of uſing that name, as a certain

" certain means of obviating ſome miſconſtruc-
" tions, I ſhall, however, avoid to dwell on the " memory of a loſs ſo recent, ſo juſtly and ſo
" univerſally lamented. Permit me now to re" mind you, that when placed by theſe means in
" a light not altogether unfavourable, no lucra-
" tive reward was then the object of my purſuit,
" nor ever did the promiſes or offers of private
" emolument induce me to quit my indepen-
" dance, or vary the leaſt of my former profeſ-
" ſions, which always were, and remain ſtill
" founded on the principles of univerſal liberty;
" principles, which I aſſume the glory to have
" eſtabliſhed on your records. Your ſenſe, livery
" men of London, the ſenſe of your great cor" poration, ſo repeatedly recommended to your
" repreſentatives in parliament, were my ſenſe,
" and the principal boaſt of all my compoſitions,
" contained matter imbibed in my earlieſt edu" cation, to which I have always adhered, by " which I ſtill abide, and which I will endeavour
" to bear down with me to the grave. And even
" at that gloomy period, when deſerted by my " good fortune, and under the ſevereſt trials, even " then, by the ſame conſiſtency of opinions and " uniformity of conduct, I ſtill preſerved that " part of reputation which I originally derived " from your favour, whatever I might pretend
" to call a public character, unſhaken and un-
" blemiſhed; nor once, in the hour of affliction,
" did I baniſh from my thoughts the moſt ſincere
" and conſcientious intention of acquitting every
" private obligation as ſoon as my good fortune
" ſhould pleaſe to return; a diſtant appearance
" of which ſeemed to invite me, and awakened
" ſome flattering expectations on the rumoured
" vacancy of the chamberlain's-office; but, al" ways apprehending the imputation of preſump-
" tion, and that a higher degree of delicacy and " caution would be requiſite in me than in any " other candidate, I forbore, till late, to preſent
" myſelf one more to your notice, and then, for
" the firſt time, abſtracted from a public conſi-
" deration, ſollicited your favour for my own
" private advantage. My want of ſucceſs ſhall
" not prevent my chearfully congratulating this " gentleman on his election, and you on your " choice of ſo worthy a magiſtrate; and if I may " indulge a hope of departing this place with " a ſhare of your approbation and eſteem, I
" ſolemnly from my heart declare, that I ſhall
" not bear away with me the leaſt trace of diſ-
" appointment."

Her royal highneſs the princeſs of Wales being ſafely delivered of a princeſs, the Lord-mayor and aldermen of London on the nineteenth of July, waited on his majeſty with congratulations on the ſame; when the recorder made the following ſpeech:

" Moſt gracious Sovereign,

" We your majeſty's loyal ſubjects, the Lord-
" mayor and court of aldermen of the city of " London, humbly beg leave to congratulate
" your majeſty on the ſafe delivery of her royal
" highneſs the princeſs of Wales, and the birth
" of a princeſs.

" As we are truly ſenſible of the bleſſings we " enjoy under your majeſty's government, and
" are convinced that the ſecurity of our rights
" and liberties, in time to come, depend on the " proteſtant ſucceſſion eſtabliſhed in your illuſ-
" trious houſe; it is at this time a peculiar ſatiſ-
" faction to us, that we have once more the ho" nour of congratulating your majeſty on the in-
" creaſe of your royal family.

" And, upon this occaſion, permit us, Sir, to " render our moſt dutiful thanks to your ma-
" jeſty, for a late ſignal inſtance of your majeſty's
" paternal care of your people, in the proviſion
" made by parliament for the future tranquillity
" of this kingdom: a proviſion moving prima" rily from your majeſty's goodneſs, and brought " to perfection by your majeſty's wiſdom. Yet,
" wiſe and ſalutary as it is, we cannot forbear to
" expreſs our wiſhes, that a long continuance " of your majeſty's life may make it unne-
" ceſſary.

" Fixed in theſe ſentiments of duty and grati-
" tude, our prayers ſhall always be, that your " majeſty may long reign over us; and that the " throne may be filled by your majeſty's deſcend-
" ants even to remoteſt ages."

On the twenty-ſecond of October a cauſe was heard before the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen about laying open the port of London for bringing in foreign oats, purſuant to a ſtatute 1. James II. empowering that court in April and October to determine the common market prices of middling Engliſh corn, by the oaths of two ſubſtantial perſons of Middleſex and Surry, being neither merchants, cornfactors, mealmen, nor factors for importing corn, nor intereſted in the corn, and each having a freehold eſtate of 20l. or a leaſehold eſtate of 50l. per annum, and by ſuch other ways as to them ſhall ſeem fit; and if the ſame ſhall appear to be above ſixteen ſhillings a quarter, they are to certify the ſame with two ſuch oaths annexed, to the commiſſioners of the cuſtoms, to be hung up in the cuſtom-houſe. The perſons that made the application were ſeveral maſters of livery ſtables, and inn-keepers, and their opponents were the cornfactors, After a hearing which laſted ten hours, it was decided for the cornfactors, five aldermen being for laying open the port, and five, with the Lord-mayor, who threw in his caſting vote againſt it.

On the twenty-fifth the court at Guildhall, after a hearing of ſeveral hours, allowed the journeymen taylors two ſhillings and ſixpence per day for the ſummer half year, and two ſhillings for the winter half year, and three half-pence for ſtrong beer, to work from ſix o'clock in the morning till ſeven in the evening, which is an hour leſs than is preſcribed by act of parliament.

On the twenty-ſixth his majeſty granted his royal charter for incorporating ſeveral of his loving ſubjects therein named, by the name of the ſociety of antiquaries of London. And at a meeting of the ſaid ſociety on the twelfth of December their newly granted royal charter of incorporation was read, and ſeveral other deeds drawn and ſigned by the preſident, vice-preſidents, and council, and a committee appointed to inſpect their former rules and orders, and to draw up ſuch by-laws as might be neceſſary to perpetuate the ſociety for ages to come: at the ſame time the archbiſhop of Canterbury and the lord chancellor were admitted members.

This is the year in which the royal aſſent was given to the memorable act of the Britiſh legiſlature, for regulating the commencement of the year, and for correcting the kalendar now in uſe; that is, for aboliſhing the old and eſtabliſhing the new-ſtile, which was already in uſe in moſt other parts of Chriſtendom. It took place the day following, the ſecond of September 1752, which inſtead of being called the third was dated the fourteenth. This act was modelled with great ſkill and learning, by the earl of Macclesfield, and has been productive of many excellent conſequences; in particular, the correſpondence between the Engliſh and foreign merchants, has been and will be greatly facilitated, with reſpect to the dates of letters and accounts.

The year 1752 was introduced by a violent ſtorm of wind which happened on the fifteenth of March. It blew down a great number of chimnies; and in ſome places the roofs of the houſes were ſo beat in, that many perſons were killed, and others greatly bruiſed and wounded. The head of Levi, and the feet of Abraham, in the curiouſly painted window in Weſtminſter-abbey, were blown out, windows were greatly damaged in many places, and in St. James's-park, and the villages about this metropolis, great numbers of trees were torn up by the roots. The ſhips in the river were driven from their moorings, lighters and wherries ſunk, and many lives loſt.

About ſeven o'clock in the evening, on the twentieth of March, three of the priſoners under ſentence of death in Newgate, and ordered for execution, viz. Hayes, Agnew, and Broughton, (who had found means to ſaw off their irons) attacked Mr. Sinclair the turnkey when he went to lock them up in the cells, and ſtabbed him in ſeveral parts of the belly in ſo deſperate a manner, that there were no hopes of his recovery. After which two of them ſtripped Derby (who was confined there for robbing the mail) of his cloaths when one put on his great coat, and the other his cloſe bodied-coat, and inſiſted on Sinclair's calling to Wood, the other turnkey, to open the door to let the two gentlemen out; but, upon hearing a ſtruggle, he began to ſuſpect ſomething more than ordinary, and made an alarm; when the priſoners ran to ſecure Derby, whom they ſuſpected of betraying them; and Agnew, whoſe poſt it was to keep the door, upon hearing a ſtruggle between his confederates and two aſſiſtant turnkeys, who were with Sinclair at the firſt onſet, and whom they had hauled into the cells) forgot his charge of door-keeper, and ran to their aſſiſtance, when Derby immediately ſhut the cell door and bolted it on the outſide, which faſtened them altogether in the cell. Mr. Akerman, the keeper, immediately applied to the ſheriffs, and a guard was preſently had from the tilt-yard. The Lord-mayor, Sir William Calvert, alderman Gaſcoigne, and ſeveral other gentlemen, came ſoon after; and the guard was reinforced with another from the Tower. The fellows being quite deſperate, his lordſhip waited on the duke of Newcaſtle, and got an order to fire on them, in caſe they refuſed to ſurrender. However, upon being ſurrounded in their cells, and having a parly with his lordſhip through the cell doors, they ſurrendered, and were immediately, with the reſt of the priſoners, double ironed and handcuffed.

On the fourth of June Thomas Winterbottom, Lord-mayor of London, died in his mayoralty, and was ſucceeded by Robert Alſop, eſq;

The honourable Sir Peter Warren, knight of the Bath, vice-admiral of the red, and member of parliament for the city of Weſtminſter, having been preſented with the freedom of the city of London for the ſignal ſervices he had done his country in the late war, and made free of the company of Goldſmiths, was put in nomination to ſucceed the late Lord-mayor as alderman of Billingſgate-ward. An honour which Sir Peter declined; but at the ſame time ſent the common-council of Billingſgate 200l. one to be diſtributed amongſt the poor of the ſaid ward, and the other to be at the diſpoſal of the inhabitants. The deputy and common-council waited on him again, hoping to prevail with the admiral to accept that office. He received them with great politeneſs, but ſaid it was incompatible with the duty he owed to his king and country as a naval officer. The inhabitants, however, did, elect him; and on the twenty-third of June Sir Peter ſent a meſſage to the court of aldermen, deſiring to be excuſed from ſerving the office of an aldermen, to which he had been elected, and paid his fine of five hundred pounds for that purpoſe. He was ſucceeded by William Beckford eſq;

About one o'clok in the morning, on the twenty-ſeventh of June, a fire broke out at No. 10. in Lincoln's-inn New-ſquare; and, for want of water, in a ſhort time, that and the next building were entirely conſumed. The honourable Charles Yorke and Mr. Hoſkyns who lay up one pair of ſtairs in No. 10, were both aſleep, and eſcaped in their breeches and ſhirts at the moſt imminent hazard of their lives. All their papers, books, plate, furniture, and wearing-apparel were entirely deſtroyed, as were thoſe in the other chambers under the ſame roof. Mr. Pickering, clerk to Mr. Wilbraham loſt upwards of 1100l. in money and bank notes of his own, and other perſons, and ſecurities for 30,000l. more.

On the twenty-ſecond of November the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council waited on his majeſty at St. James's, with their congratulatory addreſs on his ſafe return from Germany; when his majeſty was pleaſed to confer the honour of knighthood on the Lord-mayor, ſheriffs, recorder and chamberlain.

About this time an act of parliament paſſed for the better preventing of thefts and robberies, and for regulating places of public entertainment, and puniſhing perſons keeping diſorderly houſes in London or Weſtminſter, or within twenty miles thereof. In which it was enacted, "That as the

" multitude of places of entertainment for the " lower ſort of people is another great cauſe of " thefts and robberies, as they are thereby " tempted to ſpend their ſmall ſubſtance, and ſo " put upon unlawful methods of ſupplying their " wants and renewing their pleaſures; in order to " prevent ſuch thefts, and to correct the habit " of idleneſs, from the firſt of December 1752, " any houſe, room, garden, &c. kept for pub- " lic dancing, muſic, or other public entertain- " ment, in London or Weſtminſter, or within " twenty miles thereof, without a licence from " the laſt preceding Michaelmas quarter ſeſſions, " under the hands and ſeals of four or more of " the juſtices, who are hereby empowered to " grant licences, ſhall be deemed a diſorderly " houſe or place, and every ſuch licence to be " ſigned and ſealed in open court, and not at any " adjourned ſeſſions, and publickly read by the " clerk, together with the juſtices names ſub- " ſcribing the ſame, without any fee or reward " for ſuch licence. And any conſtable or other " perſon thereto authorized, by warrant from one " or more of the juſtices of peace, may enter " ſuch houſe or place, and ſeize every perſon " found there, to be dealt with according to law: " and every perſon who keeps ſuch houſe, &c. " without licence, ſhall forfeit 100l. to ſuch as " will ſue for it, and be otherwiſe puniſhable, as " in caſes of diſorderly houſes. And over the " door or entrance of ſuch houſe, &c. ſo li- " cenſed, ſhall be the following inſcription in " capital letters, Licenſed purſuant to act of par- " liament of the twenty-fifth of king George the " ſecond. And no ſuch houſe, &c. ſhall be " opened before five in the afternoon. The in- " ſcription, and reſtriction as to the time, ſhall " be made conditions of every ſuch licence; and " in caſe of breach of either, ſuch licence ſhall " be forfeited and revoked at the next general or " quarter ſeſſions, and ſhall not be renewed to " the ſame perſon; always excepting the theatres " of Drury-lane, Covent-garden, and the Hay- " market, or any other licenſed by the crown or " lord chamberlain.

" And to encourage proſecutions againſt perſons " who keep bawdy-houſes, gaming-houſes, or " other diſorderly houſes, upon any two inhabi- " tants, who pay ſcot and lot, giving notice in " writing, to a conſtable or other peace officer, " of any perſon keeping ſuch diſorderly houſe, the " conſtable ſhall go with ſuch inhabitants to a " juſtice of peace, and upon ſuch inhabitants " making oath that ſuch notice they believe to be " true, and entering into a 20l. recognizance to " produce material evidence againſt ſuch perſon " ſo offending, and the conſtable into a thirty " pound recognizance, to proſecute ſuch perſon " at the next ſeſſions, or next aſſizes; and ſuch " conſtable to be allowed all the reaſonable ex- " pences of ſuch proſecution, to be aſcertained " by two juſtices of the peace, and paid by the " overſeers of the poor; and, upon conviction, " each of the inhabitants to be paid, forthwith, " by the overſeers, ten pounds each, on penalty " of forfeiting double the ſum.

" Upon this the juſtice is to make out a war- " rant to bring the perſon ſo accuſed before him, " and bind him or her over to appear at the ſeſ- " ſions, or aſſizes, and in the mean time take ſe- " curity for ſuch perſon's good behaviour.

" Upon the conſtable's neglect in any of the " above particulars, he is to forfeit 20l.

" And as it is difficult to prove who is the real " owner or keeper of ſuch bawdy houſe, &c. " any perſon who acts as maſter or miſtreſs ſhall " be deemed the keeper thereof, though he, or " ſhe, ſhall not, in fact, be ſo. And any perſon " may give evidence for or againſt the defendant, " though he or ſhe be an inhabitant. And ſuch " indictment ſhall be finally determined at the " ſeſſions or aſſizes, and not removed by certiorari " to any other court."

One miſs Blandy was executed this year for poiſoning her father, an eminent attorney at Henley upon Thames. And one miſs Jefferies, a young woman, with Swan, her lover, were executed for murdering her uncle, a wealthy tradeſman, who had retired from buſineſs, and with whom ſhe had lived for a conſiderable time. A large mob aſſembled at Tring in Hertfordſhire, and ſeizing an old woman and her huſband, under the notion of their having commerce with the devil, treated them with ſuch inhumanity, by ducking and beating them, that the woman died on the ſpot, and the man with difficulty eſcaped with his life; for which murder one Colley, a chimney-ſweeper, was executed. Two felons, Welſh and Jones, were diſcovered to be the perpetrators of a rape and murder for which one Coleman, a brewer's clerk, had unjuſtly ſuffered. Thoſe wretches were preſent at Coleman's execution, heard the declaration of his innocence, and drew the cart from under him. Both of them were hanged, confeſſing the crime.

Motion for a new bridge over the river Thames between thoſe of London and Weſtminſter. Mr. Dance's plan and eſtimate for a new bridge. Election of members of parliament for the city of London. Mr. Holland's verdict againſt the toll-gatherers in Smithfield.

THE year 1753 was introduced by an event of ſo extraordinary a nature, that (though little connected with hiſtory, yet) it might be thought unpardonable in us entirely to omit it. We ſhall, therefore, proceed to relate it in as conciſe a manner as poſſible.

A young woman, whoſe name was Elizabeth Canning, pretended that, on the firſt day of January, as ſhe was coming home at night, ſhe was met under Bedlam-wall by two men, who pulled off her gown, cap, and apron; and having ſecured her mouth with a gag, threatened to kill her if ſhe made the leaſt noiſe: that they dragged her along to the houſe of one Wells near Enfield Waſh, where a woman robbed her of her ſtays: that ſhe was then forced into a cold, damp room, where ſhe was confined for a month without any other ſuſtenance than a few ſtale cruſts of bread, and about a gallon of water: that all theſe hardſhips were impoſed upon her in order to make her turn proſtitute: that nevertheleſs, ſhe was enabled to preſerve her virtue: and that having, at laſt, found means to make her eſcape through a window, on the twenty-ninth of the month, ſhe ran home almoſt naked to her mother, who lived near Moorgate.

Notwithſtanding the improbability of this ſtory, yet it ſo powerfully operated on the paſſions of the common people, eſpecially the enthuſiaſts of all denominations, that large ſubſcriptions were raiſed for proſecuting the ſuppoſed delinquents. Accordingly, warrants were immediately iſſued for apprehending Wells, miſtreſs of the houſe at Enfield Waſh, the maid ſervant, whoſe name was Virtue Hall, and one Squires, an old gipſey woman, whom Canning charged with having robbed her of her ſtays.

No evidence appearing to convict Wells of the felony, ſhe was puniſhed as a bawd. Hall, being intimidated by the juſtice who examined her, turned evidence for Canning, and Squires was convicted of the robbery, although ſhe produced undoubted evidence to prove that ſhe was at Abbotſbury in Dorſetſhire that very night in which the felony was ſaid to have been committed; and during the courſe of the trial, Canning and her witneſſes contradicted themſelves in many particulars.

The prepoſſeſſion of the common people, however, in favour of Canning was ſo great, that the moſt clear falſhoods, advanced by her and her adherents, were admitted as unqueſtionable truths; while the witneſſes for Squires were ſo over-awed by the rabble, that they durſt not enter the court; and thoſe who had reſolution enough to give evidence in her behalf, were inſulted in ſuch a manner, that even their lives were ſometimes in danger.

Sir Criſpe Gaſcoigne, who was at this time Lord-mayor of London, conducted himſelf in this affair with the greateſt juſtice and impartiality. Conſidering the improbability of the charge, the heat, paſſion, and furious zeal with which it was proſecuted; and being convinced of the old woman's innocence by a great number of affidavits, voluntarily ſent up from the country by perſons of undoubted veracity, he, in conjunction with ſome other worthy citizens, determined to oppoſe the torrent of popular prejudice. Application was made to the throne for mercy. The affair was referred to the attorney and ſolicitor-general, who, having examined the witneſſes on both ſides, made their report in favour of Squires, who was firſt reſpited, and afterwards received his majeſty's free pardon.

A bill of indictment was preferred by the Lord-mayor againſt Elizabeth Canning for perjury. Her friends did the like againſt the witneſſes from Abbotſbury in favour of Squires. The Abbotſbury people appeared; but no evidence coming againſt them, they were acquitted. Canning, being admitted to bail, at firſt abſconded, but afterwards ſurrendered to take her trial, which continued by adjournment five days; when ſhe was convicted of perjury, and committed to Newgate.

When Canning was brought up to the Old Bailey to receive ſentence, her council moved for a new trial, on the affidavit of two jurymen, who ſwore, that what they had done was contrary to their conſciences; for though they believed her guilty of perjury, they did not believe her guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury. The argument of which point, in arreſt of judgment, was put off till next ſeſſions; and Canning remained in Newgate till the thirtieth of May following, when, five judges on the bench, it was adjudged that the verdict was a good one, and perfectly agreeable to the evidence. After which the court paſſed judgment, that ſhe ſhould ſuffer one month's month's impriſonment, and then be tranſported to America for ſeven years. Her friends, however, ſtuck ſo cloſe to her, that they obtained permiſſion for her to tranſport herſelf, and ſhe was liberally fitted out with every convenience for her voyage.

The corporation of London were ſo truly ſenſible of the rectitude of Sir Criſpe Gaſcoigne's conduct in the above affair, that the court of common-council, at the expiration of his mayoralty, in their thanks preſented to him, had the following expreſſion: "That the thanks of this court "be given to the right honourable Sir Criſpe "Gaſcoigne, knt. late Lord-mayor, for his ſteady "perſeverance in the cauſe of juſtice, his gene-"rous protection of the diſtreſſed, and his re-"markable humanity."

About this time an act of parliament paſſed for the purchaſe of the Muſeum or collection of Sir Hans Sloane, (who died the eleventh of January 1753) and of the Harleian collection of manuſcripts, and for providing one general repoſitory for the better reception and more convenient uſe of the ſaid collections, and of the Cottonian library and the additions thereto. By which act twenty thouſand pounds was paid to Sir Hans Sloane's executors for his collection, and ten thouſand pounds to the truſtees of the earl and counteſs of Oxford and Mortimer for the Harleian collection. And it was enacted, that the ſaid collections. together with the Cottonian library and its additions, ſhould be repoſited in one place, to be erected or purchaſed for that purpoſe by the truſtees therein mentioned; and that the collection of Sir Hans Sloane, in all its branches, ſhould be kept and preſerved together in the general repoſitory whole and entire, and with proper marks of diſtinction; and that the Harleian collection of manuſcripts ſhall be kept together in the ſaid repoſitory, as an addition to the Cottonian library. And the ſaid truſtees were made a body corporate, with power to make ſtatutes, rules and ordinances; to chooſe librarians, officers and ſervants, and to appoint ſalaries: upon this ſpecial truſt and confidence, "that a free "acceſs to the ſaid general repoſitory, and to the "collections therein contained, ſhall be given to "all ſtudious and curious perſons, at ſuch times "and in ſuch manner, and under ſuch regula-"tions, for inſpecting and conſulting the ſaid "collections, as by the ſaid truſtees, or the ma-"jor part of them, in any general meeting aſ-"ſembled, ſhall be limited for that purpoſe." And it was farther enacted, that there ſhould be raiſed 300,000l. by way of lottery, to ſatisfy and diſcharge the ſeveral ſums neceſſary for the purpoſes of this act: 30,000l. of which to be put out at intereſt in the public funds, towards paying of officers ſalaries, and other neceſſary expences.

Soon after the paſſing of this act it very fortunately happened that, while the truſtees were at a loſs where to purchaſe or build a proper repoſitory, an offer was made them of Montague-houſe, in Great Ruſſel-ſtreet, Bloomſbury; which being readily accepted of, the ſame was purchaſed for 10,000l. The repairs of which, together with alterations, book-caſes, cabinets, and other conveniences for placing the whole collection properly, and the making apartments for the officers, coſt 15000l. more. And every part is now ſo excellently contrived for holding this noble collection, and the diſpoſition of it in the ſeveral rooms is ſo orderly and well deſigned, that the Britiſh Muſeum may juſtly be eſteemed an honour and ornament to the Engliſh nation. The contents of which we ſhall in this place give a particular account.

Deſcription of the curioſities in the BRITISH MUSEUM.

Before we begin to deſcribe the different departments in this ſpacious building, it may not be improper to inform the reader of the method to obtain admittance.

If any number, not exceeding fifteen, are inclined to ſee it, they muſt ſend a liſt of their chriſtian and ſurnames, and places of abode, to the Porter's-lodge, in order to their being entered in the book; in a few days the reſpective tickets will be made out, ſpecifying the day and hour in which they are to come, which, on being ſent for are delivered. The fewer names there are on a liſt, the ſooner they are likely to be admitted to ſee it.

In the Britiſh Muſeum are three departments. The firſt is of manuſcripts, medals and coins; the ſecond of natural and artificial productions; and the third conſiſts of printed books; excluſive of many articles in the hall, in the firſt room above ſtairs, and other places.

In the hall you will firſt take notice of ſeven blocks of very hard marble, of an hexangular form, which were brought from the Giant's cauſeway near Coleraine in Ireland. And next to them is a ſtone brought from the Appian road, which led from Rome to Brunduſium.

Two fragments of Granite columns; ſome curious pebbles, and two antique heads called Termini, which were uſed by the Romans as landmarks.

A large piece of ſerpentine marble: it was called Ophites, from its reſemblance to a ſerpent's ſkin. It has a duſky brown ground, ſtreaked with green and pale yellow.

A beautiful large cubic piece of lava, iſſued from Mount Veſuvius.

In another part is a painted genealogical tree of a noble Venetian family.

A ſkeleton of a unicorn fiſh.

The head of a very particular kind of buffalo, which inſtead of hair, is covered with long wool.

The paintings on the ſide of the ſtaircaſe repreſent Cæſar and his military retinue, the chiefs of the provinces he had in part ſubdued attending on him, and others on their knees, imploring his protection and aſſiſtance.

In a compartment are the feaſts and ſacrifices of Bacchus.

In another, the rivers Nile and Tiber are repreſented by gigantic figures emblematically ornamented: and there are views of emblematical landſcapes at a diſtance, and ſeveral fine pieces of architecture.

On the ceiling is repreſented the ſtory of Phae-ton: the gods are aſſembled, and the youth appears aſking Phœbus to permit him to drive his chariot for a day; he conſents, and in another part is ſeen conducting him to the chariot: Diana is near them, and Juno is attended by Iris.

Farther on, Phaeton, with all the ardour of youth, is driving the ſun's chariot, accompanied by the hours in the form of women. Time is repreſented by Saturn, Eternity by a woman holding a ſerpent, and Cybele, or the goddeſs of the earth, appears alſo.

On a pedeſtal, as you go up ſtairs, is the buſto of Sir Hans Sloane.

In the firſt room, the ſtory of Phaeton is compleated on the ceiling. The gods are aſſembled, and whilſt Jupiter is caſting his thunder bolts at Phaeton falling from the chariot, you ſee Saturn, Apollo, Mars, Neptune, Juno, Diana, Venus, Cupid, Mercury, Minerva, and Bacchus, in various attitudes, and agitated by different paſſions.

The portraits of many illuſtrious perſonages hang up in the ſeveral departments of this Muſeum; they are all preſents, and continually increaſing in number.

This room is ſet apart for the immediate reception of preſents: it contains

An Egyptian mummy, which is depoſited in a glaſs-caſe, in one corner of the room, as its coffin is in the other. The face of the mummy is covered with a gilded maſk; near its feet is a ſkull, and ſeveral bones, viz. feet and hands, taken from a broken mummy. Over its head are ſome ſmall earthen idols. Over the coffin is a ſquare caſe, in which the Egyptians placed ſome utenſils belonging to the deceaſed, and depoſited it near the body: as alſo two models of a mummy, one of which they put near the coffin at the head, they other at the feet.

Over the mummy is an urn of the Ibis, and ſeveral Egyptian idols in bronze. We ſhall firſt mention Oſiris: it is the figure of a man, the body in the ſhape of a mummy, with a three cornered cap on its head, a whip in one hand, and a lituus (a ſtaff not unlike a crozier) in the other. Iſis is figured by a woman, with the infant Orus in her lap. Orus, or Harpocrates, their ſon, is the figure of a young man, holding the fore-finger of his left hand on his lips, to enforce ſilence as the greateſt mark of prudence, and a reverential awe for the divinity.

In this room are ſome natural productions; as ſeveral large corals, a ſubſtance produced in the ſea, but in what manner is not yet determined by the naturaliſts.

Here are likewiſe various ſpecies of corals; and in one of the repoſitories is a curious large brainſtone, which is of the nature of coral.

In one of the cabinets is a waſp's neſt, which is very curious; and in ſpirits you ſee a vulture's head, ſome ſerpents, birds, ſpiders, lizards, and other articles; but what muſt attract particular notice, is a fine young flamingo ſtuffed.

Here is a fine jay, brought from the Eaſt-Indies, and the back-bone of an elephant petrified.

The ſaloon is finely ornamented with freſco paintings, conſiſting of architecture, ſtair-caſes, flowers, ſtatues, and other things properly arranged.

The dome is ſupported by ſeveral atlantes, and on it is repreſented a council of the heathen gods.

In the different compartments, The giants are turned out of heaven. Mercury is ſeen ready to receive his orders, as meſſenger of the gods. In another appears Ceres and Neptune, Pan and Amphitrite.

Phaeton is repreſented driving the chariot of Phœbus, preceded by Aurora, and properly attended by the hours.

On a table in this room is a fine model of Laocoon and his two ſons, encircled with ſerpents, as deſcribed by Virgil.

The ſaloon is for the reception of company that happen to come before the hour mentioned in their tickets.

Having viewed the articles already mentioned, the firſt department conſiſts of a collection of manuſcripts, medals, and coins.

The firſt room contains two ſeveral collections of manuſcripts.

Bibliotheca Regia MSS. Theſe manuſcripts are in number upwards of two thouſand volumes.

There are in this collection ſome very ancient copies of the holy ſcriptures, and tranſlations of them into many different Oriental and other languages.

Some old and curious manuſcripts, treating on the ſubject of religion, and of the different confeſſions of faith, in various languages.

Many large volumes of hiſtory, finely wrote, and ornamented in a moſt elegant manner with paintings.

A great number of manuſcripts relating to the hiſtory and government of the church, and other curious ſubjects.

Bibliotheca Cottoniana MSS. In this room is likewiſe contained the Cottonian collection of manuſcripts; it is ancient and noble, conſiſting of original charters, deeds, and evidences of facts.

There are many ancient copies of ſeveral parts of the bible.

But what is more particularly to be admired, is an original of that great bulwark of our liberties, the Magna Charta.

Bibliotheca Harleiana MSS. Theſe are a part of the Harleian manuſcripts. The room we are now treating of, contains many curious copies of the bible, and the different parts of it, in a variety of languages. Some original manuſcripts, treating of divinity and eccleſiaſtical matters; alcorans, and other Turkiſh books; and a Thorah, the five books of Moſes, finely wrote in Hebrew on a vellum roll.

In this room is a ſeries of Engliſh medals, beginning with William Rufus, and reaching down to the preſent times.

Bibliotheca Harleiana II. This room contains another part of the Harleian manuſcripts, treating chiefly of philoſophical, hiſtorical, and philological ſubjects, in a variety of languages, and by many different authors.

In this room is a ſeries of French medals, beginning with thoſe of Pharamond.

Harleiana III. Chartæ & Rotuli. This fourth room of the department contains the Harleian collection collection of orignals (or very ancient and authentic copies of) charters, acts of parliament, deeds, warrants, rolls, and other inſtruments in writing, relative to a great number of tranſactions at home and abroad.

In the fifth room is carefully preſerved, in ſeveral ſmall cabinets, Sir Hans Sloane's collection of medals. Their number is ſaid to be upwards of twenty thouſand.

Bibliotheca Sloaniana MSS. The ſixth room contains Sir Hans Sloane's manuſcripts. They are a valuable collection, though not ſo ancient as thoſe already mentioned. Their ſubjects are comprehenſive, and conſequently may be eſteemed of general uſe. There are many original treatiſes on philoſophy, phyſic, natural hiſtory, and, in fine, almoſt the whole circle of ſciences.

In this room is to be ſeen a table of the pontifical medals, beginning with Martin the fifth, (who was the firſt of the popes that ſtruck them good) and carried on in a chronological ſeries to the preſent times.

The ſecond department contains natural and artificial productions.

Collectio Sloaniana. There are many pieces of antiquity in this room, conſiſting of a great number of urns, veſſels, &c. uſed of old by different nations.

Antiquitates Ægyptiacæ. In the repoſitories bearing this title are a great number of Egyptian antiquities; and firſt, ſeveral bronze figures, ſome repreſenting Iſis with the infant Orus on her lap; in others ſhe is ſtanding with a variety of ſymbols.

Here are ſome figures of Oſiris, repreſented by a man with a large beard.

A figure of an old bearded man, with a kind of baſket over his head.

A muſical inſtrument of metal, in form of a racket, traverſed by ſeveral moveable bars.

An urn, with a cover cemented to it, containing an Ibis; its form is that of an inverted cone.

A baſſo relievo in marble, repreſenting an idol of Mendes in Egypt, where they formerly worſhipped a goat.

An alabaſter urn, with a cover made in form of a hawk's head, and marked with ſeveral hieroglyphics.
